

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

LAWYERS' REPORTS,

ANNOTATED.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT (In Banc).

PEOPLE of the State of California, Resp't.,
v.
(100 Cal. 664.)

1. A writing may be the subject of forgery though not sufficient to create a legal liability if genuine when it is such that if genuine it might injure another.

2. An assignment or sale of the unearned salary of a public school teacher with order therefor although void on the ground of public policy is not so plainly worthless that it cannot be the subject of forgery.

(December 30, 1898.)

NOTE.—Forgery of worthless instruments.

1. The general rule.
2. What constitutes legal efficacy.
  - a. Must be intelligible and certain.
  - b. Must be an order and not a mere request.
  - c. Must not be mere matter of opinion.
  - d. Must not be mere recommendation to court-ry.
  - e. Must purport to be the act of another.
3. Instruments void on their face.
4. Efficacy which is apparent only.
  - a. Must be sufficient to deceive.
  - b. Must be a subject of legal proceedings.
  - c. Apparent capacity or authority to make.
5. Real efficacy not apparent.
6. Instruments requiring further steps to perfect them.
7. Naked and conditional promises.
8. Instruments not in statutory form.
9. Prohibited instruments.
10. Unstamped instruments.
11. Instruments executed in fictitious name.

1. The general rule.

The general rule both at common law and under the statutes is variously stated as follows:

An instrument to be a subject of forgery must be such that if it were genuine it would have some apparent legal efficacy. Abbott v. Rose, 62 Me. 194, 16 Am. Rep. 427; Dixon v. State, 51 Ala. 61; Shannon v. State, 109 Ind. 407; Reg. v. Boulit, 2 Car. & K. 604.

It must be valid for the purpose for which it purports to have been designed. Anderson v. State, 26 Tex. App. 595; Costley v. State, 14 Tex. App. 156.

It must be legally capable of effecting a fraud. Dixon v. State, supra; Terry v. Com. 87 Va. 672.

It must be one which might work some prejudice to law to another in his rights of person or property. People v. Tomlinson, 35 Cal. 503; People v. Bibby, 91 Cal. 470; State v. Dunn, 23 Or. 582; State v. Anderson, 30 Ia. Ann. 557; State v. Kimball, 50 Me. 406; Com. v. Cullen, 36 Phila. Leg. Int. 264; State v. Ward, 7 Baxt. 76; State v. Briggs, 34 Vt. 601; King v. Ward, 2 Ld. Raym. 1461.

It must be one which from its nature and the course of business might deceive or mislead to the prejudice of another. State v. Croes, 101 N. C. 776; State v. Covington, 94 N. C. 912, 55 Am. Rep. 650.

It must purport to create a pecuniary obligation or liability upon another, or operate as evidence of a right of another. Shannon v. State, supra.

It must be one which would establish or defeat some claim or impose some duty or create some liability. People v. Tomlinson, supra.

Forgery at the common law is the false making or materially altering with intent to defraud of any writing which if genuine might apparently be of legal efficacy, or the foundation of a legal liability. Dixon v. State, supra; State v. Johnson, 26 Iowa, 407, 95 Am. Dec. 158.

See also note (Forgery defined) to State v. Wheeler (Or.) 10 L. R. A. 779.

Forgery at common law may be committed of any writing which if genuine would operate as the foundation of another's liability. Ames' Case, 2 Ma. 265.

And the forgery of any instrument by which another might be prejudiced was punishable as such at common law. State v. Givens, 5 Ala. 747.

The statutes with reference to forgery usually provide either generally or specifically what instruments shall be the subject thereof, but leave the question as to the effect of their worthlessness or invalidity as it stood at common law, though many of them have provided that the instrument must be one which, if genuine would have some real or apparent legal efficacy or which would affect or prejudice the rights of another, or otherwise to the same effect, thus substantially re-enacting the rule of the common law. There are instances, however, in which the language of the statutes has effected a change of the common-law rule, which will be found noted in their proper places below.

Thus under statutory provisions with relation to the forgery of specified instruments, the instrument alleged to be forged must be one which if genuine would be effective. Brown v. People, 36 Ill. 229, 29 Am. Rep. 25.

Sounder the Georgia code which enumerates certain instruments and "any other writing," as the subject of forgery, any writing which might be used as a means of defrauding another is included. Berrisford v. State, 66 Ga. 53.

In VanHorne v. State, 5 Ark. 349, the word "purport" in a statute prohibiting and punishing the issue of bills purporting to be those of any bank or corporation, was held to refer to what appears upon the face of the instrument.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County convicting defendant of the crime of forgery. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William E. Cox, for appellant:

The fact being established that this instrument shows on its face that it was given as an assignment of the unearned salary of a public school teacher, and it also being shown that Mr. Jackson so understood the instrument, it is against the public interest that such a contract against the interests of the public, or in other words against public policy, should be made.

Arbuckle v. Coutan, 3 Bos. & P. 828; Wayne

Trep. v. Chhill, 49 N. J. L. 144; Field v. Chipley, 79 Ky. 267; Bangs v. Dunn, 66 Cal. 73; Bliss v. Lawrence, 58 N. Y. 442, 17 Am. Rep. 273; Shannon v. Bruner, 86 Fed. Rep. 148; Dowery Nat. Bank of New York v. Wilson, 9 L. R. A. 706, 122 N. Y. 478.

The terms "office" and "public trust" have no legal or technical meaning, distinct from their ordinary signification. An office is a public charge or employment, and the term seems to comprehend every charge or employment in which the public are interested.

Rs Wood, 2 Cow. 80; People v. Brooklyn, 77 N. Y. 507, 88 Am. Rep. 659; People v. Hayes, 7 How. Pr. 250; People v. Nostrand, 46 N. Y.

2. What constitutes legal efficacy.

The rule may be stated generally that an instrument is one of legal efficacy within rules relating to forgery where by any possibility it may operate to the injury of another. See People v. Rathbun, 21 Wend. 508; Williams v. State, 61 Ala. 38; Com. v. Linton, 2 Va. Cas. 476.

Thus a writing requesting another to let the bearer have three dollars worth of goods promising to pay in tobacco, might prejudice another's right and is a subject of forgery. State v. Tingle, 33 W. Va. 546.

So an order to permit the bearer to taste wine belonging to the person by whom it purports to have been made, addressed to the parties having it in store, is an order for the delivery of goods within a statute with relation to the forgery thereof. Reg. v. Illidge, 1 Den. C. C. 404.

So also a direction to a principal to pay to another a certain sum for corn, signed in the name of the principal by an agent, would, if genuine, render the principal liable to the third person for the amount thereof and is therefore a subject of forgery. State v. Lee, 32 Kan. 860.

In State v. Kimball, 50 Me. 408, the rule that any writing by which another might be prejudiced may be a subject of forgery was applied to a deposition taken for use in the trial of a divorce case.

In People v. Rathbun, 21 Wend. 508, an indorsement upon a promissory note was held to be a subject of forgery, although at the time of the transfer of the note a communication was made, which would release the indorsers if the indorsements had been genuine.

A date is not indispensable to an instrument creating a pecuniary obligation, and such an instrument, though not dated, is a subject of forgery if it is such that if genuine it would create a pecuniary obligation. Boles v. State, 18 Tex. App. 650.

So an assignment without a seal is a subject of forgery when the name without the seal gives authority to sue for and receive the money or thing assigned. State v. Misner, Add. Rep. 44.

And a deed which does not contain the usual and formal words of conveyance, but which sets out the names of the vendor and vendee and a valuable consideration, and contains a warranty of title, would, if genuine, pass the title, and is therefore a subject of forgery. Allgood v. State, 37 Ga. 668.

A school warrant signed by two directors, the statute entrusting the management of school affairs to three directors, is a subject of forgery where it is provided that the authority conferred upon several persons may be exercised by the majority thereof. Clairborne v. State, 51 Ark. 86; Crain v. State, 45 Ark. 460.

And a teacher's certificate of qualification is a subject of forgery under a statute with relation to the forgery of any certificate, order, or allowance by any competent court or officer, or any license or authority authorized by statute. State v. Grant, 74 Mo. 33.

A receipt for money paid on account discharges a pecuniary demand and is a subject of forgery. Allen v. State, 79 Ala. 84.

So a common receipt for money in full of all demands is a discharge for money within the meaning of a statute imposing a punishment for forging discharges for money or property, or accountable receipts therefor. Com. v. Talbot, 2 Allen. 161.

In Com. v. Lawless, 101 Mass. 33, however, it was held that a receipt for a discharge and check for a certain amount is not a subject of forgery within a statutory provision for the punishment of the forgery of accountable receipts.

A receipt for a certain amount upon a designated demand is a subject of forgery though the amount receipted for is less than the demand. It is not necessary that the instrument should defeat a pecuniary obligation. It is sufficient if it tends to defeat it. Fonville v. State, 17 Tex. App. 388.

A bail bond taken by a sheriff may be a subject of forgery though there are doubts as to its validity arising from recitals therein, if the invalidity be not open and palpable. Com. v. Linton, 2 Va. Cas. 476.

And a bond given in anticipation of a tax, authorized by and issued under a statute is a subject of forgery although the statute might under certain circumstances operate in contravention of the constitution if it may also have a constitutional operation. Bowles v. State, 37 Ohio St. 35.

A telegram in the name of another requesting a bank to honor a draft upon the sender imports a pecuniary obligation and will sustain a prosecution for perjury without allegation of extrinsic facts. Morris v. State, 17 Tex. App. 660.

In State v. Jefferson, 39 La. Ann. 331, it was held that an instrument in terms as follows: "Willy Johns has picked 215 lbs. of cotton, Henry Weastly and David Jefferson has picked 852 lbs. of cotton," signed "Henry Woothen," appears upon its face to be an acknowledgment of work done by a laborer and might be deemed to be equivalent to an order which on presentation would entitle the party named, or the bearer, to the payment for such labor and is therefore a subject of forgery.

A writing in the following terms: "Received of E. E. Thompson a promissory note against S. A. Thompson, bearing date Feb. 12, 1880, of which I am to have $100 when collected, or I am to pay $50 at the end of three years from date," signed "S. B. Skiff," is a subject of forgery, the last clause constituting a promise on the part of Skiff, regarding the instrument as a genuine one, to pay $50 to the person to whom it was delivered. State v. Thompson, 19 Iowa. 299.

In Com. v. Ladd, 15 Mass. 526, it was held in case of a bill of parcels to the effect that J. bought of E. & C. a bill of goods charged to G. C., to which was falsely and fraudulently added, "by order of E. & C.," that the addition amounts in law to an acknowledgment that the goods were charged to another, thus acquitting or discharging the purchaser, and is therefore a subject of forgery.

381; Jackson v. Healy, 20 Johns. 495; United States v. Hartwell, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 385, 18 L. ed. 880; Fols v. Kerlin, 105 Ind. 231, 35 Am. Rep. 197; Carter v. Sanderson, 5 Bing. 91; Greenhood, Pub. Pol. Rules 10, 297.

A contract which is against public policy is void.

Valentine v. Stewart, 15 Cal. 387; Swan v. Chorpennig, 20 Cal. 182; Bangs v. Dunn, supra; Beard v. Beard, 65 Cal. 856; Firemen's Charitable Assn. v. Berghaus, 13 La. Ann. 209; St. Louis, J. & O. R. Co. v. Mathers, 104 Ill. 259; O'Keefe v. Barry, 24 Miss. 22.

The object of the Helen Henry order being unlawful, the contract is void under §§ 1595, 1596, of the Civil Code.

Black, Dict. p. 963; Lawrence, Dict. pp. 971, 972; Gulick v. Ward, 10 N. J. L. 103, 18 Am. Dec. 889; Logan v. Plummer, 70 N. C. 392; Alger v. Thacher, 19 Pick. 51, 81 Am. Dec. 119.

In England it has been held that a conviction for forging a bill of exchange void by statute was wrong, the court saying: "For if it had been a genuine instrument, it would have been absolutely void; and nothing could have made it good."

2 East, P. C. 954. See also 2 East, P. C. 953,

In State v. Humphreys, 10 Humph. 442, it was held that the following order, "Mr. Bortick, charge J. S. Humphreys account to Wyman & Tannehill," would be, if genuine, an acquittance and release of the debt of Humphreys, the implied promise being a sufficient consideration therefor, and is therefore a subject of forgery.

In State v. Wingard, 40 La. Ann. 733, it was held that a paper of the following tenor, "Prime Wingard, 507 I. Cot. T. T. P.," is an instrument of some apparent legal efficacy, upon which money might be obtained, and is therefore a subject of forgery.

In Dooley v. State, 21 Tex. App. 549, a telegram in the name of another as follows: "Laura is dead. Send $75 for her remains to S. B. Wilcox, 210 East Commerce St.," is a forgery, it being an instrument which might create a pecuniary obligation, if genuine, if the money was sent pursuant to its demand.

In People v. Finch, 5 Johns. 236, it was held that a writing "Due J. F. $1, on settlement this day," if falsely made, is a forgery of a note for the payment of money.

a. Must be intelligible and certain.

A writing so imperfect and obscure that it is unintelligible without reference to extrinsic facts will not support an indictment for forgery unless these facts are averred and by the averment it is made apparent that it has the capacity of effecting fraud. Hobbs v. State, 75 Ala. 1.

In People v. Farrington, 14 Johns. 348, it was held that an order to the cashier of a bank to pay a certain sum to another or bearer in "N. Meyers' bills or yours," is too uncertain to be considered an order for the payment of money, or for the delivery of goods within a statute with reference to the forging thereof, and is not therefore a subject of forgery.

An order for the payment of money, signed, "Elmer Lowtzenheiser" when the person whose name was intended to be signed was named Ezra Lowtzenheiser, is not a subject of forgery inasmuch as it could not be construed on its face by any means to bind Lowtzenheiser. Abbott v. State, 59 Ind. 70.

In Dixon v. State, 81 Ala. 61, it was held that a written instrument as follows: "Dear sir:—I have nothing to do with Venie Dixon's patch cotton, they are welcome to it and do what they please with it."

Signed W. W. Roberts.

"Mary Ann, the same W. W. Roberts."—is so incomplete in form as not to be a subject of forgery in the absence of evidence to indicate that Roberts was in any way connected in interest with the patch cotton.

A note without a signature is incomplete and not a subject of forgery. Rex v. Pateman, Russ. & R. C. C. 455.

7 Q. B. Div. 73, 50 L. J. M. C. 90, 29 Week. Rep. 742, 14 Cox. C. C. 574.

And a check, bill, or order payable to the order of — or to — or order, is neither payable to bearer nor to order of any named person, and is so incomplete upon its face as to be incapable of sustaining an indictment for forgery. Rex v. Randall, Buss. & R. C. C. 196; Rex v. Richards, Id. 198; Williams v. State, 51 Ga. 535.

A draft made payable to bearer in which no payee is mentioned, however, is an order for money within a statute with reference to the forgery thereof. People v. Brigham, 2 Mich. 550.

And an order for the payment of money may be a forgery although neither the payee nor the drawee be named in the instrument. State v. Bauman, 52 Iowa, 68.

And an instrument purporting to be a promissory note which is perfect in all respects except that the name of the payee is omitted, is a subject of forgery. Harding v. State, 54 Ind. 829.

An order to let "the boy have $2.00 worth of what he wants," made falsely and with intent to defraud, is a forgery and its brevity and uncertainty will not prevent a conviction. Burke v. State, 66 Ga. 157.

In Williams v. State, 24 Tex. App. 342, it was held that the following instrument, "Mr. Allen bounds, please let aran Williams have one pair shoes, one pair pants and charge the same by this, p. o. Stutta," is not so uncertain that it cannot be made the subject of a forgery by proper averments in the indictment.

In Rembert v. State, 53 Ala. 467, 25 Am. Rep. 639, it was held that a writing as follows: "Due 8.55 Askew Bros.," with an allegation that the meaning thereof was that $8.25 was due to the defendant from Askew Bros. who were partners, will uphold an indictment for the forgery thereof.

In Hollins v. State, 22 Tex. App. 548, 58 Am. Rep. 659, it was held that the following writing, "Apolas, Halsal, Please let Mr. G. B. Rowlands, have 4$000. in goods and oblige. Charge to me Joel Eblor."—was intended for an order on Apolas & Halsal, for $4 in goods, and that with extrinsic proof as to whose signature it was, it may be a subject of forgery.

In Nelson v. State, 83 Ala. 44, it was held that a writing as follows: "Due 8.50 c. J. R.," is a subject of forgery, if accompanied by proof that it meant that the sum of $8.50 was due the bearer of said instrument from a certain mercantile firm at their store, and that the same was made by the clerk of such firm who had authority to do so in the regular course of business.

In Hobbs v. State, 75 Ala. 1, a writing: "Please send me word how long you will give Stevens to pay for the bed, and if you will allow him time enough to pay for it let him have a cheap bureau, as cheap as possible and I will see that you will get so, and oblige, much a week. Just write it off the whole thing and send it to me," was held to be an and note, "Walls Case," Com. v. Ray, 8 Gray, 448; 8 Greenl. Ev. 108; Barnum v. State, 15 Ohio, 723, 45 Am. Dec. 601; Abbott v. Rose, 62 Me. 194, 16 Am. Rep. 427; Clarke v. State, 8 Ohio St. 634; State v. Briggs, 34 Vt. 504; People v. Ferris, 56 Cal. 445; Cox v. State, 66 Miss. 14; Waterman v. People, 67 Ill. 99; Garmire v. State, 104 Ind. 444; State v. Wheeler, 19 Minn. 98; 2 Bishop, Crim. L. § 508.

The presumption is that every man knows the law and is able to appreciate the legal effect of the instrument. Therefore it cannot in legal contemplation defraud any one.

instrument of apparent legal efficacy and not so obscure as to be unintelligible without reference to extrinsic facts and therefore a subject of forgery.

In Hendricks v. State, 26 Tex. App. 176, it was held that a written communication as follows: "Mr. Gladstone, please let Bare Have the sum of $5 in Groceries, and charge the same to Dr. F. T. Cook," is an order for merchandise or goods or property of some kind, and may be a subject of forgery, no averment of extrinsic facts being necessary to show that such was its character.

A bank note in which a blank is left in the body of the note where the number of dollars should appear, the denomination appearing elsewhere in the bill, is a note of that denomination and may be a subject of forgery. State v. Dourden, 14 N. C. 445.

So though the word "pounds" is omitted in the body of the note, where the amount of the note with the sign "L" is placed in the margin. Rex v. Elliott, 2 East, P. C. 951, 1 Leach, C. C. 175.

b. Must be an order and not a mere request.

A mere request made without right, which may or may not be complied with at the option of the person to whom it is addressed, is not a subject for forgery.

Thus in Shannon v. State, 109 Ind. 407, it was held that a writing as follows: "M. T. Hemphill, please let Charles Shannon have one dress pattern and oblige, Theodore Points," is not an order but a mere request, and without the averment of extrinsic facts it is not a subject of forgery. It being uncertain in that it is not apparent whether it was intended to mean sufficient material out of which to make a dress, or a pattern whereby to cut out a dress in accordance with fashion.

Shannon v. State, supra, however, was distinguished in Stewart v. State, 113 Ind. 503, in which the order upon which the charge of forgery was predicated was similar in its phraseology, the court saying that in the former case the decision was rendered solely because the order was so uncertain that the averment of extrinsic facts showing its fraudulent tendency was necessary to the sufficiency of the indictment, and not upon the ground that the order was an instrument upon which a charge of forgery could not be predicated.

So a request for the loan of a sum of money promising to repay it on a designated day is not a warrant or order for the payment of money within the Maryland statute with relation to the forgery thereof, though it is a subject of forgery at common law. United States v. Green, 2 Cranch, C. C. 620.

So also, in State v. Cook, 52 Ind. 574, it was held that an order addressed to "Trublood & Allen, Salem, Ind., please let Jim Cook have $2.00 worth on my credit. Fred C. Trow, Salem,"—is not an instrument for the payment of money or the delivery of goods within the Indiana statute, but a mere request that the drawee should sell to the bearer something to the value of $2.00, and charge 102; State v. Smith, 8 Yerg. 150; John v. State, 28 Wis. 504; Henderson v. State, 14 Tex. 503; People v. Tomlinson, 85 Cal. 508; People v. Shall, 9 Cow. 784; Fadner v. People, 2 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 553.

Messrs. Edgerton & Adams also for appellant.

Messrs. W. H. H. Hart, Atty-Gen., and Charles H. Jackson, for respondent:

The instrument is bad in part, and good in part.

When a contract has several distinct objects of which one at least is lawful, and one at least is unlawful, in whole or in part, the contract is void as to the latter, and valid as to the rest.

the same to the drawer, and is not a subject of forgery without an averment as to the business in which Trublood & Allen were engaged, and a statement as to their manner of doing business and their business relations with the drawer of the order.

In People v. Thompson, 3 Johns. Cas. 342, it was held that a letter introducing another, requesting the person to whom it is addressed to accept his draft on the person by whom it purports to have been written, stating that his compliance would much oblige, is a mere request as a favor and is not a subject of forgery.

In Horton v. State, 53 Ala. 488, it was held that a direction to let another have $5 in goods with a promise to settle on the following week would create a pecuniary demand if genuine, but is not an order for the delivery of goods, but a mere authority to sell that amount of goods upon the credit of the person making the direction, the false making of which is not forgery.

Horton v. State, supra, distinguishes People v. Shaw, 5 Johns. 238, and Com. v. Fisher, 17 Mass. 46, in which similar instruments were regarded as orders for delivery of goods upon the ground that the statute of those states specially designated such instruments as subjects of forgery.

An order for the delivery of goods, may be a forgery, however, though it is in the form of a request and does not show that the drawer had a right to make it, or that the person to whom it was addressed was bound to obey it. State v. Holley, 1 Brev. 35.

The style alone cannot determine the legal character of the instrument; the language employed may be such that the legal character of the instrument would depend upon the relations subsisting between the parties and the circumstances of the case. Evans v. State, 8 Ohio St. 196, 70 Am. Dec. 93.

Thus in Jones v. State, 50 Ala. 181, it was held that an order for money purporting to have been made by a son to his father was a forgery, the court saying that though if genuine it would be gratuitous and a mere matter of affection and favor, it is as criminal, morally and legally, to cheat and defraud the father by practicing on his affection for a child as by the pretense that he was being discharged from a legal liability or acquiring a legal right. The capacity of a false and fraudulent writing to work injury is the material question; if the writing has that capacity the offense of forgery is committed.

And a similar ruling was made in Evans v. State, supra.

So a note to a son purporting to have been written by his mother telling him to ask his employers for money and give it to a third person, who was the real writer of the note with intent to obtain the money, is a forgery, it being made to appear that the son was a minor working for wages. People v. Krummer, 4 Park. Crim. Rep. 217.

So also a writing as follows, "Please let the Civil Code, § 1599; Granger v. Original Empire Mill & Min. Co. 59 Cal. 682; Jackson v. Shawl, 29 Cal. 273; Moss v. Bonnet, 40 Cal. 251; Pigot's Case, 11 Coke, 26 b; Bank of Australasia v. Breillat, 6 Moore, P. C. C. 153; Pennsylvania Co. v. Wentz, 37 Ohio St. 333; State v. Perrysburg Board of Education, 35 Ohio St. 519; Gelpeke v. Dubuque, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 221, 17 L. ed. 519; Erie R. Co. v. Union Locomotive & Exp. Co. 85 N. J. L. 240; Presbury v. Fisher, 18 Mo. 50; Leavitt v. Palmer, 3 N. Y. 19, 51 Am. Dec. 533; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Burlington & S. W. R. Co. 3 McCrary, 180.

Inasmuch as half of the instrument is valid, that half is legitimately the subject of forgery.

bearer have the amount of three pounds and oblige," is an order for the payment of money and not a mere request, and is therefore a subject of forgery. Reg. v. Tuke, 17 U. C. Q. B. 206.

So a writing as follows, "Please let the bearer have one pair of boots" is an order for the delivery of goods within the Maryland statute with reference to the forgery thereof. United States v. Book, 2 Cranch, C. C. 204.

And the same ruling was made with reference to a request to let "the boy" have a suit of clothes and a cap, in Stewart v. State, 113 Ind. 606.

And with reference to a request to "let the bearer have ten dollars and such articles as he may choose," in United States v. Brown, 3 Cranch, C. C. 233.

A request as follows: "Please let Mr. Borswick have his clothes and I will hold his pay till next Tuesday and will see that paid for,"—is an order for the delivery of goods and chattels within a statute with reference to the forgery thereof. Childester v. State, 26 Ohio St. 433.

And an order as follows, "Mr. Allen, please let A. Garmire have team to go to Mongo and charge same to me, T. Hudson," is not merely a request for the delivery of property, but is a writing promising to pay for property purporting to create a pecuniary obligation against the person whose signature is forged, and is therefore a subject of forgery. Garmire v. State, 104 Ind. 444.

In People v. Shaw, 5 Johns. 236, an order to let the bearer trade to a certain amount and "much oblige, yours, etc.," was held to be an order for the delivery of goods within a statute concerning the forgery thereof.

And the same rule was held in State v. Cooper, 5 Day, 250.

It is not necessary that an order or request for the delivery of goods should on its face be directed to a particular person to make it the subject of a forgery, under a statute against forging any instrument in writing, it being or purporting to be the act of another. Nowkes v. People, 25 N. Y. 380.

See also State v. Jefferson, 39 La. Ann. 331, for a similar holding under the Louisiana statute.

c. Must not be mere matter of opinion.

The mere expression of a matter of opinion is not a subject upon which a forgery can be predicated.

Thus a certificate that another is a man of responsibility able to satisfy a demand for a specified amount if he agrees to, would if genuine subject no one to liability, and is not a subject of forgery. Ames' Case, 2 Me. 265.

So an affirmation that the makers of a note are able to pay it is a mere expression of opinion and not an obligatory writing which is the subject of a forgery. State v. Givens, 5 Ala. 747.

A communication from one person to another, however, that the latter might let a third person trade, stating that he has a good crop, is a recommendation that the third person is entitled to be 24 L. R. A.

Garoutte, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was decided in department, but, a rehearing having been ordered, it is now before the court in banc. The appellant was convicted of the crime of forgery, and prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. It is insisted that the facts charged in the information do not constitute the offense of forgery; and that is the only matter relied upon for a reversal of the judgment which demands our attention. We will not enter into a detailed analysis of the various parts of the writing which is the subject of the forgery here credited in the way of trade, upon which the receiver might hold the maker thereof if the statement was untrue, and is therefore a subject of forgery. Johnson v. State, 62 Ga. 290.

d. Must not be mere recommendation to courtesy.

A letter of introduction stating that the bearer will perform whatever he engages to do, and that he will probably want a stated sum of money to which he will undoubtedly be accommodated, is not a writing whereof forgery can be permitted. Foulkes v. Com. 2 Rob. (Va.) 533.

So one who fraudulently substitutes his name for that of another in a diploma of the college of surgeons to induce a belief that he was a member of the college but with no intent to commit any particular fraud or specific wrong, is not guilty of forgery. Reg. v. Hodgson, 7 Cox, C. C. 123; Deans & B. C. C. & 25 L. J. M. C. 78, 2 Jur. N. S. 483.

Likewise a paper purporting to be a certificate from one branch of a friendly society to another showing that the holder has paid all dues for a designated period, and authorizing any court of the order to accept him as a clearance member, is a certificate and not a receipt for money within a statute with reference to the forgery of receipts. Reg. v. French, L. R. 1 C. C. 217, 59 L. J. M. C. 58, 21 L. T. N. S. 720, 18 Week. Rep. 354.

A letter of introduction purporting to be signed by a railway superintendent introducing the bearer and promising to reciprocate any favors, would, if genuine, affect no legal rights, and is not a subject of forgery. Waterman v. People, 67 Ill. 91.

A letter of recommendation of character falsely written in the name of another with intent to obtain a situation as police constable, however, is a forgery. Reg. v. Moah, 7 Cox, C. C. 503; Deans & B. C. C. 550, 27 L. J. M. C. 205, 4 Jur. N. S. 464.

And the false writing in the name of another of certificates of service, sobriety, and good conduct at sea for a given period, required to enable persons to be examined for certificates of qualification to act as masters, is forgery. Reg. v. Tomhack, 4 Cox, C. C. 33, Temp. & M. 207, 1 Den. C. C. 403, 13 Jur. 1011.

e. Must purport to be the act of another.

The offense of forgery consists in falsely making an instrument purporting to be made by another. One who makes an instrument signed with his own name, but purporting to bind another, does not make an instrument purporting to be the act of another. People v. Mann, 75 N. Y. 424, 31 Am. Rep. 482; State v. Young, 46 N. H. 203, 38 Am. Dec. 512.

Thus where one executes an instrument purporting on its face to be executed by him as agent for a principal named therein, whether a corporation or an individual, when he has in fact no authority from such principal, he is not guilty of forgery. Mann v. People, 15 Hun, 155; Re Heilbronn, 1 Park. Crim. Rep. 422.

charged, but will view it from the standpoint of appellant's claims, and, for the purposes of this investigation, will concede the writing to be an assignment or sale of the unearned salary of a public school teacher for the next ensuing month, together with an order upon the city auditor of Los Angeles for the warrant representing such salary. That being the fact, it is further claimed that Helen Henry, the purported author of the writing, being a public school teacher, is a public officer, and that the sale or assignment of an unearned salary by a public officer is void, being against public policy, and, the writing being void, it cannot be the basis of a charge of forgery. The information charged that this writing was forged and passed by the defendant with intent to defraud one J. W. Jackson; the evidence disclosing that the writing was assigned to Jackson for valuable consideration, and that subsequently the warrant was delivered to him by the auditor, and the money paid thereon by the treasurer. Section 470 of the Penal Code provides that "every person who, with intent to defraud another, falsely makes, alters, forges, or counterfeits any charter [then follows a list by name of almost every conceivable kind and character of writing], is guilty of forgery." Upon a strict construction, it might in good reason be held that the fore-

An instrument purporting to be the contract or obligation of a county executed by a county officer in his own name, as the official representative of the county, is not a forgery. People v. Mann, supra.

And the same rule applies to an instrument executed by an officer, purporting to be an obligation of a city. Conner's Case, 3 City Hall Rec. 59.

Checks drawn by an agent without authority, who signs in his own name "by procuration," etc., show on their face all they purport to be and are not subjects of forgery. Re Tully, 30 Fed. Rep. 818.

And a false assertion in an indorsement, that the indorser has a procuration, without any other circumstance of falsehood or misrepresentation, does not make such indorsement a forgery. Reg. v. White, 2 Cox, C. C. 210, 1 Den. C. C. 208, 2 Car. & K. 404, citing Maddock's Case; 2 Russell on Crimes, 8th Am. ed. 499.

A paper made by a member of a firm without authority, though it be with intent to defraud the firm, is not a forgery. Com. v. Brown, 30 Phila. Leg. Int. 200.

Thus, a note made in the name of a fictitious firm of which the maker purports to be a member, or in the name of the maker thereof with another as partners when they are not so in fact, is not forgery, forgery consisting, not in the bare writing of the instrument in another's name without authority, but in giving it a false appearance of having been executed by him. Com. v. Baldwin, 11 Gray, 197, 71 Am. Dec. 708.

Writing a letter in the name of another representing that the real and the ostensible writer are partners, is not forgery as it imports neither a transfer, or extinguishment of any right nor an obligation for money or other thing for value. Jackson v. Weisiger, 2 B. Mon. 214.

False charges in one's own book of accounts are not forgeries. A forgery must generally be an instrument under which others have acquired some rights or have in some way become liable. State v. Young, 46 N. H. 266, 38 Am. Dec. 812.

2. Instruments void on their face.

A writing void on its face because of the want of legal requisites to its validity, is not the subject of an indictment for forgery, in consequence of its incapacity to effect fraud. Hobbs v. State, 75 Ala. 1; State v. Pierce, 8 Iowa, 281; Roode v. State, 5 Neb. 174, 25 Am. Rep. 475; People v. Shall, 9 Cow. 778; Anderson v. State, 20 Tex. App. 595; Costley v. State, 14 Tex. App. 159; Raymond v. People, 2 Colo. App. 329; Terry v. Com. 37 Va. 672; Rex v. Burke, Russ. & R. C. C. 493.

The forging of an instrument which upon the face of the indictment would appear to be void even if genuine, is not an indictable offense. State v. Van Hart, 17 N. J. L. 327.

Where the instrument which is charged to be forged is of no apparent legal effect, and there are no averments in the indictment of facts showing the capacity of the instrument for fraud, it is insufficient to sustain the prosecution. People v. Shall, supra; State v. Wheeler, 19 Minn. 98.

A paper purporting to be a copy of a decree of divorce with what purports to be an impression of the seal of the clerk of the court upon it, there being no certificate of comparison with the original decree, will not support an indictment for uttering a false and fraudulent impression of the seal of the supreme court even though the court had been deceived thereby, and had directed the forger's acquittal upon an indictment for bigamy. Fadner v. People, 33 Hun, 240.

Nor will a copy of a decree of divorce which does not purport on its face to be an authenticated copy of a record be a forgery, under a statute making it forgery to falsely make, alter, forge, or counterfeit any record or other authenticated matter of a public nature. Brown v. People, 33 Ill. 230, 30 Am. Rep. 25.

Thus a county warrant which is void upon its face will not support an indictment for the forgery thereof. People v. Heed, 1 Idaho, 531.

Nor is an order purporting to be drawn by the auditor of public accounts of a state upon the treasurer thereof without a seal, when by the law of the state in which it is made an unsealed order is void. Cunningham v. People, 4 Hun, 455.

So, in a state in which a married woman's deed is void without acknowledgment, an indictment for the forgery thereof cannot be sustained. Roode v. State, 5 Neb. 174, 25 Am. Rep. 475.

And a certificate of acknowledgment of a deed which does not set forth that the grantor acknowledged the execution thereof, would not pass title and its invalidity would be apparent upon its face, and the crime of forgery could not be predicated thereon. People v. Harrison, 8 Barb. 560.

Under a statute making it forgery to falsely make, alter, forge, or counterfeit any record or other authenticated matter of a public nature, if the instrument set out in the indictment does not purport on its face to be an authenticated copy of a record it is not a subject of forgery within such statute. Brown v. People, supra.

A writing addressed to the proper officer, "Please give E. B. Rhine his license to marry my girl. She is 18,"—purporting to have been signed by the girl's father, does not purport to be and is not a certificate within the meaning of a statute providing that if either party is a minor the consent of the parent or guardian must be filed in the clerk's office, after being acknowledged by such parent or guardian, and proved to be genuine, and such a writing when falsely made is not a forgery. State v. Rhine, 84 Iowa, 169.

In Reed v. State, 28 Ind. 396, it was held that an indictment for the forgery of a certificate purporting to be signed by the proper officer certifying that a certain person is entitled to a bounty, is not good, where the payment of such a bounty would going definition of forgery curtails the elements necessary to be present in order to constitute the offense, as contradistinguished from forgery recognized by various writers upon criminal law. Under our statute we hold burglary to be an entry into a building with intent to commit larceny; and, upon the same lines, it might be held that forging a writing with intent to defraud another is forgery; and, indeed, it is apparent that the character of the writing is quite insignificant, when placed in the balances opposite the other element,—the intent to defraud. But we will take broader ground, and concede the essential ingredients of the crime of forgery to be (1) a false making of some instrument; (2) a fraudulent intent; (3)

if genuine, the writing might injure another. The third element stated is expressly recognized by this court to be the true test as to the nature of the writing. People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 514; People v. Tomlinson, 35 Cal. 506; Ex parte Finley, 66 Cal. 263.

There is some general language in the Tomlinson Case, taken very probably from People v. Shall, 9 Cow. 784, to the effect that the writing, if genuine, must be sufficient to form the basis of a legal liability; but such is not the true test, in our opinion. The requirements of the statute demand no such construction, and its adoption would result in the escape from justice of many criminals.

Appellant's counsel has cited many cases to be illegal and no extrinsic facts are alleged showing the fraudulent tendency of the certificate.

A release of all claims from a creditor to a debtor made after the debtor has transferred all his effects to an assignee in bankruptcy, is not a subject of forgery. Barnum v. State, 15 Ohio, 717, 45 Am. Dec. 601.

And an altered instrument between a debtor and creditor, made several months after a transfer by the debtor to a trustee, under the bankrupt law, could prejudice no one's rights, and is not therefore a subject of forgery. Ibid.

After an order for the delivery of goods has been satisfied and returned to the drawer an alteration of the date thereof by the drawer is not forgery. People v. Fitch, 1 Wend. 193, 19 Am. Dec. 447.

Having in one's possession a forged coupon attached to the bonds of a railroad company, which bond is unsigned, is not within the statute relating to forgery, the coupons being invalid because of the imperfect character of the bonds, to which they are attached. People v. Martin, 36 Hun, 462.

A writing addressed to another as follows: "Martin Baysinger says, let Willy Anderson have $10 worth of goods and he will stand for it," is invalid for any purpose and not a subject of forgery. Anderson v. State, 20 Tex. App. 595.

In State v. Corley, 4 Bart. 410, it was held that an entry made on an execution docket satisfying the same as to the claim of a witness made without authority, is not a forgery as there could be no satisfaction of the judgment by the entry without the consent of the person to whom they were due.

4. Efficacy which is apparent only.

It is not necessary that an instrument shall have actual legal efficacy in order to be a subject of forgery: it is sufficient that if genuine it might apparently have such efficacy, or serve as the foundation of a legal liability. State v. Johnson, 26 Iowa, 407, 96 Am. Dec. 158; Rudicel v. State, 111 Ind. 505.

It is only where the instrument appears as matter of law to be void that the accused can escape. Rudicel v. State, supra.

A false instrument which is good upon its face is a subject of forgery, though inquiry into extrinsic facts would show it to be invalid. State v. Hilton, 35 Kan. 338; State v. Pierce, 3 Iowa, 231.

Thus a check on a bank may be a forgery though the supposed drawer never kept funds in that bank. Rex v. Crowther, 5 Car. & P. 316.

As to checks drawn upon banks in which there are no funds to meet them, see also infra, under head of Apparent capacity or authority to make.

So, a bank note may be the subject of forgery, though it purports to have been signed by one who never had been the president of the bank, and countersigned by one who had never been the cashier. United States v. Turner, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 32, 3 L. ed. 632.

So also a bank note dated at a time when the bank remained in existence, is a subject of forgery, although at the time of passing the note the charter had expired. Buckland v. Com. 8 Leigh, 732; White v. Com. 4 Binn. 418.

Likewise a bank note may be a forgery, though the bank has never issued a note of that amount and description. State v. Carr, 5 N. H. 367; State v. Fitzsimmons, 30 Mo. 236.

In order to constitute forgery, the name forged need not be that of a person then existing. Riley's Case, 5 City Hall Rec. 87.

And the making of a false check in the name of another constitutes the crime of forgery even though the person whose name was signed to it was dead at the time it was signed. Brewer v. State, 32 Tex. Crim. Rep. 74; Billings v. State, 107 Ind. 54, 57 Am. Dec. 77.

And a deed which is valid upon its face is a subject of forgery although the person by whom it purports to have been executed is dead. Henderson v. State, 14 Tex. 503.

So a bill may be a subject of forgery though the person purporting to have made it still lives. Rex v. Coogan, 2 East, P. C. 943, 1 Leach, C. C. 443, 449; Rex v. Sterling, 2 East, P. C. 950, 1 Leach, C. C. 90.

A will which is valid upon its face, purporting to give and bequeath an estate to a stranger, is a subject of forgery whether or not the testator had any estate and whether or not his wife occupied such a relation toward him as that the bequest of property to a third person would result in her injury. People v. Todd, 77 Cal. 484.

A marriage certificate may be the subject of a forgery, though no such marriage as that certified to ever took place. State v. Boasso, 38 Ia. Ann. 202.

And a certified copy of a decree of divorce is a subject of forgery, though it does not appear that the parties thereto were ever married, and its fitness for fraudulent use appears upon its face, rendering the averment of extrinsic facts unnecessary. Ex parte Finley, 66 Cal. 263.

If the apparent validity of a conveyance of land alleged to be forged is such that the person alleged to be defrauded may be disturbed in his possession, it is a subject of forgery, though he could not be evicted. Rex v. Crooke, 2 East, P. C. 921, 3 Leach, C. C. 703, 2 Strange, 901.

And a mortgage purporting to have been signed by the owner is a subject of forgery, though there is a homestead declaration on the property covered thereby, and whether or not as a matter of law the mortgage is good without execution by both husband and wife. People v. Baker, 100 Cal. 183.

An order for the payment of a seaman's prize money for services may be the subject of a forgery, though the statute provides that no such order made by a seaman discharged from service within seven miles from the port where his wages are payable shall be valid, where the order pur-the effect that a contract against public policy is illegal and void, and has no standing in courts. He has also cited cases to the effect that a void contract cannot be the subject of forgery. But he has cited no case to the effect that a contract against public policy is not the subject of forgery, and, after diligent examination of authorities, we have failed to find a case to that point, and this court is not willing to be the first judicial body to declare such a doctrine. It would serve no useful purpose to review in detail the cases cited by counsel holding that void contracts are not the subject of forgery. Many of them are cases of nudum pactum, and others follow the very extreme doctrine laid down in People v. Shall, supra, where the learned judge said: "I agree that a man ignorant of the technical requirements of a special agreement might be imposed upon by the paper in question. This remark probably embraces a majority of the community in which we live, and most likely the very parties named in the false instrument. In this view, no doubt, the deed of which the defendant stands convicted involves all the moral guilt of forgery. He believed that he had succeeded in fabricating what purported to be a valid promissory note. But legal forgery cannot be made out by imputing a possible, or even actual, ignorance of the law to the ports upon its face to have been made beyond the limited distance. Rex v. Mackintosh, 2 East, P. C. 942, 956, 2 Leach, C. C. 883.

And a power of attorney to receive a seaman's wages, purporting to have been made in the name of his child, may be a subject of forgery though it appears that the seaman died childless. Lewis's Case, Fost. 116, 2 East, P. C. 957.

An undertaker's affidavit and a clergyman's certificate of death issued for the purpose of obtaining insurance upon the life of the deceased, drawn up in the form required by statute, the invalidity of which can only be ascertained by reference to other instruments, are subjects of forgery, though they are actually attached to the instruments showing their falsity and invalidity. State v. Hilton, 35 Kan. 383.

A debtor who makes a pretended discharge from his creditor whereby he obtains his discharge from jail, where he was confined, is guilty of forgery although the attachment under which he was held was not for the payment of money and the discharge was therefore a mere nullity and no warrant to the sheriff for the release. Rex v. Fawcett, 2 East, P. C. 862.

Where the instrument upon which the alleged forgery is predicated is valid upon its face, it is not necessary to allege the existence of facts, the existence of which is assumed in the instrument. People v. Bibby, 91 Cal. 470.

Thus it is not necessary to allege in an indictment for the forgery of a deed that the instrument would have conveyed the land if genuine, it is sufficient to charge that it purported to convey the alleged grantor's right, title, and interest. State v. Fisher, 65 Mo. 437.

And in Horton v. State, 32 Tex. 79, it was held to be unnecessary to state facts in an indictment showing the manner in which a false instrument would, if true, create, increase, or discharge a pecuniary liability, these being deductions of law.

So, an indictment for forging a paper purporting to have been made by an agent in the name of his principal, need not allege the authority of the agent even though if the agent had no authority to draw the paper, the principal might not be injured by it. Cross v. People, 47 Ill. 152, 35 Am. Dec. 474.

And the legal existence of a bank, the notes of which are claimed to have been forged, need not be alleged in the indictment for the forgery, or proved on the trial thereof. Hobbs v. State, 9 Mo. 845; People v. Ah Sam, 41 Cal. 645; Com. v. Carey, 2 Pick. 47; State v. Harden, 15 N. H. 355; State v. Van Hart, 17 N. J. L. 327; People v. Peabody, 25 Wend. 472; Sasser v. State, 13 Ohio, 453.

It is enough if the forged instrument purports to have been issued by a corporation or company duly authorized for that purpose. People v. Peabody, supra.

that an indictment for forging an order purporting to have been drawn by the cashier of one bank upon the cashier of another directing him to deliver the plates of the first bank to certain persons and receive them again on deposit, need not show that the bank, to the cashier of which the order purported to have been directed, has any legal existence.

So, an indictment charging the forgery of an indorsement on the back of a draft purporting to have been drawn by one bank upon another, is good without proof of the existence of either bank. State v. Pierce, 8 Iowa, 231.

In Com. v. Smith, 6 Serg. & R. 563, it was held that it is not necessary to prove the existence of a bank whose bills have been alleged to have been forged, unless the indictment alleges its incorporation.

Where the offense is alleged to defraud the bank by which the notes purported to have been issued, however, it must be shown to be a real body capable of being defrauded. People v. Peabody, supra; De Bow v. People, Denton, 9; Com. v. Smith, supra.

The words of the statute of Virginia and West Virginia, "to the prejudice of another's right," need not be inserted in the indictment; they are descriptive of the subject of the forgery, and not of the crime. If the instrument itself be such that it may prejudice another's right it is enough. State v. Tingler, 33 W. Va. 546; Powell v. Com. 11 Gratt. 822.

a. Must be sufficient to deceive.

It is not necessary that an instrument should be perfect in order to be a forgery; it is sufficient if it bears such a resemblance to the document it is intended to represent as is calculated to deceive. State v. Ferguson, 35 La. Ann. 1042.

And an indictment for forgery must show that the instrument alleged to have been forged is one having some legal effect, but it need not be shown to be a perfect instrument. Garmire v. Indiana, 104 Ind. 444.

The false making of any instrument whereby another may be injured is forgery, even though it be of such a character that it would not be effectual if genuine, providing its defects are not so open and palpable that one could be deceived without being grossly negligent. Com. v. Linton, 2 Va. Cas. 476.

It is not necessary that a forged instrument should be an exact resemblance of one that is genuine. It is sufficient if it be fit prima facie to pass for true. State v. Dourden, 13 N. C. 443.

Or sufficient to deceive men of ordinary business capacity. Peete v. State, 2 Lea, 53; Hess v. State, 5 Ohio, 5, 22 Am. Dec. 787.

In order to constitute forgery it is not necessary that there should be so perfect a resemblance to the handwriting of the party whose name is forged as would impose on persons having parperson intended to be defrauded. However dark may be the moral hue of a transaction, courts of justice can only act upon legal crime,—upon criminal breaches of perfect legal obligation." It is sufficient to say that this language carries the principle to limits which we cannot follow. The more liberal doctrine, and the doctrine which, in the interest of good government, should be sustained, is declared in People v. Krummer, 4 Park. Crim. Rep. 219, where the court says: "We are never called upon to determine whether, in legal construction, the false instrument or writing is an instrument of a particular name or character. It is a matter of perfect indifference whether it possesses or not the legal requisites of a bill of exchange, or an order for the payment of money or the delivery of property. The question is whether, upon its face, it will have the effect to defraud those who may act upon it as genuine, or the person in whose name it is forged. It is not essential that the person in whose name it purports to be made should have the legal capacity to make it, nor that the person to whom it is directed should be bound to act upon it, if genuine, or have a remedy over." There is no question that a writing which is a nudum pactum is not the subject of forgery; but a contract which a court will not enforce, or even recognize, because it is against the policy secular knowledge thereof. Com. v. Stephenson, 11 Cush. 81, 50 Am. Dec. 154.

A note or order upon a bank which is not obligatory upon the bank on which it is drawn, may be a subject of forgery, if it is calculated to impose upon and deceive persons of common observation. United States v. Mitchell, 1 Baldw. C. C. 386; Hess v. State, supra.

A certificate upon a deed of trust falsely made in the name of the recorder is a forgery though the year when the deed was deposited for record is not stated in it. State v. Tompkins, 71 Mo. 613.

A false and fraudulent lease of lands known as "Jawick" in which they are described as "Jawick Park" when made in the name of another is a forgery. Rex v. Crooke, 2 Strange, 901.

But in Rudicel v. State, 111 Ind. 595, it was held that an instrument signed, "Bill Stevens," when the name of a person whose name was alleged to have been forged was "William L. Stephens" is not such as would deceive any one and is not therefore a subject of forgery.

An order for the delivery of goods will sustain a prosecution for forgery against the person presenting it, although a different person is named as payee, and there is no indorsement or order to deliver to another. State v. Morgan, 35 La. Ann. 283.

b. Must be a subject of legal proceedings.

An instrument to be a subject of forgery need not be one upon which, if genuine, an action might be maintained. It is sufficient if it is one which could be used as proof either against the person whose act it purports to be or against any other person. State v. Boasso, 38 La. Ann. 202; State v. Johnson, 25 Iowa, 407, 26 Am. Dec. 153.

It must be one upon which an action could be maintained without recurring to extrinsic evidence to support it. Conner's Case, 3 City Hall Rec. 59.

If the instrument claimed to be a forgery is the subject of legal proceedings in which a judgment might be lawfully recovered against the maker thereof on default, he may be injured thereby, and the instrument may be the subject of a forgery. People v. Fadner, 10 Abb. N. C. 462.

It is not necessary that an instrument be enforceable to make it the subject of forgery; it is sufficient if it may be the basis of an action, or if it be of such a character that it may defraud or injuriously affect the rights of another. State v. Dunn, 23 Or. 562.

A certificate of a justice of the counting of the scalps of certain wild animals for which a bounty is offered, which is to be received as legal proof of such counting, is an instrument which if genuine would be received as legal proof of liability and is therefore a subject of forgery. State v. Johnson, supra.

The forging of an instrument which would not be proof in any legal proceeding however, cannot be made a subject of indictment without the aid of § 4 L. R. A.

extrinsic evidence. Anderson v. State, 20 Tex. App. 593.

Thus in State v. Anderson, 30 La. Ann. 557, a consolidated statement of the votes of a parish which is not made evidence of the result of the election and which was not required to be preserved among the archives of the parish, and which the officers are not required to use, was treated argumentatively as not a subject of forgery, but the decision turned upon other questions.

So a certificate that a colored person was free-born, and of good behavior, would not be evidence of the facts which it recites and therefore would not be a subject of forgery. State v. Smith, 8 Yerg. 150.

In Arnold v. Cost, 3 Gill & J. 219, 23 Am. Dec. 302, however, which is a leading case in the law of forgery, a certificate made in the name of a master of a slave, stating that the slave had been made free, was held to be a subject of forgery, inasmuch as if it had been genuine it might have subjected the master to damages for the loss of the slave.

A probate judge's memoranda book which is not required to be kept by law, used by him for his own convenience, is not a subject of forgery within a statute with reference to the forgery of public records. Downing v. Brown, 3 Colo. 571.

The defense of usury is available only upon plea. Usury is not a sufficient defense to a indictment for forgery therefore, even if the instrument claimed to have been forged is usurious upon its face. People v. Fadner, 10 Abb. N. C. 462.

So where the alleged invalidity of an instrument arises from the fact that it is subject to the bar of the statute of limitations, it is nevertheless a subject of forgery, the statute of limitations affecting the remedy and not the right. State v. Dunn, 23 Or. 562.

c. Apparent capacity or authority to make.

When the order which is alleged to be a forgery purports upon its face to have been made by one having authority to make it, it is a subject of forgery though such authority did not actually exist. Rex v. Clinoh, 2 East, P. C. 933, 1 Leach, C. C. 540; Williams v. State, 61 Ala. 33.

But under the earlier decisions, if the instrument purported to have been made by one who had no previous interest in the subject-matter, it was not a subject of forgery. Rex v. Williams, 2 East, P. C. 937, 1 Leach, C. C. 114; Reg. v. Roberts, 2 Russell on Crimes, 8th Am. ed. 522.

And the terms "warrant or order," used in a statute with reference to the forgery thereof, were held to import that the person giving it had or claimed an interest in the money or goods which were the subject-matter thereof, or had or assumed to have a disposing power over them. Rex v. Mitchell, 2 East, P. C. 936.

Thus in Rex v. Mitchell, supra, it was held that a note directed to a shopkeeper desiring him to let a prisoner have certain goods which he of the law, cannot be termed a "nudum pactum." A forged contract, even though it covers a subject-matter which makes it void as against public policy, upon its face may present such an appearance that, if genuine, it might injure another, and thus it satisfies the test which we have laid down. The contract may be such that there would not only be a possibility of its injuring another, but a very strong probability of such injury; for there are many contracts against public policy which, upon their face, present a most innocent and most inviting appearance. Even though a contract presented to a court of justice would be declared void as against public policy, yet aside from that fact it may have a pecuniary value to its owner. It could have such a value as that the theft of it would be the subject of larceny; and it would be anomalous to hold an instrument the subject of larceny, and yet its counterfeit not of sufficient value to form the basis of a charge of forgery. If the stealing of the genuine instrument would be larceny, surely the false making of such an instrument would be forgery. To declare the law to be that all contracts which are not enforceable, because against the policy of the law, are not the subject of forgery, would be offering a carte blanche to the professional forger, of which he would not be slow to take advantage; would see paid for, purporting to have been written by an overseer of the poor, was not a subject of forgery.

And in Walton v. State, 6 Yerg. 377, an order in the name of another to let a person named therein have a thirty-five dollar watch, was held not to be a forgery, it not having been shown that the drawer of the order had any interest in the subject-matter of the order.

And the same rule was applied to a note to a tradesman requesting him to let the bearer have certain goods in which the apparent writer had no interest, in Rex v. Williams, supra.

Reg. v. Roberts, supra, however, was distinguished in People v. Way, 10 Cal. 386, upon the ground that it turned upon the technical meaning of the word "order" used in describing the forged instrument.

And Walton v. State, supra, was overruled in Hale v. State, 1 Coldw. 167, 78 Am. Dec. 488, holding a somewhat similar order to be a forgery, the court referring to the grounds of decision in that case as an artificial, technical, and unmeaning distinction. It will be observed, however, that the order in the latter case contained a direction to charge to the drawer, not contained in the former case.

So, in People v. Thompson, 2 Johns. Cas. 342, it was said that the former rule was that an order within the statute concerning forgeries must be one importing a right on the part of the person who is supposed to have made it, and a duty on the part of the person on whom it is made, but by a subsequent statute in New York the act is extended to orders purporting to be made without as well as with right or authority in the person whose name may be forged.

And the rule would now seem to be general that to constitute a forgery it is not necessary that the person by whom it purports to be made should have the legal capacity to make it, nor that the person to whom it is addressed should be bound to act upon it, if genuine, or be entitled to a remedy if he so acted. People v. Krummer, 4 Park. Crim. Rep. 217.

And that a written request to deliver goods may be a subject of forgery though the person by whom it purports to have been made has no authority over or interest in them. Rex v. Thomas, 2 Moody, C. C. 15, 7 Car. & P. 861.

Or whether the supposed drawer of the order had goods in the hands of the drawee or not. Com. v. Fisher, 17 Mass. 46; People v. Way, supra.

Thus the fact that the person in whose name a forged check is drawn had no funds in the bank at the time, is no defense to a prosecution for the forgery thereof. Thompson v. State, 49 Ala. 16; Hoskins v. State, 11 Ga. 92; Rex v. Crowther, 5 Car. & P. 316. And supra under heading, Validity which is apparent only.

So, a certificate of indebtedness of a city is a subject of forgery under a statute with reference to §4 L. R. A.

forging any pecuniary demand or obligation, although the city itself is not authorized to issue such certificates. State v. Eades, 68 Mo. 150, 30 Am. Rep. 780.

And change tickets purporting to have been issued by a corporation are subjects of forgery, though the corporation has no power to issue them and though their issue is prohibited by law. Van Horne v. State, 5 Ark. 340.

So, a protection falsely made in the name of another with intent to defraud is forgery though the person by whom it purports to have been made is not a member of parliament and therefore had no power to grant it. Rex v. Deakins, 1 Sid. 142.

An order for the delivery of goods, made in the name of another with fraudulent intent, is a forgery though the person purporting to have made the order is a married woman who could not legally enter into such a contract. Heath's Case, 3 City Hall Rec. 54; Wilcoxon v. State, 60 Ga. 184.

And a request for the delivery of goods, addressed to a married woman in her maiden name, may be a subject of forgery when falsely made in the name of another with intent to defraud her husband. Rex v. Carter, 7 Car. & P. 134.

Cases in which the want of authority results from legal incapacity, however, seem to differ but little from these in which the rule is adopted, that instruments the invalidity of which arises from matter of law cannot be subjects of forgery. See supra, under headings, Instruments void upon their faces, and Efficacy which is apparent only.

And in Raymond v. People, 2 Colo. App. 829, the above doctrine as announced in State v. Eades, supra, was criticised, the court saying that that was the only case which it had found which asserted the doctrine that an instrument void upon its face might be a subject of forgery.

6. Real efficacy not apparent.

The general rule that if the instrument is void on its face, it is not the subject of forgery, is subject to the limitation that when the instrument does not appear to have any legal validity or show that another might be injured by it, but extrinsic facts exist by which the holder thereof might be enabled to defraud another, the offense is complete, and an indictment averring the extrinsic facts disclosing its capacity to deceive will be supported. Rembert v. State, 53 Ala. 467, 22 Am. Dec. 639.

Thus, an order for the payment of money, not addressed to any one, may be a subject of forgery when the omission of the name of the person upon whom it is drawn is alleged in the indictment and supplied by proof. Powers v. State, 87 Ind. 97.

And a written instrument purporting to be an order drawn by one person upon another to send money to the person in whose favor it runs, may be the subject of forgery though it specifies no particular amount, where the person to whom it is directed has money in his hands belonging to the

and hereafter he would confine himself to the manufacture of spurious paper in the nature of contracts against public policy, for he would thereby be enabled to make a very respectable living,—respectable as to the size of his income, and respectable in that such acts would be no crime.

Contracts against public policy cover a multitude of subjects, and in many cases the determination of their character in this regard calls for the exercise of the nicest discrimination from the most learned judges. From the face of the contract itself, courts will disagree as to its validity or invalidity. All things which are opposed to moral precepts may be said to be against public policy, and thus we have a great and uncertain field opened up before us. Contracts pertaining to restraint of trade and competition in business have been entered into by parties in the utmost good faith, believing that they were making valid contracts, and upon considerations of the gravest character; and still those contracts subsequently have been declared to be invalid as against public policy. It cannot be contended for a moment that such contracts could not be forged. Suppose a contract contained a covenant on the part of a competing dealer that he would not again engage in business within the state of California. Thus we have a covenant person whose name is signed to it. Wright v. State, 79 Ala. 262.

Where the legal force of a writing is not apparent on its face, and its capacity to effect a fraud arises from extrinsic facts, such facts must be averred with such certainty as to make it judicially apparent that the instrument is the subject of forgery. Fomby v. State, 87 Ala. 88; King v. State, 31 Tex. App. 567.

An indictment for forgery must show that the instrument of which the forgery is predicated is such on its face as is naturally calculated to have some effect, or if that be not the case then extrinsic matter must be averred so that the court may judicially see its fraudulent tendency. State v. Cook, 22 Ind. 574; Reed v. State, 28 Ind. 896; People v. Tomlinson, 35 Cal. 508; State v. Anderson, 30 La. Ann. 557; Com. v. Mulholland, 5 W. N. C. 208; Clarke v. State, 8 Ohio St. 635; State v. Dunn, 23 Or. 562; People v. Savage, 5 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 543; State v. Briggs, 34 Vt. 501.

And where the statute prohibits the forgery of any writing to the prejudice of another's right, it must sufficiently appear from a description of the writing alleged to have been formed that it is prejudicial to such a right. Terry v. Com. 87 Va. 672.

Thus an indictment for the forgery of an order drawn in the name of an agent upon his principal, should aver the agency and that the agent had authority to draw on his principal in order to show the capacity of the false order to defraud. State v. Thorn, 66 N. C. 644.

So where an instrument claimed to be a receipt alleged to have been forged does not appear on its face to be a receipt extrinsic facts must be averred in the indictment, showing that the instrument if genuine would operate as a receipt. Henry v. State, 35 Ohio St. 128.

And in Kice v. State, 1 Yerg. 422, it was held that an indictment for the forgery of a receipt must show that the person to whom the receipt was given was indebted to the person whose name was forged.

In State v. Weaver, 94 N. C. 337, 55 Am. Rep. 647, it was held that an indictment charging the forgery of a railroad pass is not sufficient unless it also alleges that the person whose name is subscribed to it was the agent of the railroad company having authority to issue such a pass for a consideration.

4. Instruments requiring further steps to perfect them.

An instrument may be a subject of forgery although if it were genuine other steps must have been taken before the instrument is perfected, which steps had not been taken. Costley v. State, 14 Tex. App. 156; People v. Bibby, 91 Cal. 470; Com. v. Costello, 120 Mass. 367.

Thus, an order of the trustees of a school district upon the county superintendent of schools for a requisition for a warrant against the county school fund, is a subject of forgery, although not accompanied by a bill of items, notwithstanding a statutory requirement that no requisition shall be drawn upon the order of the the board of trustees against the county fund of any district, except in certain cases, unless such order is accompanied by an itemized bill showing the separate items and the price of each. People v. Bibby, supra.

A bail bond valid upon its face is a subject of forgery though it has not been forfeited and no attempt has been made to forfeit it. Costley v. State, supra.

An order for the payment of money creates a pecuniary obligation and is therefore a subject of forgery though it has been neither accepted nor filed. Keeler v. State, 15 Tex. App. 111.

An insurance agent who makes out and sends in an application for insurance and two promissory notes purporting to have been signed by one desiring to be insured, with intent to secure commissions therefor, is guilty of forgery, notwithstanding the fact that the application was not accepted and the notes never became obligations to pay money. He cannot escape conviction because his crime was detected before any one was injured thereby. State v. McMackin, 70 Iowa, 261.

5. Naked and conditional promises.

It is not necessary that the subject of forgery be shown to be a complete executory contract. A theatre ticket may be a subject of forgery even though it contains no promise or contract and no consideration is expressed in it. Re Benson, 24 Fed. Rep. 649.

So a railway ticket, though not a subject of forgery under the Massachusetts statute, is one at common law. Though it is wanting in detail of language stating the nature and extent of the contract, it sufficiently indicates a promise or obligation to render it an instrument of value, by the false making of which others would be prejudiced. Com. v. Ray, 8 Gray, 441.

A mere promise to pay, expressing no consideration and which is not connected with a consideration by the averments of the indictment, however, will not sustain a prosecution for forgery. People v. Shall, 9 Cow. 773.

The false making in the name of another of an acceptance of a conditional order for goods, payable when the payee shall have completed the performance of certain work, is a forgery at common law. Com. v. Ayer, 3 Cush. 150.

A certificate obligating a state to pay a certain sum on account of services in the militia after the claim for such services had been presented to the United States government, and the amount allowed had been paid by it to the state, is an evidence of an engagement for the payment of money upon a contingency, and is a subject of forgery, the fact that the contingency was a remote one not excusing it from the operation of the statute. People v. Brie, 43 Hun, 317.

Contracts for the payment of money upon a sale of property if delivered at a certain time or upon clearly void under our code, as being in restraint of trade; yet we think such a contract is the subject of forgery. Certainly, that character of instrument might be well calculated to defraud the tradesman still remaining in business. He might be willing to pay large sums of money for that agreement, well knowing at the time that he could not enforce it in law, but knowing his man, and believing the covenants would be considered binding by the party making them, and that no attempt would ever be made to evade them. Such an agreement is of full value until denied. It answers every purpose of its creation until that time, and perchance it may never be denied. The foregoing principle is fully illustrated in Com. v. Pease, 16 Mass. 91. The defendant was charged with theftbote, defined by Blackstone as where a party robbed not only knows the felon, but also takes his goods again, or "other amends," upon agreement not to prosecute. The offense is here recognized as compounding a felony. The question in that case was, Would a promissory note of the defendant satisfy the term "other amends?" Parker, Ch. J., said: "It is argued that it will not, because such a note will be void in law, and in fact nothing may ever be received; but there seems a contingency which may never happen, however, are not subjects of forgery within a statute with relation to the forgery of notes, bills, or checks or other instruments in writing for the payment of money, the words "other instruments," referring only to such as are of the same class or kind as those enumerated. Shirk v. People, 121 Ill. 61.

8. Instruments not in statutory form.

Where a statute authorizes an instrument not known to the common law and so prescribes its form as to render any other form null, forgery cannot be committed by making a false instrument in a form not provided by the statute even though it is so like the genuine as to be liable to deceive most persons. Cunningham v. People, 4 Hun, 455; Faulkner's Case, 3 City Hall Rec. 65.

Thus a magistrate's order for the payment of money, under hand only, is not a subject of forgery when the statute requires the order to be under hand and seal. Rex v. Rushworth, Russ. & R. C. C. 317, 1 Stark. 396.

And the false making of a bill of the paper medium of a state with the names of two commissioners signed to it is not a forgery, where the statute expressly requires the signature of three commissioners. State v. Jones, 1 Bay, 207; State v. Gutridge, Id. 235.

So a prosecution bond in a divorce case under the North Carolina statute providing for such a bond where the wife sues by her next friend, given by the husband directly to the wife, is binding upon one and is not therefore a subject of forgery. State v. Lytle, 64 N. C. 255.

When a mandatory statute prescribes that warrants drawn on the city treasurer shall show the purposes for which they are issued, a warrant omitting the statement thus required is void upon its face and not the subject of a forgery. Raymond v. People, 2 Colo. App. 329.

A will will be presumed to convey a freehold if there is nothing to show that a mere chattel interest is involved, and such an instrument cannot be a forgery when signed by only two witnesses where three witnesses are required to a will of land. Wall's Case, 2 East, P. C. 953.

A deed may be a subject of forgery though it does not conform to a statutory form prescribed therefor, however, where the provisions of the statute are directory and not mandatory. Rex v. Lyons, Russ. & R. C. C. 255.

In Reg. v. McConnell, 1 Car. & K. 371, 2 Moody, C. C. 290, it was held that a pass of a discharged prisoner may be a subject of forgery, though it is not in the precise form given by the statute, and though it is not sealed with the county seal or any other seal provided for that purpose.

9. Prohibited instruments.

An instrument may be a subject of forgery though its issuance or transfer is prohibited by law, if it is not thereby rendered totally void or if its capacity for valuable use for any purpose is not totally destroyed.

Thus in Butler v. Com. 13 Serg. & R. 237, 14 Am. Dec. 679, it was held to be an indictable offense to utter and publish counterfeit notes of a private unauthorized banker, though the legislature has prohibited the issuing of such notes, but permitted suits to be maintained upon them.

So an instrument which appears upon its face to have been issued with the intent to circulate as money, is a subject of forgery though its issue is prohibited under heavy penalties both civil and criminal. Nelson v. State, 32 Ala. 44.

So also where an act prohibiting the circulation of certain foreign bank bills leaves their validity unimpaired as against the makers thereof, they retain their value without the state and are subjects of forgery. Thompson v. State, 9 Ohio St. 354.

In State v. Van Hart, 17 N. J. L. 327, it was held to be an indictable offense to publish a forged bank note of another state, although the passing of such a note is prohibited by law, if the statute does not forbid the receipt of such notes or render them void in the hands of a receiver.

The fraudulent indorsement of a certificate of municipal indebtedness in the name of another is forgery, although upon its face it purports to be transferable only at the mayor's office in person or by attorney, the restriction upon its transferability being for the protection of the corporation. Bishop v. State, 55 Md. 138.

Where all persons are prohibited from giving or receiving certain bills of other states in payment of any debt or demand whatsoever, or in any way attempting to offer or circulate any such bills however, it is not forgery to utter and publish them. People v. Wilson, 6 Johns. 320.

A bill of exchange is not a subject of forgery where the statute prescribes that all such bills shall be absolutely void except upon certain conditions, where the conditions are not complied with. Rex v. Moffat, 2 East, P. C. 954, 1 Leach, C. C. 431.

Where it is made a penal offense to pass or to receive any bank bill of a less denomination than $5 of any bank incorporated under the laws of another state, the making, uttering, or passing such a bill is not forgery. Guthins v. People, 21 Ill. 642.

10. Unstamped instruments.

The false making of an instrument in the name of another is forgery whether the instrument is stamped as required by law or not, the instrument being available as evidence in either event. People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507; State v. Young, 47 N. H. 402; State v. Haynes, 6 Coldw. 550; Horton v. State, 32 Tex. 79.

An indictment for the forgery of an unstamped note is good, a party having an interest in such note having the power under the stamp act to have the proper stamp affixed to it, so that it shall be as valid to all intents and purposes as if stamped to be no reason for this nice and critical construction of the words. The note, although voidable, is in fact of value to the holder until it is avoided. It may never be disputed."

Obligations ultra vires stand upon the same level with contracts against public policy as to the offense of forgery. If one is not the subject of forgery, neither is the other. In England, corporations are created by special acts of parliament. Within those acts are found the measures of their powers. In this country, the general statutes, in connection with the articles of incorporation, which are public records, form the limitation of their powers. Thus the world deals with corporations with a knowledge of the extent of their powers, and ignorance of the law forms no defense to the plea of ultra vires. If this appellant's position be sound, all contracts of corporations which are ultra vires are not the subject of forgery. Neither would bonds of municipal corporations which are ultra vires form the foundation for a prosecution for forgery. The determination of the powers of corporations, both private and municipal, is a question often involving the most complex when made. State v. Mott, 16 Minn. 472, 10 Am. Rep. 132.

The act of congress requiring stamps to be placed on certain instruments was intended for revenue purposes only and not to interfere with the criminal laws of the state. Cross v. People, 47 Ill. 152, 35 Am. Dec. 474.

This doctrine was applied to an unstamped bank check, in Cross v. People, supra, and in Laird v. State, 61 Md. 309.

And to an unstamped note, in State v. Mott, supra.

An indictment for the forgery of instruments required to be stamped need not allege the stamping, as such an instrument might be made complete by being subsequently stamped. State v. Haynes and Cross v. People, supra; State v. Hill, 80 Wis. 416; Rex v. Hawkeswood, 2 East, P. C. 955, 1 Leach, C. C. 57.

So the English stamp act is only a revenue law and does not alter the law of forgery, and a bill of exchange may be a subject of forgery though not stamped as required by that act. Rex v. Hawkeswood, supra; Rex v. Morton, 2 East, P. C. 955, 1 Leach, C. C. 558.

In Rex v. Morton, supra, it was held that forgery may be committed of an instrument on unstamped paper though the statute provides that a stamp shall not be afterwards affixed.

In John v. State, 23 Wia. 504, it was held that an unstamped draft is void on its face under the stamp act, and that an indictment for the forgery of a draft, which does not allege that it is stamped, is insufficient.

But John v. State, supra, was overruled in State v. Hill, supra, holding that an unstamped instrument, which the act of congress requires to be stamped, is not void because of the absence of the stamp, unless it shall be made to appear that the stamp was fraudulently omitted, and that an indictment for the forgery thereof is not bad by reason of the omission to aver that the instrument was stamped.

II. Instruments executed in fictitious name.

It is immaterial that the person whose name is claimed to have been forged is a fictitious instead of a real person, the offense being completed if the instrument has the appearance of validity on its face. State v. Hahn, 38 La. Ann. 109; State v. Givens, 5 Ala. 747; Thompson v. State, 49 Ala. 16; Com. v. Chandler, Thatcher, C. C. 187; Grant and Hopper's Case, 3 City Hall Rec. 142; Gotobed's Case, 4 City Hall Rec. 25; United States v. Mitchell, 1 Baldw. 385; Rex v. Sheppard, 1 Leach, C. C. 223, 2 East, P. C. 967, Russ. & R. C. C. 169.

And the same rule applies to the execution of an instrument in a name purporting to be that of a bank or corporation which in fact has no existence. United States v. Mitchell, supra.

Thus the execution of a promissory note in the name of a fictitious person or under an assumed name with intent to defraud is forgery. State v. Wheeler, 10 L. R. A. 779, 20 Or. 190.

So is such an execution of a bill of exchange. Rex v. Wilks, 2 East, P. C. 957.

And it is forgery for a stranger to indorse a fictitious name upon a bill of exchange as his own. Rex v. Taft, 2 East, P. C. 959, 1 Leach, C. C. 172.

And a false and fraudulent order upon a banker for the payment of money purporting to have been made by a depositor is a forgery though made without authority or in a fictitious name. Rex v. Lockett, 2 East, P. C. 940, 1 Leach, C. C. 94.

Likewise a will fraudulently made in the name of a person who does not exist, is a forgery. Reg. v. Avery, 8 Car. & P. 596.

The writing of an acceptance of an existing person without authority or in the name of a firm of persons nonexistent in acceptance of a bill of exchange with intent to defraud is forgery. Writing the name of a fictitious firm is the same as writing that of a fictitious person. Reg. v. Rogers, 8 Car. & P. 622.

Drawing a draft upon a bank in a fictitious name with a fraudulent purpose is forgery, though the person making it gets credit personally instead of upon the draft. Rex v. Dunn, 2 East, P. C. 967, 1 Leach, C. C. 57.

When a bank account is opened in a fictitious name and the depositor makes an overdraft the checks by which the overdraft is effected are forgeries. Johnson's Case, 3 Haz. U. S. Reg. 819.

A letter signed with a fictitious name purporting to have been written by an agent of a creditor addressed to a justice of the peace directing the institution of suits against a debtor, is a subject of forgery. Com. v. Hawks, Lewis, Crim. L. 323.

A paper purporting to be the order of a magistrate on the treasurer of a county for reimbursement of the expenses incurred in the burial of a dead body cast ashore, if falsely made, is a forgery, though there is no such magistrate as the one mentioned in the paper, and though the person who buried the body is not stated in the paper to be a parish officer. Rex v. Froud, 1 Brod. & B. 300.

In order to support a charge of forgery by the use of a fictitious name, however, it must be made to appear that the fictitious name was assumed for that particular purpose. Doing business generally under an assumed name is not forgery though done for the purpose of concealment and fraud. Rex v. Bontien, Russ. & R. C. C. 260.

And an indictment which charges the forgery of a note made in the name of an imaginary person with intent to defraud such person is not good, non-entities having no rights which can be prejudiced. State v. Givens, 5 Ala. 749; De Bow v. People, 1 Denio, 9.

In Com. v. Speer, 2 Va. Cas. 65, it was held that obtaining goods by the use of a forged note purporting to be the note of a bank which never had any existence is not an offense within an act to prevent the deceitfully obtaining goods, etc., by privy tokens or counterfeit titles, but that it is a public cheat indictable at common law. F. H. B.

principles of legal jurisprudence, and, if ultra vires contracts may not be forged, a rich field for the successful practice of fraud is presented to the forger. In State v. Eades, 68 Mo. 150, 80 Am. Rep. 780, it is said that the fraudulent making of a false municipal certificate of indebtedness is forgery, though the municipality had no power to issue such certificate; and this principle is in line with sound reason, and fully commends itself to our views. It is held that contracts made under an unconstitutional law are void. Every man is presumed to know the law, and appellant's contention would free the criminal forging such a contract. Vilhas v. Stockton & I. R. Co. 58 Cal. 208. In other words, it would be a good defense to a prosecution for forgery that the law under which a genuine contract similar to the forged one might be made is unconstitutional. Such a plea is too remote from the crime of which the accused stands charged, and his liberty must be regained on more substantial grounds. As to what contracts are against public policy, or ultra vires, or void as creations under unconstitutional statutes, we think matters entirely foreign to a prosecution for forgery. In the examination of such grave and abstruse questions, the criminal element of the case would soon be lost to view. For the purposes of the case, we conceded at the outset that this instrument would be declared void by a court as against public policy; but, if that question were a live issue in the case, this contract might be declared valid upon the ground that a teacher in the public schools is not a public officer. Certainly, the law as to that point is not so plain but that an ordinary layman, in the exercise of the greatest care, might not be defrauded in taking an assignment of a public school teacher's unearned salary.

There is a further view to be taken of this question, which is also fatal to appellant's claims, and which was incidentally touched upon in noticing the Pease Case. Aside from the nonenforceable character of this contract in a court of justice, it has an inherent, substantial value. It is said in Morton's Case, 2 East, P. C. 955, "That, though a compulsory payment by course of law could not have been enforced for want of the proper stamp, yet a man might equally be defrauded by a voluntary payment being lost to him." It cannot be said that a contract has no value because you have no standing in court to enforce it. Who can say in advance that the money will not be voluntarily paid, as agreed upon by its terms? Who can say that Helen Henry would not have lived up to the very letter of this instrument, if it had been her genuine contract? If her word is as good as it should be; if her conduct of the affairs of life is actuated by those principles of truth and justice which surely should be found in the breast of every teacher in our public schools,—then her act and deed, as evidenced by a writing such as is present in this case, would be a valuable instrument to the holder thereof; just as valuable as though it were enforceable in the courts of the land. If a genuine instrument signed by Helen Henry similar to the forged one found in this case possessed such value, the conclusion is irresistible that the forged paper was such as might defraud another. Again, if the paper had been the genuine act of Helen Henry, and upon the strength of her signature the proper officer had paid the amount it called for to Jackson, the legal holder thereof, however invalid the writing may have been as against public policy, the money would have been beyond the reach of Helen Henry forever. She could not have recovered it from the officer paying it out, or from Jackson who received it. Her mouth would be closed to assert ownership in herself. The writing would serve as a perpetual barrier to the recognition by courts of any claim upon her part; and, for this reason also, the instrument was of such value as to make it the foundation of a charge of forgery.

It is ordered that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: McFarland, J.; Patterson, J.; Harrison, J.

DeHaven, J.:

I concur in the judgment. The writing alleged to have been forged is one which, if genuine, would be void, because against public policy; but nevertheless such a writing is, in my opinion, the subject of forgery.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

Martin HOLLINGER et al., Appts.,

v.

Josiah B. REEME.

(.....Ind.....)

1. A meritorious defense must be shown in order to have relief against a judgment on the ground of fraud.
2. A judgment rendered on an unauthorized appearance by an attorney, after the defendant had by demurrer given the court jurisdiction of his person, cannot be on collateral attack declared a nullity and perpetually enjoined, but the remedy is to open up the judgment and stay proceedings thereon until a trial on the merits can be had.

3. The right to relief against a fraudulent judgment on unauthorized appearance by an attorney is not shown, where the debtor had left the case pending for four years with no one to look after it and failed to discover it for six years afterwards, making no inquiry at any time and delaying nearly a year after discovery.

NOTE.—The effect of an unauthorized appearance upon the validity of a judgment is examined at great length in a note to Williams v. Johnson 24 L. R. A.

(N. C.) 21 L. R. A. 848, and many decisions there shown to the same effect as that in the present case.

APPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Vigo County dismissing a bill filed to enjoin the collection of a judgment which had been recovered against the plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Martin Hollinger appellant in propria persona.

Messrs. McNutt & McNutt for appellee.

Dailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action by appellant, Hollinger, against the appellees, Reeme, Quackenbush, and Stout, sheriff of Vigo county, to perpetually enjoin the collection of a certain judgment, and to have the same set aside and held for naught. The complaint is as follows: "Plaintiff complaining shows the court that on the 29th day of January, 1878, these defendants, Reeme and Quackenbush, filed a complaint in this court (cause No. 9,917) against this plaintiff and one David R. Stith; that said action was upon a joint obligation purporting to be the joint obligation, not several or joint, and several promises of the said Stith and Hollinger (a copy of said complaint, pleading, and dockets and judgments are made a part hereof,—exhibits marked 'A'); that on the 10th day of March, 1880, upon the hearing and trial of said cause, judgment was rendered against said Stith and this plaintiff, Hollinger, for the sum of $1,033.33; that on March 16, 1880, the said court, after proper hearing, duly rendered judgment in said cause against said Stith as sole defendant for said sum of $1,033.33, wholly releasing this plaintiff, Hollinger, from any liability thereon, and that said judgment duly rendered against said Stith still remains in full force and effect; that on the 12th day of August, 1880, these defendants, Reeme and Quackenbush, having fully abandoned the original claim, No. 9,917, brought a separate proceeding in said court against this plaintiff, to bind him to and as a party judgment defendant with said Stith in the above-recited judgment for $1,033.33; that this last cause referred to was No. 12,127, and, after proper hearing, judgment was awarded against this plaintiff for costs of the proceeding, November 5, 1885, and the cause dismissed, and a copy of said pleadings and record is filed herewith as a part of this, marked, 'Exhibit B'; that cause No. 9,917, although fully disposed of by the court and abandoned by said Reeme and Quackenbush March 16, 1880, still remained on the docket of the court, and plaintiff, believing the same was at an end, left the state in 1881, and removed to the territory of New Mexico, and remained a nonresident of this state until 1887; that no one was authorized to represent him in said cause, or to make any agreement for him, and he had no knowledge that said suit was still pending in said court; that, as appears of record in this court, on the 8d day of November, 1885, the defendants herein, Reeme and Quackenbush, or some one in their behalf, fraudulently and without this plaintiff's knowledge or consent, caused a judgment to be entered against this plaintiff and said Stith, as by agreement, for $150 and costs for $50, and plaintiff herein says that he had been his own attorney in said cause, and had no other; there never was such an agreement made by him, or any authorized to make such, and that the entry of said judgment was a gross fraud upon him and this court, and that the court made no inquiry into the merits of said cause, and, had such cause been submitted to the court for inquiry, no judgment could have been rendered against him; that plaintiff had no knowledge that said judgment had been rendered against him until about the time of the issuing of an execution on said judgment, which was on or about 5th June, 1891. Said execution was issued by the defendants Reeme and Quackenbush to the defendant Stout, who is sheriff of this county, who is threatening to levy the same upon the property of this plaintiff in this county. Wherefore plaintiff prays the court to grant a temporary restraining order until the final hearing of this, and, upon the final hearing of this cause, to grant a perpetual injunction, and set aside and hold for naught said judgment."

Appellees demurred to appellant's complaint, which demurrer was sustained by the court and, appellant refusing to plead further, judgment was rendered in favor of appellees. The error assigned is the sustaining of such demurrer. The only question raised, therefore, is the sufficiency of appellant's complaint. Exhibit A, as suggested, is the record of the proceedings in cause No. 9,917, Vigo circuit court, and such cause is entitled "Joshua B. Reeme, Augustus L. Quackenbush vs. David R. Stith, Martin Hollinger." The complaint in said 9,917 shows that Stith and Hollinger executed a note for $800, with interest, to one Keith, who had assigned the same, before the suit was instituted, to plaintiffs, Reeme and Quackenbush. Action No. 9,917 seems to have been brought previous to February 27, 1878, for on that day it appears that defendants filed answers therein. Upon issues joined, the cause came on for trial on March 3, 1880, and the jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiffs in the sum of $1,033.33. On March 10, 1880, judgment was rendered on the record in favor of the plaintiffs, Reeme and Quackenbush, against the defendants, Stith and Hollinger. Said judgment was set aside on March 16, 1880. On June 8, 1880, the court overruled the motion of the defendants for a new trial, and rendered judgment against Stith alone. On the same day the record reads: "And comes now defendant Hollinger, and files his demurrer to plaintiff's complaint, and the court, being advised, overruled said demurrer, and the defendant excepts thereto, and is ordered to answer, and day is given." It appears the case then lay dormant until November 3, 1885, when the record shows the following entry: "Come again the parties by their attorneys aforesaid, and, this cause being at issue and coming on for trial, the same is by agreement submitted to the court, and, by agreement, the court finds for the plaintiffs, and assesses their damages at the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars ($150.)" The judgment for $150 and costs is the one which the appellant seeks to permanently enjoin and set aside. Exhibit B is an exhibit of the record in cause No. 12,127 of the Vigo circuit court. The complaint is not a part of it, having been lost, but cause 12,127 appears to have been an action to bind Hollinger by the judgment rendered in cause No. 9,917, for, upon a trial by the court, a judgment was rendered on June 8, 1881, in cause 12,127, declaring Hollinger bound by the judgment in 9,917. Such judgment was set aside, however, on January 14, 1882, and on June 7, 1882, Hollinger was granted a new trial. Cause No. 12,127 was finally disposed of as follows: "Come again the parties by their attorneys, and, by agreement of the parties, it is ordered that this cause be and the same is hereby dismissed at the cost of the defendant." It is shown by the record that causes 9,917 and 12,127 were disposed of on the same day, viz., November 3, 1885, and by the agreement of the parties acting by their attorneys. Appellant seeks relief against the judgment in cause 9,917, because of an alleged fraud in its procurement; he charges that the judgment plaintiffs, Reeme and Quackenbush, procured an attorney to appear in his behalf and fraudulently agree to the judgment.

While the demurrer to the complaint admits the truth of such allegation, it is proper to bear in mind that the action was upon a promissory note executed by Hollinger for $800, and that the appellant nowhere denies the execution of this note, nor does he deny that there was ample consideration for the same, nor does he claim that it has been paid, in whole or in part. It seems that, as a result of years of litigation, a judgment for $150 was rendered against the appellant, when the original note, executed by him on September 18, 1877, was for $800. In respect to attacks upon judgments procured by fraud, there are several well-established rules for the guidance of the courts: (1) The person seeking to set aside the judgment must show that he could not have prevented the fraudulent procurement of the judgment by the exercise of reasonable diligence; (2) that he was reasonably diligent in discovering the fraud; (3) that, having discovered the fraud, he proceeded with reasonable diligence to ask such relief as the law affords; (4) he must show that he had a meritorious defense to the action in which the fraudulent judgment was procured, and that the result will probably be different if he is allowed to open up the judgment and defend; (5) if the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties, and the fraud perpetrated was in the procurement of jurisdiction, he cannot attack such judgment collaterally, but must ask that the judgment be opened up to such an extent only as will allow him to make a meritorious defense. The appellant has not by his complaint brought himself or his defense within any of these rules. According to the allegations of the complaint, appellant appeared to the action in which the judgment was rendered (9,917), for he filed his demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled, whereupon he was ruled to answer. The filing of a demurrer to the complaint has always been recognized as a full personal appearance to the action. 1 Work, Pr. 224; Knight v. Low, 15 Ind. 375. The court, therefore, had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties, and on June 8, 1880 (the day the demurrer was filed), the action was pending in the Vigo circuit court. Appellant alleges that in 1881 he left the state, and removed to New Mexico, and remained a nonresident until 1887. He also alleges that no one was authorized to appear for him in said action. It thus appears that he deliberately left a pending action from 1881 to November 3, 1885, when the judgment was rendered, with no one looking after his interest. This makes a case of gross negligence. It is true he alleges that the cause was fully disposed of by the court and abandoned by said Reeme and Quackenbush, March 16, 1880, but it does not aver in what manner the case was disposed of, or how it had been abandoned, and Exhibit A shows that he filed a demurrer to the complaint on June 8, 1880, three months after the alleged disposition and abandonment. He also alleges that he had no knowledge that said suit was still pending; but in law it was his business to realize, and he was bound to know, it was pending after he had entered a full appearance. It is also alleged that the appellant had no knowledge of the existence of said judgment, rendered November 3, 1885, until June 5, 1891. He returned from New Mexico in 1887, but did not discover the judgment until June, 1891,—nearly six years after its rendition, and four years after his return; presumably, he had not made inquiry about the case from the time it was rendered up to June, 1891,—a period of nearly six years,—for the slightest investigation would have disclosed its existence. And, further, it does not appear that he made an inquiry about the pending action from 1881, when he left Indiana, until 1891, when he discovered the judgment. This does not constitute diligence. The existence of the judgment was made manifest to appellant June 5, 1891, and, while the record does not reveal when this action was brought, the first step taken, as shown by the record, was on Monday, May 2, 1892, nearly a year after the discovery of the judgment. "A party who seeks to have a judgment set aside for fraud practiced in obtaining the judgment must show in his application that he has a meritorious defense, which he was prevented from making; that he was guilty of no laches in failing to prevent or discover the fraud; and that he made his application for relief without delay after the discovery." Harman v. Moore, 112 Ind. 227. "The parties to an action cannot impeach the judgment rendered therein in any collateral proceeding, on the ground that it was obtained through fraud or collusion. It is their business to see that it is not thus obtained." Black, Judgm. § 291. "In order to justify a court in enjoining the enforcement of a judgment claimed to have been obtained by fraud, mistake, or accident, it is necessary for the complaint to show, in addition to the fraud or mistake relied upon, that it could not have been prevented by the use of reasonable diligence on his part, and that he has been diligent in seeking relief." Ratliff v. Stretch, 180 Ind. 285, 286. "A party who seeks the aid of a court, and asks to be relieved from a judgment obtained against him by fraud, must proceed promptly upon the discovery of the fraud." Nicholson v. Nicholson, 113 Ind. 135. Appellant did not use ordinary care to prevent the alleged fraudulent judgment, having left the case pending in 1881, with no one to look after it, until 1885, when the judgment was rendered; nor did he exercise diligence to discover it, for the slightest inquiry would have informed him of its existence, which he did not discover for six years, nor does he allege that he made any inquiry at any time. Besides, he was negligent in not bringing the action for relief after the discovery of the judgment until nearly a year after its rendition. It is always necessary, when one seeks to set aside a judgment procured by fraud, to show that there is a meritorious defense to the action in which the judgment was rendered. Black, Judgm. §§ 347-349; Harman v. Moore, supra. Not only should it be averred that there is a good defense, but the facts constituting it should be stated and verified by affidavit. Wilson Sewing Mach. Co. v. Curry, 126 Ind. 161; Goldsberry v. Carter, 28 Ind. 59, 60; Prost v. Dodge, 15 Ind. 139; Black, Judgm. § 347.

As near as the appellant comes to alleging a meritorious defense is the following: "And the court made no inquiry into the merits of said cause, and, had such cause been submitted to the court for inquiry, no judgment could have been rendered against him." This is in the nature of argument, and does not amount to an allegation that appellant had a meritorious defense in cause 9,917, wherein the judgment was rendered. He should have stated the facts showing such defense, so that the court could have seen its merits and the injustice of the alleged fraudulent judgment. The appellant does not deny that he executed the $800 note sued on in cause 9,917; he does not deny that there was a valuable and full consideration therefor; nor does he deny that it evidenced a fair and honest debt from him to the plaintiffs, Reeme and Quackenbush, the assignees of the payee, Keith; nor does he claim that any portion of the debt evidenced by said note has been paid. He wholly fails to show that he had any defense, meritorious or otherwise, in cause 9,917, in which the judgment was rendered for about one tenth of the sum represented by the principal and interest of the original note on which the recovery was had. It is clear that the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and, when the appellant demurred to the complaint, it took jurisdiction of his person. He does not claim that he did not file a demurrer to the complaint, nor does he deny the court's jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties. Therefore such jurisdiction did exist in cause 9,917, and any judgment rendered therein would not be void, however wrongful or erroneous; such judgment, not being wholly void, cannot be attacked collaterally. Exchange Bank v. Ault, 102 Ind. 322; Anderson v. Wilson, 100 Ind. 402; Lantz v. Maffett, 102 Ind. 23; Palmerton v. Hoop, 181 Ind. 28; Oully v. Shirk, 131 Ind. 79; Harman v. Moore, supra; Rogers v. Beauchamp, 103 Ind. 33; Reid v. Mitchell, 98 Ind. 469.

Where judgment is rendered through the unauthorized appearance of an attorney for the defendant, the defendant should not ask to perpetually enjoin the judgment, and have it declared a nullity, but should ask that it be opened up, and the proceedings thereon stayed, until there can be a trial on the merits. Coon v. Weiborn, 83 Ind. 232; Bush v. Bush, 46 Ind. 88, 84; Wiley v. Pratt, 23 Ind. 635, 636; Pierson v. Holman, 5 Blackf. 453. "It may be, on a proper application, showing that a judgment has been rendered by default, or for want of an answer, or an appearance by an attorney without authority, and without notice to defendant, even after judgment, the court will allow an issue to be formed, and the merits of the case tried, but the court, in order to protect the plaintiff from suffering from the act of the attorney, and at the same time save the defendant from injury, will let the judgment stand, but stay all proceedings, and let in the defendant to plead, if he has any defense." Bush v. Bush, supra. "Such must now be deemed the settled practice of the court. It will always afford adequate relief to a defendant, while at the same time it protects a plaintiff who has obtained a judgment, so far as he can be protected, from some of the injurious consequences to which he might be exposed by delay." Wiley v. Pratt, supra. "A judgment obtained by fraud is binding on the parties until set aside in some proceeding for that purpose." Palmerton v. Hoop, supra; Weiss v. Querineau, 109 Ind. 444. "These methods, however," all contemplate proceedings in the case in which the unauthorized judgment is alleged to have been obtained. They give no countenance to the notion that a judgment, however wrongfully obtained, may be ignored, and the rights of the parties again inquired into in a collateral proceeding." Weiss v. Querineau, supra. Appellant has not sought relief in the original cause No. 9,917, in which the judgment was obtained, but presents a new and collateral action, asking to have the judgment rendered therein decreed a nullity and perpetually enjoined, instead of asking permission to defend in 9,917. He has mistaken his remedy, and the court cannot lend him its aid. For the reasons stated, we are convinced that the court below did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the appellant's complaint.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

Joseph B. CARRICO

WEST VIRGINIA CENTRAL & PITTSBURGH R. CO., Plff. in Err.

(..... W. Va. ....)

1. In an action to recover damages for injury to a plaintiff's arm, necessitating amputation, it is not error to allow the plaintiff to exhibit to the jury the naked remnant of the arm.
2. The evidence of a witness given on a former trial of a civil case, who has since died, may be proven on a subsequent trial of the case.
3. The longhand notes made by the sworn stenographer who took the evidence upon a former trial of the case are the best evidence of such evidence of the dead witness, and should be used, or the nonproduction legally accounted for, on a second trial; but where those notes show that the dead witness made in his evidence an illustration merely, and do not show what that illustration was or in any way convey it to the second jury, a witness may be used to prove what such illustration was.
4. It is the absolute duty of a railroad company to keep its track free from dangerous obstructions of every sort, so that its cars may pass safely; and, if a passenger is injured by reason of any such obstruction along the line of its road, the burden is upon it to prove that the accident was the result of the plaintiff's own negligence, or that the most thorough and perfect diligence could not have foreseen and prevented the injury. Neither can the company relieve itself from liability as to the condition and construction of its road by confiding duties which it owes to passengers to other hands, whether independent contractors or not.
5. The doctrine of the nonliability of one for the negligence of another because the latter is an independent contractor does not apply to relieve the former from liability for the omission of a duty imposed upon him by law in behalf of the safety of the public.
6. If a railroad company, while using its track for the carriage of passengers, engages in a work to be done on its road, and in the immediate proximity to its track an accident happens to a passenger by reason of an obstruction of the track preventing the safe passage of the cars, arising from negligence in the performance of the work, it is no defense to the company to show that it had placed the work in the hands of an independent contractor, and that his carelessness caused the obstruction.
7. To debar a plaintiff from recovery of damages for an injury from negligence, his negligence must be the proximate cause of the injury. When both parties are chargeable with negligence, the plaintiff cannot recover if his negligence contributed in any degree to his injury; but, if it did not contribute to it in any degree, he may recover, his negligence not then being contributory, because not the proximate cause of the injury, but only remote from it, or collateral to it; and the defendant's negligence is in such case the proximate cause of the injury.

Headnotes by BRANNON, J.

NOTE.—For the effect of a passenger's negligent exposure of person at a car window see, in connection with the above case, the note to Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Scott (Va.) 16 L. R. A. 91.

8. Though the negligence of the plaintiff be in character contributory, yet, if his injury would have occurred from the defendant's negligence just the same if the plaintiff had been in no wise negligent, the plaintiff is not prevented by his negligence from recovery.
9. Though a plaintiff be chargeable with negligence contributing to the injury, yet, if the defendant know of the danger to the plaintiff arising from his negligence, and can by ordinary care avoid the injury, but does not, he is liable for his negligence, notwithstanding the plaintiff's negligence.
10. An instruction is abstract if no evidence tends to show the facts it supposes, and ought not to be given.
11. If an instruction has been given, this court will not reverse a judgment because of it, if there is any evidence tending to prove the fact it supposes, though that evidence be very weak in the opinion of this court.
12. Things which may be considered in assessing damages for injury to person.
13. An instruction ought never to assume as proven the facts which it supposes, but ought to be hypothetical; yet, if such an instruction has been given, and the appellate court sees from the record that those facts were proven beyond controversy, and were conceded or tacitly conceded, and not a subject of controversy on the trial, such improper instruction will not be ground for reversal if correct in law.
14. An instruction which could not possibly have prejudiced the party, though incorrect or abstract, will not be ground for reversal; but it must be very clear that it could not have hurt the party complaining of it.
15. If a party who has caused to be submitted to the jury particular questions of fact allows the jury finding a general verdict to be discharged without asking the court to have them answered, he is deemed to have waived such answer.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Tucker County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. W. Dailey and L. D. Strader for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. B. B. Dovenor, J. J. Coniff, and A. B. Parsons for defendant in error.

Brannon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case has been once before in this court.

For exceptions to the rule as to nonliability for acts of independent contractors, see note to Hawver v. Whalen (Ohio) 14 L. R. A. 823.

35 W. Va. 389. The action was to recover damages for injury to the arm of the plaintiff from collision with a pile of rock standing near a railroad track of a passenger coach on which the plaintiff was a passenger. The plaintiff recovered a verdict and judgment for $9,000, and the railroad company has brought the case to this court on writ of error.

Question 1. Did the court err in allowing the plaintiff to unclothe and exhibit to the jury the shoulder from which the arm had been severed by amputation? Counsel for plaintiff in error, while insisting on this point, cites no authority to sustain his contention. Of course, evidence must be relevant, as tending to establish some material matter in the case. Is this at all relevant? The plaintiff had a right to prove the hurt, and that it had entailed lasting injury by causing the amputation and loss of his arm. He could prove that by oral evidence. He could himself stand before the jury for ocular demonstration of the fact; and why may he not intensify and make more certain the fact by inspection of the naked shoulder itself? It is only more and more conclusive evidence upon a fact which he was entitled to prove, and, being relevant, we cannot exclude it because there may have been danger of inspiring sympathy in the jury and increasing damages.

Question 2. Did the court err in permitting the witness Coniff to give evidence of the evidence of Sydney Harris on a former trial, he having died before the second trial? It seems clear that the law allows evidence to prove the evidence on a former trial of a witness since deceased. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 163; Rice, Crim. Ev. § 224. But this is said not to be sustained by decisions in Virginia or West Virginia. In Finn's Case, 5 Rand. (Va.) 701, it is asserted that such evidence is admissible in civil cases, but not in a criminal case. This was obiter as to a civil case, as the case was a criminal case, and perhaps obiter as to a criminal case as to a dead witness, as the witness was one out of the state. In Brogy's Case, 10 Gratt. 733, that case is recognized as deciding that such evidence is not admissible in criminal cases, and evidence of what a witness for the prisoner said on a former trial, though offered by the prisoner, was rejected. How far these cases settle the question as to the admissibility of evidence of a deceased witness on a former trial is immaterial here. Though not binding, I think the opinion of Judge Brockenbrough in Finn's Case, that in civil cases the evidence of such deceased witness is admissible, is clearly good law, harmonizing with the vast volume of authority elsewhere. It has been so held in Lee v. Hill, 87 Va. 497. The only serious question here is as to the mode of proof in this case. The plaintiff proved what the dead witness had stated by Coniff, and not by the evidence as taken in shorthand and written out in longhand by the stenographer on the first trial, and the appellant's counsel contends that the stenographer's report was the best evidence, and should have been used, because the statute (Code 1891, p. 1062, § 3) makes it official.

It seems to me that, as this act declares the reporter's notes official, and the best authority in any matter of dispute, and provides that they shall be used by the parties in any proceedings wherein they may be required, such notes must be used, or an excuse given before substitutionary evidence can be given. I do not regard these notes as technically primary evidence in a legal sense, but the clauses of the act just mentioned themselves make the notes in effect primary. Why, under these clauses, evidence by a witness should be resorted to in a second trial of the same case between the same parties, instead of these notes, I cannot see, looking at the statute. The legislature surely meant it to be the highest authority on the evidence between the same parties in that case, on that trial or a new trial, because taken by a sworn stenographer, in presence of court, witness, parties, and counsel, and presumably verified, and therefore more apt to be reliable than a witness stating it. But for those features of the statute, no doubt any witness could be called to prove the evidence of the dead witness. The opinion by Judge Lucas, touching this statute, in Cummings v. Armstrong, 34 W. Va. 1, leans in this direction. But, be that question as it may, suppose the stenographer's notes be inadequate to convey to the second jury what the witness conveyed to the first, as is peculiarly the case in this instance. A most material question is whether the plaintiff's arm, at the time the moving train raked against the pile of rock, and his injury was received, was inside the car, or extended outside the window. Mrs. Harris, when asked a pointed question as to this, according to these notes, did not answer in language, and instead of such answer the notes used the word "illustrates." However plain to the first jury that illustration may have been,—plainer to convey her meaning than words, perhaps,—yet that illustration was not furnished by these notes, and the notes on this point would convey no meaning. Coniff's evidence shows that Mrs. Harris, in her illustration, used a book to represent the window sill of the car, one side of it representing the inside of the window, the other its outside, and placing her elbow upon it, showed how Carrico's arm was relative to the outside of the sill and car, showing several inches space between the elbow and the outside of the car. Now, should the plaintiff have been required to use only these notes of the evidence, and lose the benefit and meaning of Mrs. H's evidence as given on the first trial? We think not. The proper course was to have read the official report of Mrs. Harris' evidence, and to have used oral evidence to supply its defect above specified. But an inspection of the report of her evidence, which we are authorized to make (Code, chap. 135, § 7), shows that there is no variance between it as then given and as given by Coniff. But, if there were, or Coniff omitted any matter which she stated, there was the official report, and the defendant could have used it to ward off harm to it or for any lawful purpose. We see no room to say harm was done to the defendant under this heading. To reverse a trial on this ground would be narrow and technical. It is not every step in a long, wearisome trial that is the open sesame, all potential to call for reversal. The field of harmless error has been sensibly widening in recent years. The courts are becoming more and more, every year, averse to reversing decisions for technical errors or errors plainly not harmful, especially where it is seen that substantial justice has been done.

Question 3. Is there error as to instructions given for plaintiff? As they may be of use to courts and bar, I give them in full: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the defendant placed or allowed to be placed by its railroad track a pile of stone in such dangerous proximity to said track as to prevent the passage of a passenger car on said track without striking or scraping said car, and in consequence thereof the plaintiff was injured as is charged in the declaration, without fault on his part contributing to said injury, such act of the defendant is negligence in law." It is said this instruction is bad because no evidence showed that the company placed or allowed the stones to be placed where they were, but they were placed there by third parties. They were placed there by persons getting them for work on the line of the road. I will not enter at large into the nice question of how far one person is liable for the act of another who is an independent contractor, or the question who is an independent contractor, as to do so would be useless in this case, and only repetition of elaborate discussion long ago applied to these questions. The general rule may be stated to be that one who has contracted with a fit and competent person, exercising an independent employment, to do work not in itself dangerous to others or unlawful, according to the contractor's own method, and without his being subject to control, except as to the results of his work, will not be answerable for the wrongs of such contractor, his subcontractor or servants, committed in the prosecution of his work. Nice questions arise in the application of the rule. Who is an independent contractor? Or rather, is he an independent contractor, or only an agent or representative of the employer in the particular case? A test which has been proposed, and generally an adequate one, or as good a test put in a few words as can be suggested, is, Had the defendant the right to control, in the given particular, the conduct of the person doing the wrong? If he had, the employer is liable; if not, he is not liable, for the reason that the one doing the act is an independent contractor. See Whart. Neg. § 181; 2 Thomp. Neg. §§ 22, 35; 2 Wood, Railway Law, § 284; 1 Rorer, Railroads, 468; New Orleans, M. & O. R. Co. v. Hanning, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 649, 21 L. ed. 220; Cooley, Torts, 546; Patterson, Railway Accident Law, 119; Powell v. Virginia Constr. Co. 88 Tenn. 692; St. Louis, Ft. S. & W. R. Co. v. Willis, 88 Kan. 880; Dillon v. Hunt, 105 Mo. 154; Roddy v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 104 Mo. 234, 13 L. R. A. 746; Rrie v. Cavillena, 85 Pa. 247, 27 Am. Rep. 642, and note.

But this principle cannot relieve the defendant in this particular case. One of the very plainest duties imposed upon a railroad company carrying passengers for pay is that it shall keep its track in good and safe condition, free from obstructions endangering those passengers. For the public to yield or waive the performance of this duty would be to waive that which is of the highest importance to personal safety and life itself. The law is necessarily rigid as to this. Passengers are entitled by the clearest principles to look to the carrier who has engaged to carry them in this respect, and cannot be told to follow some one, a stranger to them and often irresponsible. The company cannot divest itself of or shift this obligation. In this case when before in this court this duty is called an absolute duty imposed upon the company; and in Searle v. Kanaucha & O. R. Co., 32 W. Va. 870, we held that railroad companies, in tenderness to human life, are liable to passengers for the slightest negligence, and required to exercise the greatest possible diligence and care, not only in the management of trains, but also in the structure, repair, and care of the track and bridges, and all other arrangements necessary to the safety of passengers. In this case we find a pile of rock so close to the track that the passenger car cannot pass in safety, but collides with or scrapes against it, and grievously hurts a passenger's arm, invading, we may say, the very track itself, for the track is for the passage of the coach. Surely the railroad company is liable to the passenger. The doctrine of nonliability of a defendant because the act is that of an independent contractor does not apply where the thing which that contractor does, and does negligently, is something which the law in defense of public interests requires the defendant to do carefully and properly. Patterson, Railway Accident Law, 127; Chicago v. Robbins, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 418, 17 L. ed. 298; Whart. Neg. § 185. See, especially, Wood, Mast. & S. § 816; Storrs v. Utica, 17 N. Y. 104, 72 Am. Dec. 437.

Here the duty rested on the company not to pile the stones as was done, and, had it done the act itself, it would have been liable for obstructing the way, and so none the less in this case. In the similar case of Virginia Cent. R. Co. v. Sanger, 15 Gratt. 230, Judge Daniel said that if a railroad company using its track for passengers engages in work on its road or in the immediate proximity to its track negligence in doing which would, in the opinion of cautious persons, involve the hazard of obstruction to the passage of its cars, it would be just as incompetent for it, in case of accident to a passenger from negligence in the work, to show merely that it had placed the work in the hands of a contractor, and that the obstruction was caused by the carelessness of one of his employes, as it would be for the company, in case of accident to a passenger from want of care or skill in the management of a train, to show that such management had been let out to a contractor, and that the accident was due to the negligence of one of his employes. In Carrico v. West Virginia Cent. & P. R. Co., 35 W. Va. 389, this very case,—it was held—

"It is the absolute duty of a railroad company to keep its track free from dangerous obstructions of every sort, and when a passenger is injured by reason of any such obstruction along the line of its road, the burden devolves upon it to prove that the accident was the result of the plaintiff's own negligence, or that the most thorough and perfect diligence could not have foreseen and prevented the injury. Neither can the company relieve itself from liability in regard to the condition and construction of its road by undertaking to confide these duties which it owes to passengers to other hands, no matter what precaution it may have taken in selecting such agencies." I concurred in this point in the syllabus. A careful reconsideration of this feature of the case has not disclosed to my mind any error in it. We think it concludes this point on the present writ of error. We also think, as to this point, the case of Virginia Cent. R. Co. v. Sanger, 15 Gratt. 230, binds us to hold the defendant liable in this case. There a contractor was getting out rock for work on the road, and a rock in some way obstructed the track, derailed a train, and injured a passenger, and it was held that the duty of keeping the track free of obstruction was embraced in the warranty to carry the passenger safely, and that, if a railroad company, while using its track for carriage of passengers engages in a work to be done on its road and in the immediate proximity to its track, negligence in which would, in the opinion of cautious persons involve the hazard of obstruction to the passage of cars, and an accident to a passenger comes from negligent performance of the work, it is no defense to show merely that they had placed the work in the hands of a contractor, and that the obstruction was caused by the carelessness of one of his employes. For another reason the doctrine of independent contractor cannot excuse this company. When a passenger for pay, riding in a car, is injured by an accident, he has made out a prima facie case for recovery, and the railroad company must carry the burden of showing adequate defense. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Wightman, 29 Gratt. 432, 26 Am. Rep. 384; Carrico v. West Virginia Cent. & P. R. Co. 35 W. Va. 389. We are not shown the character of contract between the company and the persons furnishing the stone, or any of its provisions, so as to enable us to say whether they were or were not independent contractors. We see no objection, therefore, to instruction 4.

Instruction No. 5: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was injured by being struck by a stone standing in dangerous proximity to the defendant's railroad track, and that the position of said stone was known to the defendant, or the agents of said defendant, or might have been known to them by the use of ordinary care and diligence, and there was such negligence of said agents in failing to remove said stone, or in failing to use care and diligence in ascertaining whether said stone was in dangerous proximity to the track of said defendant, such negligence of said agents was the negligence of the defendant." This instruction was approved when the case was heretofore in this court. I see no objection to it now.

Instruction No. 6: "The jury are instructed that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff's arm was resting on the window sill of the passenger car, the placing of his arm there was not negligence on the part of the plaintiff, provided, when resting upon said sill, it did not protrude beyond the window of the car." Nothing is said against this instruction. It is obviously good.

Instruction No. 7: "The court instructs the jury that, even if they believe from the evidence that plaintiff's arm protruded beyond the window of the car, yet the plaintiff can recover if the jury further believe from the evidence that the injury to him would have occurred even if his arm had not protruded beyond the window of the car; and the burden of proving that the accident would have happened even if his arm had not protruded as aforesaid devolves upon the plaintiff." This is said to be improper, because irrelevant, as there was no evidence tending in the least to show that, but for the arm's protruding out of the window, the injury would have happened. This we cannot hold. Besides all the evidence of several witnesses, stating positively that the arm was inside the car, and the conceded injury thus tending to show that the injury occurred while the arm was not protruded out of the window, there are the indentations on the car forward and also in the rear of the seat in which Carrico sat, and the indentation on window facings on both sides of the window at that seat, tending to show that the scraping of the car began before reaching Carrico's seat, and, as the car was rounding a curve, and the stone was on its lower side, when the window reached the rock the pressure towards the inside of the curve, or in the careening of the car, brought the stone inside the window on account of the open window's affording no resistance, and wounded the arm of the plaintiff; and there was evidence by one witness of an indentation on the inside of the window. Question might be suggested as to this instruction in point of law. It was approved in this case heretofore. On page 401 of 35 W. Va., President Lucas approved this very instruction without discussion. On page 398, 35 W. Va., he states the general rule that, if the negligence of plaintiff and defendant is mutual the plaintiff cannot recover, and then states an exception to be that, if the injury would have happened just the same, although the plaintiff had been in no wise negligent, his negligence will not prevent his recovery. If this rule be law, it will clearly vindicate instruction No. 7. Is the plaintiff denied relief in every instance in which he is chargeable with negligence? From the language usually adopted in expressing the rule that, where the negligence of plaintiff and defendant is mutual, the plaintiff cannot recover, we might hastily so conclude; but we must not be misled by the generality of that language. We must remember that where both are negligent a cardinal rule is that it is that negligence which is the proximate cause of the injury that is charged with responsibility for it. "In jure, non remota causa sed proxima spectatur." By proximate cause the law does not here refer to the degree or extent of the influence of the negligence in the production of the injury, but to its relation or connection with that injury in point of cause,—its causal relation. Consequently, when the plaintiff's negligence in any degree helps in causing that injury, though the defendant's negligence also helps, we set the negligence of the one off against the negligence of the other as equal, and tell the plaintiff he cannot recover because we do not apply the rule of comparative negligence in this state, by apportioning between the plaintiff and defendant the effect of the negligence of each one in producing the injury, and finding in favor of him least negligent. But when the negligence of the plaintiff does not help in producing the injury, but that injury would have occurred just the same from the defendant's negligence, without the plaintiff's negligence, then the plaintiff's negligence is not efficient in the production of the injury. It is practically nonexistent, because nonefficient. How can we say it is the proximate cause in such case? When we cannot estimate or appreciate the influence of the plaintiff's negligence in the result—the injury—because the defendant's negligence would have caused it just the same if the plaintiff were free from negligence, we disregard the plaintiff's negligence as having no causal relation in the eye of the law to the injury. Then his negligence is noncontributory, and it is only with contributory negligence the law charges him, not simply negligence. If it be not contributory, it is collateral or remote only, and is immaterial. See Washington v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 17 W. Va. 190; Fowler v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 18 W. Va. 579; Phillips v. Ritchie County, 81 W. Va. 477; Bishop, Non-Cont. L. § 459; Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 83; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Righter, 42 N. J. L. 180. Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 98; 2 Rorer, Railroads, 1019.

Frequently has it been laid down by courts that if the injury would not have occurred but for the negligence of the plaintiff, he cannot recover, and this is the same as to say conversely that, if his negligence is not such as, but for it, the injury would not have happened, he can recover; that is, if it would have happened anyhow, he may recover. Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Jones, 95 U. S. 439, 24 L. ed. 506; New Jersey Exp. Co. v. Nichols, 38 N. J. L. 434, 97 Am. Dec. 722; Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Morris, 81 Gratt. 200; Black, Ch. J., in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Aspell, 28 Pa. 149; opinion in Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Anderson, 81 Gratt. 812, 81 Am. Rep. 750, and especially cases cited; Cooley, Torts, 674; Kentucky Cent. R. Co. v. Thomas, 79 Ky. 166, 43 Am. Rep. 208; Northern Cent. R. Co. v. State, 29 Md. 420, 96 Am. Dec. 545. So we may place these two rules side by side. On the one hand, if the injury would have occurred just the same from defendant's negligence without plaintiff's negligence, the plaintiff can recover; and, on the other hand, if the injury would not have occurred but for the plaintiff's negligence, he cannot recover. The eminent and very able and accurate law writer, Mr. Bishop, says the test that a negligence is to be deemed contributory or not according as without it the accident would or would not have occurred, is inaccurate; but in so saying he discredits many high authorities. I grant that it is not infallible, because there may be some cases it will not suit; but practically it meets requirements in the courts. Of this I feel sure: that the rule propounded by instruction 7, as applied to this case, is correct. Is it not obviously true in law that, if the stone would have invaded the inside of the car through the window, and wounded Carrico's arm resting on the window sill inside the car, no less than if it had been protruded out of the window, its protrusion is immaterial? Its mere protrusion did not cause an injury which it would have received inside or outside the window. In the opinion of the court in Kentucky Cent. R. Co. v. Thomas, supra, it was said: "But, if the nature of the accident be such that the danger of injury was not enhanced in consequence of the position occupied by the passenger his right to recover will not be affected by the fact that he was at an improper place." It is apposite here. "If the injury would have occurred notwithstanding the exercise of all due care by the plaintiff, his omission to take such care is immaterial." 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 93; sustained by opinion, citing Butterfield v. Forrester, 11 East, 60, in Beers v. Housatonic R. Co. 19 Conn. 566; opinion in Wright v. Mississippi & I. Teleg. Co. 20 Iowa, 195; Short v. Knapp, 2 Daly, 150. The law only requires of the plaintiff ordinary care to avoid injury. All agree to this. Then, suppose that ordinary care would not have prevented the defendant's negligence from working the injury, should the plaintiff be denied relief? 2 Thomp. Neg. 1150.

Instruction No. 8: "The court instructs the jury that, even if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence, and that that negligence may have contributed to the injury, yet, if the jury further believe from the evidence that the negligent position of said plaintiff was known to the defendant, or its servants, and that with such knowledge the injury to the plaintiff could then have been prevented by the use of care and diligence on the part of said defendant or its servants, then the plaintiff's negligence will not excuse or relieve the defendant from liability." This propounds the law correctly relating to one of the well-known exceptions to contributory negligence. Downey v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 28 W. Va. 732; opinion in Carrico v. West Virginia Cent. & P. R. Co. 35 W. Va. 398, 402; Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Anderson, 81 Gratt. 812, 81 Am. Rep. 750. It is said to be bad in its use of the word "negligent" instead of "dangerous," for that it is not enough that the defendant is aware of the negligence of the plaintiff, but he must also see that his negligence is bringing him into danger before he is required to act to save him. This is true. Downey v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. and Carrico v. West Virginia Cent. & P. R. Co. just cited. Yet I think the word "negligent," as applicable to the case, under the evidence of Kalbaugh that he saw Carrico's arm out of the window, and saw the rock, and saw the great danger to Carrico therefrom as it was about to come in contact with the rock, and hallooed to him to look out, and waved to the engineer to stop,—actual, imminent danger,—could not have misled or been misapplied by the jury. Under the context of the instruction and the language following the word "negligent," I think we may say it was tantamount to "dangerous," at least not so plainly misleading as to call for a new trial. But it is said that the instruction is irrelevant and abstract, as no evidence tends to show the hypothesis contained in it, that it was at all in the defendant's power to save Carrico. The evidence of Kalbaugh, mentioned a few lines back, with the addition that Kalbaugh said he had no time at all, from his sight of Carrico's arm out of the window, to do more than shout to him "Look out!" is the evidence touching this instruction. Kalbaugh's evidence and his credit were before the jury. Weak to show the postulate of the instruction, it seems to me, it is true. And I am aware that Bloyd v. Pollock, 27 W. Va. 75, holds that an instruction ought not to be given either when there is no evidence tending to sustain the state of facts stated in it, or when, though there is some evidence tending to do so, yet it is so weak that it would be the duty of the court to set aside a verdict as contrary to the weight of evidence if based solely on the assumption that the fact supposed in the instruction was in fact true. This proposition seems logical, and has given me some question about this instruction. In this instance the weight of the contrary evidence of Kalbaugh is complicated with credibility. That was a case where the instruction was refused. Here it was given. The cases may be different. A court might say that the evidence is too light to constitute ground for an instruction, but here we are asked to annul a verdict because the instruction was given. In Hopkins v. Richardson, 9 Gratt. 485, it was held that, if there is any evidence tending to prove a case supposed in the instruction, it ought to be given, if correct in its law. Judge Lee said that the function of determining whether any proof of the hypothetical case has been given, and, if not, of refusing an instruction, is one to be exercised with great care and caution by a court. In a plain case of total absence of evidence to make out the supposed case the court may well refuse the instruction, but where there is evidence tending to do so, however little its weight may appear to the court to be, it is best to give it. Such I have always understood to be the law. Wheeling Bridge Co. v. Wheeling & B. Bridge Co. 34 W. Va. 155; Barton, Law Pr. 656. While the law is that an instruction must not be given if not relevant, and it is not relevant if there is no evidence tending to show the facts on which it is based (Kerr v. Lunsford, 81 W. Va. 663, 2 L. R. A. 668; and Coffman v. Hedrick, 32 W. Va. 120), yet, as there is evidence here tending to show the facts in it put, I think it is not error sufficient to reverse the judgment.

On further reflection upon rehearing I am confirmed in what is above said as to this instruction, and I will add that Kalbaugh was standing on the lower step of the car, looking for a passenger to get on the train going only two miles an hour. He saw, he says, Carrico's arm lying out of the window as he looked along the train, and saw the rock, and the danger to Carrico, and waved to another brakeman to stop, with the expectation that that brakeman would signal the engineer. Now, if his mind was impressed with the idea that there was time enough to signal a brakeman, and for him to signal the engineer to avoid the danger, might the jury not say there was time enough for him to have run in to save Carrico? Kalbaugh's veracity was assailed by evidence intended directly to affect it, and his demeanor was before the jury, and on this trial he stated that he had not time to go into the car to save Carrico, but hallooed "Look out!" but admitted that on the former trial he had not stated that he had not time to warn Carrico, and did not remember whether he stated that he had hallooed "Look out!" I ask, Was not the veracity of Kalbaugh before the jury? Did not the plaintiff have a right to ask the jury to say that he was not to be credited when he said he had not time to warn Carrico? Was it improper to give an instruction under which the jury could inquire whether Kalbaugh, an employé on this train, if unable to reach Carrico, and drag his arm from the window, at least had time to take one or two steps to the car door, and shout to him, and alarm him and passengers near him as to his danger? Can it be that this court must say that the question whether the employé could have warned Carrico was not a proper theorem before the jury, because the evidence bearing on it was so very little as to make the instruction irrelevant under the circumstances and law above stated?

Instruction No. 9: "The court instructs the jury that, in order for the plaintiff to recover, it is only necessary that he make out his case by a preponderance of the evidence, and, if the defendant relies upon the contributory negligence of the plaintiff to defeat him, said contributory negligence must be proved by preponderance of all the evidence in the case, as well that of the plaintiff as that of the defendant." I think this is good. The burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defense. Snyder v. P. C. & St. L. R. Co. 11 W. Va. 14; Riley v. West Virginia Cent. & P. R. Co. 27 W. Va. 146, pt. 9.

Instruction No. 10: "The court instructs the jury that, if they find for the plaintiff, they are, in estimating the damages, at liberty to consider the health and condition of the plaintiff before the injury as compared with the present condition in consequence of said injury; and also whether said injury was permanent in its nature, and how far it is calculated to disable the plaintiff from engaging in those pursuits and occupations for which, in the absence of said injury, he would have been qualified, and also the physical suffering to which he was subjected by reason of said injury, and to allow such damages as, in the opinion of the jury, will be a fair and just pecuniary compensation for the injury which the plaintiff has sustained. The jury may include any losses that may occur in the future to the plaintiff, provided they are such as the jury believe from the evidence will actually result to the plaintiff as the proximate damages of the wrongful act complained of." I see no objection to this instruction. Riley v. West Virginia Cent. & P. R. Co. 27 W. Va. 146, 161; Wilson v. Wheeling, 19 W. Va. 325, 43 Am. Rep. 780; Searle v. Kanawha & O. R. Co. 32 W. Va. 370.

Instruction No. 11: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant company, while using its track for the carriage of passengers, engaged in a work to be done on its road, or in immediate proximity to its track, negligence in the performance of which would, in the estimation and opinion of a reasonable, cautious person, involve the hazard of obstruction to the passage of cars, and an accident to a passenger is caused by an obstruction arising from negligence in the performance of the work, it is no defense for said railroad company to show that it had placed the work in the hands of a contractor, and that the obstruction was caused by the carelessness of one of his employes." Counsel makes no argument against this instruction. It is clearly good, under principles above stated and approved as instruction 7 in Carrico v. West Virginia Cent. & P. R. Co. 35 W. Va. 390, and it is literally point 3 in syllabus in Virginia Cent. R. Co. v. Sanger, 15 Gratt. 230.

Instruction No. 12: "The court instructs the jury that, even, if they believe from the evidence that the arm of the plaintiff, after the injury, was on the outside of the car, yet, if they further believe from the evidence that at the time the arm was caught by the stone it was not protruding beyond the window of the car, then the plaintiff can recover." What does this instruction mean? What its aim? There was evidence that immediately after the injury Carrico's arm was hanging limp outside the window. The plaintiff's contention was that when injured it was on the window sill, inside the car window. This instruction, I think, was to meet before the jury the evidence that it hung out of the window; to tell the jury that, notwithstanding it was seen out of the window after the hurt, yet, if inside when hurt, he could recover. The words "can recover" support this theory, importing that, notwithstanding the arm was seen outside the window after the accident, yet that would not prevent recovery. But suppose we say with appellant's counsel, that it assumes the essential fact of the defendant's negligence. It technically violates that cardinal rule touching instructions that an instruction must not assume facts as proven, or assume that the weight of the evidence is in favor of certain facts, thus taking those questions from the jury, or improperly influencing it. Parkersburg Nat. Bank v. Als, 5 W. Va. 50; Harrison v. Farmers Bank of Virginia, 4 W. 24 L. R. A.

Va. 393; Dickschied v. Exchange Bank of Wheeling, 23 W. Va. 341. Still the instruction, while not defensible, is not cause for reversal for these reasons. It was incontrovertibly proven that Carrico was injured while a passenger on defendant's train. No two persons could logically differ as to this; it was a concession. That alone, in law, raised a prima facie case of negligence. Carrico v. West Virginia Cent. & P. R. Co. 35 W. Va. 390; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Noell, 32 Gratt. 394. The only matter of contest before the jury was whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence meeting the plaintiff's negligence and defeating his action. How, then, could the defendant be injured by the assumption of negligence in the instruction,—a fact incontrovertibly shown and conceded? Sheff v. Huntington, 16 W. Va. 307, pt. 9. As the defendant could not, for reasons stated above, have been prejudiced by said instruction, it is not cause of reversal. Beatty v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 6 W. Va. 388; Clay v. Robinson, 7 W. Va. 348; Danville Bank v. Waddill, 27 Gratt. 448. I do not think it tells the jury that if the arm was inside the window, all else to fix liability on the company was established. It would be rather straining the instruction to say so. I think its fair meaning is that the fact that the arm, after the accident, was found outside the car, ought not, over other circumstances, to show that when hurt it was not inside, or prevent recovery. But, give it a construction in the other direction, then I say that if it be settled that the arm, when injured, was inside the car, under the facts of the case the company's liability follows. What circumstance, in such view, relieves it? As it does not assume, but leaves open to the jury, that decisive fact, the injury to a passenger being undenied and undeniable, liability follows. How does the instruction wrong the company? How can we reverse for that cause?

Question 4. Is there error as to particular questions of fact submitted to the jury under section 5, chapter 131, Code? They were in fact answered, but the answers are not part of the record, and we must say they were submitted, but not answered. While the jury is bound to answer them, and it is error for the court to go on to judgment without answers, yet if, as is the case here, the party submitting them allow the jury to be disbanded without asking answers, he has waived the answers. 2 Thomp. Trials, § 2635. Motion for new trial overruled.

Here I need say but little, and will not give the evidence, covering 368 printed pages. If the plaintiff's arm was outside the window, let us say, he was chargeable with contributory negligence; otherwise he was not. On that question the evidence was in irreconcilable contradiction, several witnesses saying that they saw the arm inside, several that they saw it outside, the window. Their credibility was involved. Besides, very many facts and circumstances, such as the curvature of the road there, the location of the rock pile, the shape and size of the rock as bearing on the probability of its invasion of the window and there doing the injury, the marks on the car, their character and location, the character and place of the wounds on the arm, and many other features, from all which the jury had to make deductions,—necessarily and indispensably so in coming to a verdict,—were before the jury. Outside of the credibility of witnesses, different persons might have different opinions from them. Even if we had doubt as to the correctness of the verdict, or would have come to a different verdict, we cannot set it aside for that reason. Seidbright v. State, 2 W. Va. 591; State v. Thompson, 26 W. Va. 149; Miller v. Citizens F. Ins. Co. 12 W. Va. 116.

It is argued by appellant's counsel that the stones were about two feet square, and could not have entered the window; that physical evidence overrules the statement of several witnesses herein. The mashing or mangling of the upper arm tends to show that the stone pressed it against the jamb of the window. The indentation made by bone or rock there so tends. Just how it entered we cannot say. A witness for defendant says the upper corner of a stone did the injury. The corner may have projected, and in the slant or careening of the car only the corner entered the car angularly. The many facts and features here coming up for consideration I will not detail. They were proper for the jury on the question of fact, Was the arm injured inside the window? Can we assume the function of a jury, take scales and nicely weigh evidence, great in volume, and on many points, and from many witnesses, and strike a balance, and discredit witnesses giving direct, positive evidence, whose faces and demeanors we see not? We cannot thus invade the function of the trial court and jury. In such case the opinion of the lower court and jury is entitled to peculiar respect. Reynolds v. Tompkins, 28 W. Va. 229.

There is some confusion in the case as to when this court should set aside a verdict on the merits. It may do so when the verdict is manifestly and clearly against the weight of evidence; but such power should be cautiously exercised,—only where there is a plain deviation from right and justice, not simply because we have doubt of the correctness of the verdict. Black v. Thomas, 21 W. Va. 709; State v. Cooper, 26 W. Va. 838; Martin v. Thayer, 37 W. Va. 38; Hatfield v. Workman, 35 W. Va. 578. But we do not see that under any of the cases this court can do so in this case, as it would seem to us to be an invasion of the just functions of the jury and trial court. Sheff v. Huntington, 16 W. Va. 307, pts. 12, 13, 14; Wheeling Bridge Co. v. Wheeling & B. Bridge Co. 34 W. Va. 155.

I have carefully and patiently reviewed this case, and again reviewed the points relied upon on the rehearing, as it not only involves various questions, but also the considerable liability of a verdict of $9,000, besides attendant costs. The amount involved is considerable, but the injury to the plaintiff is grievous and irreparable.

Two trials have resulted in substantially the same result, and, seeing no error calling for reversal, we must affirm the judgment.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE of the State of New York, ex rel.
Charles S. FAIRCHILD, Appts.,

v.

Charles M. PRESTON, Superintendent of

(140 N. Y. 542.)

1. Dues may be paid in advance with the assent of the directors in a savings and loan society, under the New York Banking Law of 1892, chapter 689, and a rebate or discount on such payments allowed at such rate per annum as the directors from time to time prescribe.
2. Prepaid stock, on which sixty per cent of the amount of the shares shall be paid in, and on which dividends at the rate of six per cent per annum on the amount paid in may be drawn out, with any further dividends to be credited and payable with the stock at its maturity, is not illegal under New York Laws 1892, chapter 689.
3. Income stock on which sixty per cent shall be paid in advance, with cash dividends limited to eight per cent as the only profit to the stockholders, while any dividends beyond these shall go to the holders of other kinds of stock, is not illegal under the New York law applicable to savings and loan societies.

(January 16, 1894.)

APPEAL by relator from an order of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming an order of a Special Term for Albany County denying a writ of mandamus to compel respondent to approve and file the certificate of incorporation of the Peter Cooper Savings & Loan Society, under the provisions of the section of the banking law relating to loan associations. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Charles A. Deshon and Matthew Hale for appellant.

Mr. Simon W. Rosendale, Atty. Gen., for respondent:

Associations of this character, like other corporations, are prohibited from exercising any rights or powers except such as are conferred by statute and such incidental powers as may be necessary to carry into effect the powers granted.

An association formed for the purposes of the "accumulation of a fund by the savings of its members to build or purchase for themselves dwelling houses or to enter into business" or merely for the purpose of loaning money to its members without expressing any intention to further the acquisition of homesteads, is not a building association.

Jarrett v. Cope, 68 Pa. 67; Kupfert v. Guttenberg Bldg. Asso. 80 Pa. 465; North American Bldg. Asso. v. Sutton, 85 Pa. 463, 78 Am. Dec. 849.

The statute in this state makes no provision for issuing paid up shares. On the contrary, it contemplates that all shares shall be paid for by periodical weekly or monthly payments.

The certificate of incorporation is required to set forth "the monthly or weekly dues per share."

Banking Law, § 170, subsec. 11, and section 173 provides: "No holder of redeemed shares shall claim to be exempt from making the monthly or other stated payments."

This (its only utterance), by the law-making power, shows the intention most clearly that shares should be paid for by periodical dues.

The issuance of shares under the two plans of prepaid and income stock practically results in the deposit of money at a specified or excessive rate of interest.

The holders of the "prepaid" and "income" shares would be in the position of creditors rather than members of the association. Their existence is nowhere provided for or contemplated by the statute of this state.

2 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 604; Thomp. Bldg. Asso. 2.

In the absence of statutory authority there should be no preferential members.

Thomp. Bldg. Asso. 60.

The law in England is different.

In Re Guardian Permanent Ben. Bldg. Soc., L. R. 23 Ch. Div. 440, and the kindred cases, the associations were organized under the Statute, 6 & 7 Wm. IV. chap. 32.

Section 31 of that law provided that the board, for the time being, shall have power as circumstances may require to issue deposits or paid-up shares of the value of £30 each.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relator and others attempted to form a corporation under article 5 of the Banking Law (Laws 1892, chap. 689), and for that purpose they made and acknowledged a certificate under section 170. They presented the certificate to the defendant, as the superintendent of banks, to be approved and filed by him as required by that section, and he declined to approve or file it on the ground that it provided for three kinds of stock, to wit, installment, prepaid, and income stock; his claim being that such a corporation can have only installment stock, to be paid for in installments. The relator then applied for a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel him to approve and file the certificate, and his application has been denied.

Persons seeking to form a corporation under any general law must have a reasonable latitude as to what they may insert in their certificate of incorporation. They must insert therein all the matter particularly required by the law, and they may insert other provisions, not inconsistent with law or public policy, which are germane to the purposes of the corporation, and necessary, convenient, or appropriate to the accomplishment of such purpose. If they keep within such limits, the public authorities have no reason to interfere; the interests of the public are not jeopardized, and the rights of no citizen are violated. Section 170, after specifying certain matters to be inserted in the certificate of incorporation under that section, specifically provides that the certificate may contain "such other provisions not inconsistent with law as shall be necessary for the convenient and effective transaction of its business." There is no requirement in the law that the stock of such a corporation shall be paid for in installments from time to time, as they fall due. The law requires the certificate to set forth "the amount of each share" of stock, and "the monthly or weekly dues per share." A certificate which did not provide for the payment of monthly or weekly dues by any member of the corporation who wished to pay in that way would undoubtedly be a departure from the law. The evident purpose of the law is to authorize the formation of these corporations mainly for the benefit of wage earners and other people of limited means, to enable them to acquire homes and to accumulate their savings, and no provision should be inserted in any certificate of incorporation under this law which would thwart this purpose.

This certificate provides for shares of $100 each, and for monthly dues of 50 cents on each share. The general scheme is that the dues, fees, penalties, and all other income of the corporation shall go into a common fund, and from this fund annual dividends are to be made, which are to be applied upon the shares of stock until they are fully paid for. Dues may be paid in advance with the assent of the directors, and upon such advance payments the directors may allow a rebate or discount at such rate per annum, for the time of payment in advance, as they shall from time to time prescribe. Such payments, instead of being contrary to the purpose of such corporations, may be promotive of that purpose. If a wage earner has the money, it may be wise to permit him to make the advance payments, and thus to save his money; and in this way, too, money is accumulated by the corporation more rapidly for loan to its members. So, the law is not violated by these advance payments upon installment stock, and no injustice is done to any of the members thereby. The certificate provides that "upon prepaid stock there shall be paid, at the time of subscription, dues to the amount of sixty dollars, and the holder thereof shall be entitled to receive, out of the profits apportioned thereto, semiannual dividends in cash, up to the rate of six per cent per annum. The profits apportioned to such stock, over and above such dividends, shall be credited thereto, and be payable with the stock at its maturity." The character of such stock must be determined at the time of the subscription. What harm can come from the creation of such stock? It allows a member who has money enough, to pay his dues for ten years in advance; and why is that not wise policy? Having thus paid in advance, his dividends are not needed to carry his stock to maturity, and hence he may draw his dividends up to 6 per cent and the balance of his dividends over that sum are applied to carry his stock to maturity. He has no advantage over the holders of installment stock. Their dividends are applied to carry their stock to maturity, and they thus have the same benefit that they would have if the dividends were first paid to them, and then by them paid upon their stock. All dividends are required to be made upon the net sums to the credit of the shares, and not upon the par value of the shares; and hence the holders of prepaid shares get precisely the same dividends proportioned to the amount standing to the credit of their shares as are paid to other stockholders, and no more. It is impossible for us to perceive how this scheme violates the law or any public policy. It does not prevent or defeat equality or mutuality among the members. And, if the prepaid stock is to be condemned, then it is not perceived how prepayment of installments upon installment stock can be upheld. Money must come into the treasury of one of these corporations, from the small monthly dues, very slowly, and members desiring to borrow the money for the purchase or improvement of homes must wait a long time before they can be accommodated with loans from money thus contributed; but if prepayment of dues is permitted, the ability of the corporation to aid its members by loans is greatly facilitated, and the main purpose of the corporation is thus promoted.

The income stock, upon which the members are also required to pay in advance $60 per share, differs from the prepaid stock only in the fact that the holder of such stock may receive dividends in cash up to 8 per cent and, in case the dividends are more, such dividends are apportioned among the holders of other kinds of stock; and what we have said about the prepaid stock applies to this stock. The corporation has protection against the prepaid and income stock, as it is provided in the certificate that the directors may at any time refuse to issue such stock, and may at any time, upon 30 days' notice, retire such stock by paying the book value thereof. But it is said that there is no requirement that the prepaid and income stock shall be carried to maturity, so as to be full paid. We are not sure of this. As the shares are fixed at $100, and are not mature until they reach that sum, it may be that the directors may require that these shares shall, at the proper time, be brought to maturity on an equality with the other shares. But, even if this be not so, no injustice can come from this situation, because in no event can the holder of these shares draw more than the amount that has been credited upon them, nor can they draw dividends on more than such amounts. In England, building and loan associations existed, and were authorized and regulated by statute, long before any of them were organized in this country, and in 1874 they were specially authorized by law to have prepaid stock. 37 & 38 Vict. § 5, chap. 42. There it was held, in Scott's Case, L. R. 23 Ch. Div. 458, that under the law as it existed prior to 1874, which was substantially like the present law of this state, prepaid stock was not illegal. There the learned master of the rolls said: "Again, is it contrary to the constitution of such a society that members shall pay up installments in advance? I say, clearly not. The more money you get from investing members, the more money you have ready to advance to the borrowing members, and the more rapidly you will bring your society to an end, if the society is established without a fixed period. It seems to me there is no reason why the judicature should say that these arrangements, which, as far as I am concerned, appear to be perfectly reasonable, and not only framed not to obstruct, but to further, the objects of these societies, are illegal because they are contrary to the policy on which these societies are founded." And that case was affirmed in the house of lords. Murray v. Scott, L. R. 9 App. Cas. 528.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that the order of the General and Special Terms should be reversed, and the case resubmitted to the special term for its action upon the relator's application, with costs in all the courts to the relator against the defendant.

All concur, except Peckham, J., not voting, and Bartlett, J., not sitting.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

Rosalie E. KREITZ, Adm., etc., of John B. Kreitz, Deceased, Appl.,

v.

Charles F. A. BEHRENSMEYER.

(149 Ill. 496.)

1. A de jure officer may at common law recover the fees or salary paid to a de facto officer; and this rule is in force in Illinois, although under the constitution the fees of the office belong to the county from which the salary is paid for the discharge of the duties of the office.

NOTE—As to right of de jure officer to recover salary from public when it has been paid to de facto officer, see State v. Milne (Neb.) 19 L. R. A. 29.

2. The fact that a commission has not been issued to a de jure officer will not defeat his right to recover from a de facto officer the fees or salary received by the latter, where the term of office has expired before the termination of the litigation as to the title of the office.

3. The cause of action by a de jure of-fees against a de facto officer for fees or salary received by the latter does not accrue until the right to the office is determined, where this is in litigation.

(April 2, 1894.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, Third District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Adams County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the perquisites of the office of county treasurer, to which plaintiff was adjudged to have been elected, but which defendant's testator held during the term for which plaintiff was elected. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. S. Davis and Carter, Govert & Pape, for appellant:

Mr. Kreitz held the office of county treasurer of Adams county from the time of being commissioned by the governor and his qualifying until his death in absolute good faith.

He had been declared elected by the board of canvassers established by law to canvass the returns and declare the result; his election had been duly certified and a commission issued to him by the governor in pursuance of the statute which provides that the "county treasurer shall be commissioned by the governor."

The person holding the certificate from the authorities appointed by law in relation to the office, is entitled to the present possession thereof notwithstanding his election is contested and its legality denied and notice of contest given.

People v. Head, 25 Ill. 325; People v. Rives, 27 Ill. 242.

Kreitz held the highest evidence provided by law, of the title to the office, and he was not in any way instrumental in obtaining it.

It, then, became his bounden duty to serve; and a failure or refusal would have subjected him to indictment, and forfeiture of not exceeding $1000.

See Rev. Stat. chap. 86, § 16.

This court would, on proper application, have compelled him to serve by mandamus.

People v. Williams, 145 Ill. 578.

If the legislature directs or authorizes the doing of a particular thing, the doing of it cannot be wrongful.

Broom's Legal Maxims, 198-200.

There never was a time when appellee could have legally held the office or rendered any legal service, and this, not from any fault of Kreitz but by virtue of the laws of the state.

It is damnum absque injuria. It was the misfortune of appellee. It was the wrong of nobody.

Kreitz could not become either an intruder or usurper by entering and performing service required of him by law.

1 Bouvier, Law Dict. 835; 2 Bouvier, Law Dict. 773.

Kreitz died August 11, 1890, and L. E. Finley was appointed to fill the vacancy a month later.

In Nichols v. Branham, 84 Va. 923, the supreme court of appeals of Virginia held that such an appointee could not be held liable for the fees received by him.

That Kreitz litigated with appellee for the office cannot affect the rights of the parties.

1 Sutherland, Damages, p. 4.

To apply the rule which admittedly flows from a recognition of the existence of a vested estate in an office to instances where such right of property is not acknowledged, is a palpable perversion of legal principles.

Stuhr v. Curran, 44 N. J. L. 181, 43 Am. Rep. 354.

But even if such should be the rule where one intrudes into or usurps an office, how can it be made to apply to one who enters into and performs the service at the laws' command?

It is not unreasonable to hold that Mr. Kreitz was bound to know whether he was elected or not—a question which it took three courts over four years to find out? Every one is bound to know the law—this rule is necessary, but every one is not bound to know the facts.

Broom, Legal Maxims, 242.

There are some marked distinctions between both the law and facts as applicable to Mayfield v. Moore, 53 Ill. 429, 5 Am. Rep. 52, and the case at bar. As the law then stood the fees, much or little, belonged to the officer but since the adoption of the new constitution, the fees belong to the county, and when collected merely constitute a fund out of which compensation for services actually rendered are to be paid.

Purcell v. Parks, 82 Ill. 346.

In any event appellee was not damaged any more than the difference between the amount received and the reasonable cost of earning and collecting it.

If the case be analogous to the entry into the land of another under a defective title as supposed in the Mayfield Case and the principles of equity should control, as there suggested, then Kreitz having entered in good faith and in pursuance of a legal duty under belief that he held the valid title, he then possessing the only legal evidence of it, the doctrine of betterments or improvements, should be applied, and appellee should be allowed only the balance after deducting the reasonable value of his services in earning, or so to speak in conserving, the fund sued for.

If, then, the office is not the property of the holder of the legal title, and if the fees established by law are not his property but the property of the county, out of which it must pay a reasonable compensation for necessary services rendered for it, and if there is no privity between the holder of the legal title and the officer de facto, upon what legal principle can the right of recovery be based? The salary or compensation itself can neither be sold nor assigned, in advance of its being actually earned.

Farwell v. Adams, 112 Ill. 60; Pearson v. Wilson, 57 Miss. 848; People v. Miller, 16 Mich. 56.

Phillips, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the election in November, A. D. 1886, John B. Kreitz and one Behrensmeyer were candidates for election to the office of county treasurer of Adams county, Ill., and, on the canvas of the returns, Kreitz was declared elected by a plurality of 14 votes; and, a certificate being made, a commission was issued to him by the governor, as the duly elected county treasurer of Adams county, whereupon he qualified, and entered upon the discharge of the duties of that office,—continuing to occupy the office, and discharge its duties, until his death, in 1890. Appellee, by proper notice and petition contested the election of Kreitz, which, after extended litigation, finally resulted in appellee being declared duly elected to the office of county treasurer of Adams county, by the judgment of this court, reported as Behrensmeyer v. Kreitz, 135 Ill. 591. Kreitz having died before the filing of this opinion, such proceedings were had in this court that the judgment of reversal was entered nunc pro tunc as of the 11th day of June, A. D. 1890, which declared Behrensmeyer elected to said office. On the 6th of April, 1892, appellee filed a claim against the estate of John B. Kreitz in the county court of Adams county, seeking to recover the sum of $10,000 for fees and salary received by Kreitz for Behrensmeyer's use, and interest thereon. On the petition of appellant, the venue on this claim so filed was changed from the county court to the circuit court of Adams county, where a trial was had which resulted in a finding and judgment in favor of appellee, and against appellant, for the sum of $7,333, to be paid in due course of administration, as a claim of the seventh class. Appellant prosecuted an appeal from that judgment to the appellate court of the third district, where the judgment was affirmed; and she now brings the record to this court by appeal, and urges that appellee has no cause of action, and asks that this case may be considered as one of first impression, regardless of what was said by this court in Mayfield v. Moore, 53 Ill. 428, 5 Am. Rep. 52,—arguing that that case was decided under the Constitution of 1848, and that by the provisions of the Constitution of 1870 a different rule must prevail, inasmuch as, by the provisions of the latter, the fees of the office belong to the county, from which a salary is paid for the discharge of the duties of the office, while under the former the fees belonged to the officer.

It is conceded that no statute exists in this state, declaring the rights of a de jure officer to recover from a de facto officer the salary paid such de facto officer, who has discharged the duties of the office under a wrongful or a mistaken purpose. There is no legislation on that subject in this state. The right of recovery, if it exists, depends, therefore, on the principles of the common law. The common law is a system of elementary rules and of general judicial declarations of principles, which are continually expanding with the progress of society, adapting themselves to the gradual changes of trade, commerce, arts, inventions, and the exigencies and usages of the country. Judicial decisions of common-law courts are the most authoritative evidence of what constitutes the common law. By chapter 28, Starr & C. Stat. Ill., the common law of England is declared in force in this state. By reference to the decisions of the common-law courts of England, the common law of that country is to be found. An examination of the decisions of the courts of that country shows a uniform declaration of the principle that a de jure officer has a right of action to recover against an officer de facto by reason of the intrusion of the latter into his office, and his receipt of the emoluments thereof. Among others, the following opinions of English courts may be referred to as sustaining this right of recovery: Vaux v. Jeffereen, 2 Dyer, 114; Arris v. Strukely, 2 Mod. 260; Lee v. Drake, 2 Salk. 468; Webb's Case, 8 Coke, 45. By the adoption of the common law of England, the principle announced in these cases was adopted as the law of this state, for the principle is of a general nature, and applicable to our constitution. On the basis of a sound public policy, the principle commends itself, for the reason that one would be less liable to usurp or wrongfully retain a public office, and defeat the will of the people or the appointing power, as loss would result from wrongful retention or usurpation of an office. The question has frequently been before the courts of the different states and of the United States, and the great weight of authority sustains the doctrine of the common law, as shown by the opinions of the judges in different states; and in most of the states these are based on the common law, without reference to any statute. The following cases are in point: United States v. Addison, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 201, 18 L. ed. 919; Dolan v.

New York, 68 N. Y. 274, 23 Am. Rep. 163; Glascok v. Lyons, 20 Ind. 1, 83 Am. Dec. 299; Douglass v. State, 81 Ind. 429; Currey v. Wright, 9 Lea, 247; Kessel v. Zeiser, 102 N. Y. 114, 55 Am. Rep. 769; Nichols v. MacLean, 101 N. Y. 526, 54 Am. Rep. 730; People v. Miller, 24 Mich. 458, 9 Am. Rep. 131; Hunter v. Chandler, 45 Mo. 452; People v. Smyth, 28 Cal. 21; Petit v. Rousseau, 15 La. Ann. 239. And the only case enunciating a different rule is that of Stuhr v. Curran, 44 N. J. L. 181, 43 Am. Rep. 353, where the conclusion was reached by a divided court. While it is true that in this state a public office is not a franchise nor an incorporeal hereditament, but a mere public agency created for the benefit of the state, yet the salary or emoluments annexed to a public office are incident to the right to the office, and not to the mere exercise of its duties, or its occupancy; and whether the compensation of the officer is by fees, or a salary, the rule is the same. People v. Smyth, supra; McVeany v. New York, 80 N. Y. 185, 36 Am. Rep. 600; Comstock v. Grand Rapids, 40 Mich. 397.

Such being the rule, the Constitution of 1870 did not change the law, in this respect, from what it was under the Constitution of 1848. The purpose of section 10, article 10, of the Constitution of 1870,—providing that county boards should fix the compensation of county officers, with their necessary clerk hire and other expenses, to be paid, in all cases where fees were provided for, out of the fees collected,—was to limit the amount of compensation an officer was to receive to a certain sum, if the fees amounted to that sum, and the residue to be paid in the county treasury. And section 12, article 10, which provided that all laws fixing fees of certain officers should terminate with the terms of those who might be in office at the first meeting of the general assembly after the adoption of the Constitution, and that the general assembly should, by a general law, uniform in its operation, provide for and regulate the fees of said officers and their successors, so as to reduce the same to a reasonable compensation for services actually rendered, and classify counties, etc., had for its object the abolition of special acts fixing fees, and aimed to declare a rule of uniformity in fees in the several counties of the several classes, with uniform compensation, within limited discretion of the various county boards, for services actually rendered by the de jure officers in such counties. Its purpose was not legislation, but limitation on and requirement for, legislation. In providing for legislation looking to a reasonable compensation for services actually rendered, it was not the aim or object of that section to establish a rule that would allow a mere usurper of an office, actually rendering service, the right to claim and retain the compensation to be fixed as provided by that section. The provisions of those sections creating no different rights, so far as a de jure officer is concerned, the rule announced by this court in Mayfield v. Moore, 53 Ill. 431, 5 Am. Rep. 52, is as applicable under the present Constitution as under the Constitution of 1848, and in harmony with the rule of the common law of England, as well as with the great weight of authority in this country, and has been followed by this court in more recent adjudications. Furwell v. Adams, 112 Ill. 58; Waterman v. Chicago & I. R. Co. 139 Ill. 669, 15 L. R. A. 418. We adhere to the rule as announced in Mayfield v. Moore.

It is further insisted that appellee cannot recover because he was never fully qualified, not being commissioned by the governor, and not filing bonds, as collector, for the years 1888-89-90. As was said in Mayfield v. Moore, supra: "Under the law, so soon as a majority of the votes was cast for appellant at the election held in pursuance to law, he became legally and fully entitled to the office. The title was as complete then as it ever was, and no subsequent act lent the least force to the right to the place. This commission was evidence of title, but not the title. The title was conferred by the people; and the evidence of the right, by the law." The contested election was continued through a long period of litigation, and, by the final adjudication of a court of competent jurisdiction, the appellee's right to the office was determined in his favor. That determination was after the term expired for which he had been elected. His right to recover does not depend upon his possession of a commission. The judgment of the court determined his right. Neither is his right to recover affected by the fact that he failed to give bond as collector for the years 1888, 1889, 1890, and failed to qualify. The statute requiring the oath of office and bond to be given by or within a specified time applies only to a person to whom the certificate of election has been given, or who has been declared elected. Where an election has been contested, and the contestant is declared elected, the requirement to qualify within a prescribed time does not apply until the termination of the contest. Furwell v. Adams, supra. The law will not require a useless act, and by taking the oath of office, and filing bonds, as collector, for the several years of 1888-89-90, no purpose could have been subserved, as the contest was not determined until after the full term had expired. Appellee's right of recovery is therefore not affected by these considerations.

The amount fixed by the county board as salary of the county treasurer is a question of fact settled by the adjudication of the circuit and appellate courts; but it is insisted that as a part of that salary was earned, and fees received, more than five years before filing the claim, in this case, to that amount, the statute of limitation of five years applies, and bars a recovery of the amount so earned. The concluding clause of section 15, chap. 83, Starr & C. Stat. Ill., provides that actions

"shall be commenced within five years next after the cause of action accrued." The cause of action, to this plaintiff, did not accrue, so that an action could be maintained therefor by him, until his right to the office was determined. The adjudication of the court, finding he was lawfully elected, for the first time entitled him to recover the salary incident to the office. His right then first accrued. The statute of limitation barred no part of this claim.

We find no error in the admission or exclusion of evidence, or in holding or refusing to hold propositions submitted to be held as law.

We do not desire to enter on a discussion of the question as to whether it is a hardship on Kreitz, or his estate, that he should be held to receive no compensation for his services: for, however great that hardship may be, the rule of law has been long settled in this state that the de jure officer may recover the fees or salary paid to a de facto officer. The rule is in accord with a sound public policy. Its tendency is that there would be less danger or frequency of usurpation or intrusion into an office. Its tendency is to cause greater caution in, and purify, elections, as one, with such danger attendant on illegal voting, would abstain from encouraging it. Its tendency is to cause a careful investigation into the right to an office, where a notice of contest is served and petition filed. Public interest is in accord with private right, when it is held that one lawfully elected to an office, and deprived of the office by another, may recover the salary or fees attendant on the office. The rule is not changed by reason of one holding a certificate of election, and entering in good faith, under a mistaken belief of right. However much the good faith of one entering, the right exists somewhere; and, if the right existed in another, he is an intruder in the office, and enters at his peril. As was said in Mayfield v. Moore, supra: "After the vote was canvassed by the clerk and justice of the peace, appellant promptly gave appellee notice that he would contest the election, and specifically pointed out the grounds. Being thus apprized of the grounds upon which appellant based his claim, the sources of information were open to him to learn the facts, and to have acted upon them. Failing to learn them, or, having done so, not heeding them, he has no reason to complain if he has to respond to the wrong perpetrated on another. He has intruded into appellant's office without right, and has received the profits of the office; and, like the person entering into the land of another with a defective title, he must answer for the profits." We find no error, and the judgment of the appellate court is affirmed.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

Andrew J. DRAKE, Exr., etc., of J. M. Kirk, Deceased, Appt.,
v.

LADY ENSLEY COAL, IRON & R. CO.

(.....Ala.....)

1. The pollution of the waters of a stream by washing iron ore, whereby the water is laden with refuse and débris, rendering it unfit for stock and drinking purposes and causing the deposit of a sediment upon portions of the farm of a lower proprietor, is an actionable injury to such proprietor, where the injury might have been prevented by the construction of proper basins to contain the water until the sediment was settled before turning the water back into the stream.
2. Case and not trespass is the proper form of action for applying a running stream to such uses as to render it impure and fill it with a sediment which is deposited on the land of a lower proprietor, thereby preventing him from putting the water to the ordinary uses, and damaging his land.
3. An executor who has taken possession of testator's real estate and held it since testator's death, for the purposes of administration and paying debts, may maintain an action for permanent injury to the land by sediment placed in the stream by an upper proprietor.

(February 2, 1894.)

NOTE.—How far stream may be polluted for mining purposes.

The efforts to make the development of the mining interests of the country appear of such commanding importance as to justify the destruction of other rights or interests for their benefit have not been successful so far as the pollution of streams is concerned. The general practice has been to apply against miners the common-law rule which entitles a riparian proprietor to have the water flow to him without material diminution in quality.

An upper riparian owner cannot use the water of the stream for mining purposes in such a way as to render it unfit for the domestic use of a lower proprietor, or so use it as to fill up the channel and cause the débris to be deposited on his land. Tennessee Coal, Iron & R. Co. v. Hamilton (Ala.) Nov. 28, 1893.

A miner cannot foul a stream so as to injure fruit trees and gardens on the banks of the stream below. Wixon v. Bear River & Auburn Water & Min. Co. 24 Cal. 367, 85 Am. Dec. 60.

Mining operations cannot be permitted to destroy the water for the use of gardens and domestic purposes. Levaroni v. Miller, 84 Cal. 231, 91 Am. Dec. 602.

Mining débris cannot be deposited in streams so as to run down and cover agricultural lands below. Hobbs v. Amador & S. Canal Co. 68 Cal. 161.

There is liability for deposit of débris of a mine in a stream so that it is carried down and deposited on the land of a lower proprietor. Robinson v. Black Diamond Coal Co. 57 Cal. 412, 40 Am. Rep. 118.

Depositing débris from a mine in such a way that it would be carried by a stream on to land of lower proprietors will give a right of action, if injury occurs. Columbus & H. Coal & Iron Co. v. Tucker, 48 Ohio St. 41.

A PPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Franklin County in his favor for a less amount than he demanded, in an action brought to recover damages alleged to have been caused by defendant's unlawfully polluting the water of a stream which flowed through the land of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Measrs. Kirk & Almon for appellant.
Mr. William J. Bullock for appellee.

Coleman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was instituted to recover damages for an alleged injury to realty. The complaint consists of several counts, some of which were framed in trespass, and others in case. The important questions for consideration, and the decision of which will determine the several assignments of error, are: First, whether the facts will support the complaint, in either of its aspects; and if so, second, whether the proper action is trespass or case; and, third, if the action is maintainable, what is the proper measure of damages? The trial court held that the action should be in case, that the statute of limitations for one year applied, and that the proper measure of damages was the diminution of the rental value for one year preceding the bringing of the action. The undisputed facts show that for many years prior Throwing coal dirt into a stream is a tort. Little Schuykill Nav. R. & Coal Co. v. Richards, 57 Pa. 142, 38 Am. Dec. 209.

A mine owner is liable for injuries caused by the deposit on lower lands of culm which he negligently permits to be washed into the stream. Elder v. Lykens Valley Coal Co. 157 Pa. 490.

A stream cannot be filled with refuse from coke ovens using raw coal not mined on the land on which the ovens are situated. Lantz v. Carnegie Bros. & Co. 145 Pa. 612.

Under the Georgia code, water cannot be used for washing ore in such a way as to destroy or injure its use by a lower proprietor. Satterfield v. Rowan, 83 Ga. 187.

Caring for tailings.

The problem of what to do with the tailings is one of the most difficult which the miner has.

The Colorado statute makes it the duty of the miner to take care of his own tailings upon his own property, or be responsible for the injuries that may arise from them. Fuller v. Swan River Placer Min. Co. 12 Colo. 12.

Owners of a mine on the side of a hill cannot allow their tailings to flow onto a prior claim located in the bed of a stream in such a way as to render the working of it impracticable. Logan v. Driscoll, 19 Cal. 623, 81 Am. Dec. 90.

A miner has no right to fill a stream with tailings so that it will flow down onto claims below. Nelson v. O'Neal, 1 Mont. 234.

And the same rule applies in cases not connected with streams.

One cannot throw the refuse of a mine down on lower land of another, although it is not carried by a watercourse. Robinson v. Black Diamond Min. Co. 50 Cal. 461; Lincoln v. Rodgers, 1 Mont. 217; Har- and up to the time of his death, which occurred in the year 1890, plaintiff's testator had owned and been in possession of the lands claimed to have been damaged, cultivating them as a farm, and since his death the plaintiff, as executor, had been in possession of the lands; that through the lands there flowed a creek of clear, healthy water, useful for, and used for, watering stock, and at times for drinking purposes; that defendant owned a tract of land above the land of plaintiff, on the same creek, from which, for five or six years previous to the bringing of the suit, defendant had been engaged in mining iron ore, and washing its ore with the waters of the creek; that for this purpose the water was pumped into large reservoirs, and, after utilizing the water in washing the iron ore, it was allowed to escape in a way so as to return to its natural channel, above plaintiff's land. There was evidence also tending to show that, when the water reached plaintiff's farm, it was laden with red clay, refuse ore, and débris, rendering it unfit for stock and drinking purposes, and that in some places a thick sediment or "slush" was deposited upon portions of the farm, impairing its fertility, and in some places it was so deep as to destroy its usefulness for cultivation. The evidence conflicted as to the extent of the damage sustained. The evidence also conflicted as to whether, by the construction of proper basins to receive and hold the water, after having been used by defendant, it could not have been retained until all the objectionable matter or substance contained in it had settled in the basins, so as to restore the water to its natural purity.

Appellee contends that, if there is error in the record, it is error without injury, inasmuch as plaintiff was not entitled to recover, in any event, and in support of his contention cites the case of Clifton Iron Co. v. Dye, 87 Ala. 468, in which the court uses this language: "The court will take notice that in the development of the mineral interests of this state, recently made, very large sums of money have been invested. The utilization of these ores, which must be washed before using, necessitates, in some measure, the placing of sediment where it may flow into streams which constitute the natural drainage of the section where the ore banks are situated. This must cause a deposit of sediment on the lands below; and, while this invasion of the rights of the lower riparian owner may produce injury entitling him to redress, the great public interests and benefits to flow from the conversion of these ores into pig metal should not be lost sight of. As said by the vice-chancellor in Wood v. Sutcliffe [2 Sim. N. S. 163], 'Whenever a court of equity is asked for an injunction in cases of such nature as this [a bill to enjoin the pollution of a stream], it must have regard, not only to the dry, strict rights of the plaintiff and defendant, but also to surrounding circumstances.'" He cites also the case of Hughes v. Anderson, 68 Ala. 280, 44 Am. Rep. 147, in which the court uses the following language: "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas" is the maxim—the rule—in such vey v. Sides Silver Min. Co. 1 Nev. 530, 90 Am. Dec. 510.

But each person mining in the same stream is entitled to use in a proper and reasonable manner both the channel of the stream and the water flowing therein; and where, from the situation of different claims, the working of some will necessarily result in injury to others, if the injury be the natural and necessary consequence of the exercise of this right, it will be damnum absque injuria. Edmond v. Chew, 15 Cal. 137.

The more extended the operations become the more the problem grows. When the system of hydraulic mining became perfected it was found that the débris from the mines was being carried down the streams with disastrous effect. Large stretches of country covered with buildings and hamlets were buried in some instances above the tops of the houses. Cities even had to fight to maintain their existence and the navigability of some of the largest streams was being imperiled. In this condition of affairs resort was had to the courts for relief. After a severe fight the lower proprietors finally obtained a decision from a United States court in which with an exceedingly valuable historical opinion it was held that persons mining by the hydraulic process may be enjoined from discharging the débris into a river whence it flows to the valley below burying valuable farms and creating a public and private nuisance. Woodruff v. North Bloomfield Gravel Min. Co. 8 Sawy. 623, 9 Sawy. 441, 16 Fed. Rep. 763.

Subsequently it became generally recognized that hydraulic mining may be enjoined. Eureka Lake & Yuba Canal Co. v. Yuba County Super Ct. 66 Cal. 311.

So hydraulic mining in such a way as to fill up and obstruct the water ditch of another with débris may be enjoined. McLaughlin v. Del Re, 71 Cal. 230-34 L. R. A.

In People v. Gold Run Ditch & Min. Co. 66 Cal. 138, an injunction was granted against hydraulic mining and Keyes v. Little York Gold Washing & Water Co. 53 Cal. 724, in which relief was denied because of misjoinder of parties, is stated to have been overruled in Hillman v. Newington, 87 Cal. 62.

But hydraulic mining is not so unlawful as to entitle a lower proprietor to an injunction against one who is selling water for the purpose, if there is nothing to show that he knows that the débris is being used so as to injure plaintiff. Yuba County v. Cloke, 79 Cal. 230.

These decisions so imperiled the mining industry that an attempt was made to obviate the necessity of an injunction by caring for the tailings and for this purpose the impounding dam was constructed.

It was then held that hydraulic mining will not be enjoined if sufficient impounding dams are constructed to remove the débris from the water before it is turned into the stream below. United States v. North Bloomfield Gravel Min. Co. 53 Fed. Rep. 625.

But an impounding dam should not be held sufficient, if the determination of its sufficiency rests on the opinions of engineers apparently equally intelligent and whose opinions are at variance; nor upon any evidence not of the most unquestionable and satisfactory character. Hardt v. Liberty Hill Consol. Min. & Water Co. 27 Fed. Rep. 738.

Mine water.

Another source of inconvenience and damage to the lower proprietor is the impregnation of the stream with water pumped from the mine.

In England it is held that an injunction may be awarded to restrain miners from pumping water from their mine into a stream to the injury of a case. See Stein v. Burden, 29 Ala. 127, 65 Am. Dec. 394. So, as a rule, every one must so enjoy his own property as not to offend his neighbor's equal right to enjoy his own unmolested. But this rule cannot be enforced, in its strict letter, without impeding rightful progress, and without hindering industrial enterprise. Hence, minor individual interest is sometimes made to yield to a larger and paramount good. To deny this principle would be to withhold from the world the inestimable benefits of discovery and progress in all the great enterprises of life. The rough outline of natural right or natural liberty must submit to the chisel of the mason, that it may enter symmetrically into the social structure." Notwithstanding the enunciation of this principle in favor of the public interest, the court was careful to declare: "Under these rules, defendant had no right, by ditches or otherwise, to cause water to flow on the lands of the plaintiff, which, in the absence of such ditches, would have flowed in a different direction." And it adopts the principle declared in Kauffman v. Griesemer, 26 Pa. 407, 67 Am. Dec. 437, in which it was declared that the obligation of the inferior heritage to the superior "applies only to waters which flow naturally, without any act of man. . . . It is not more agreeable to the laws of nature that water should descend, than it is that lands should be farmed and mined. The plaintiffs had no right to insist upon his receiving waters which nature never appointed to flow there."

The principle of law declared in 87 Ala., supra, does not sustain the proposition to which it was cited. That was a bill for an injunction to restrain the use of the washers.

Considerations arise in applications for injunctions which do not exert a controlling influence upon a right of action for damages; and in that very case it is said, "The plaintiff should have been remitted to a court of law for the recovery of his damages." The case of Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Sanderson, 118 Pa. 126, 57 Am. Rep. 445, cited by counsel, goes far to sustain the contention of appellee. In this case it is held that "the use and enjoyment of a stream of pure water for domestic purposes by the lower riparian owners . . . must, ex necessitate, give way to the interest of the community, in order to permit the development of the natural resources of the country, and to make possible the prosecution of the lawful business of mining coal." The conclusion reached is not in harmony with the prior decisions of the same court. The same principle announced in 118 Pa., supra, to some extent, has been applied in cases of irrigation. Schilling v. Rominger, 4 Colo. 100; Yunker v. Nichols, 1 Colo. 551. The case from 118 Pa., supra, is an authority we think very much weakened by the subsequent cases in the same state of Robb v. Carnegie Bros. & Co. 145 Pa. 324, 14 L. R. A. 329, and Lentz v. Carnegie Bros. & Co., 145 Pa. 612. In the latter cases it was held that "a manufacturer of coke from coal not mined on his own land is liable in actual damages to a lower proprietor for the pollution of a stream as a necessary incident to his business, and also for actual damages done to crops and the soil." The case in 118 Pa. is not overruled, but is commented on, and the distinction is drawn that in the latter case (118 Pa.) the ore was being mined by the owner of the soil, and in the two later cases the coke was not lower proprietor. Pennington v. Brinsop Hall Coal Co. L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 769, 45 L. J. Ch. 774, 37 L. T. N. S. 149, 25 Week. Rep. 374.

In Pennsylvania it was at first held that mine water cannot be dumped into a clear stream which is used for domestic purposes in such a way as to render it useless for those purposes. Sanderson v. Pennsylvania Coal Co. 86 Pa. 401, 27 Am. Rep. 711.

That rule was recognized in the same case when it was twice again before the court. 94 Pa. 302, 39 Am. Rep. 789, 102 Pa. 370.

But in Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Sanderson, 118 Pa. 126, 57 Am. Rep. 445, it was distinctly overruled on the ground that individual rights must give way to the mining interests. But in that case decisions upon the question of casting material into the water which fouled it were distinguished on the ground that water coming from the mine in the case before the court was in its natural state, and the stream was used merely for natural drainage purposes.

Mine water cannot, however, be conducted a distance of five miles out of its natural course and dumped into a stream watering an agricultural region, when it could as readily be dumped into a stream draining a mining region, without inconvenience or detriment to the working of the mine. Williams v. Union Imp. Co. 1 Pa. Dist. Rep. 288.

Refusal of injunction.

The injunction will not issue if it is not clear that the pollution has occurred. New Boston Coal & Min. Co. v. Pottsville Water Co. 54 Pa. 164, 24 L. R. A.

A stamp mill will not be enjoined at the suit of one who purchased for a speculation lands in the bottoms below it, on which it is depositing sand, which he then attempts to sell at an exorbitant price to the mill company, and failing, files his bill for an injunction. Edwards v. Alloway Min. Co. 38 Mich. 46, 81 Am. Rep. 801.

An injunction will not be granted if complainant has another water supply, and the stream into which the mining debris is turned is also polluted to some extent by sewage from a city, while complainant has been guilty of laches and defendant is able to respond in damages for the injuries. Clifton Iron Co. v. Dye, 87 Ala. 468.

Estoppel.

The grantor of a right to use a stream to water meadows, and which, under the grant, is applied for more than twenty-one years to water stock, cannot afterwards foul the stream and make it unfit for the purpose to which it was put. Wheatley v. Chrisman, 24 Pa. 298, 64 Am. Dec. 657.

Joint tort.

When a large number of persons are mining on the same stream, and each deteriorates the water a little, so that the combined acts of all render the water unfit for use, each cannot defend successfully an action for the damage on the ground that his act alone did not materially affect the water. Hill v. Smith, 32 Cal. 106.

Prior appropriation.

The above rules are somewhat modified by the doctrine of prior appropriation which became es-mined on the land upon which it was manufactured. It seems to us that if, in the case where the coal was mined on the land of the owner, he was exempt from damages, upon the ground that the individual or minor interest must yield to the greater and paramount interest of the public, it would make but little difference where the coke was mined. The manufacturing of the coke from the ore was that which contributed to the paramount and public interest. On the other hand, if the owner is to be exempted from liability because the ore was mined on his own land, and not because of public benefit, then the doctrine of "sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas" would be abolished, and the rights of lower riparian proprietors, almost universally recognized and protected, would be destroyed. A lower proprietor purchases under the protection of the rule that "qua currit, et debet currere, ut solebat," at least to the extent that the servitude of his land shall not be added to by artificial means or the industry of man. Byington v. Longley, 19 Nev. 69, 8 Am. St. Rep. 781, and note.

Under the provisions of the constitution, private property cannot be taken for public uses, or for corporations, without just compensation being first made to the owner, except by his consent. The courts—and it was never intended to be otherwise understood—are not the "masons" to "chisel" away vested rights of property of private individuals, however humble and obscure the owner, for the benefit of the public or great corporations. It is the pride of this republic that no man can be deprived of his property without due process of law, and the poorest citizen can find redress for an unlawful injury caused by his wealthy neighbor, by appealing to the courts of his country.

We are satisfied that plaintiff's complaint showed a good cause of action, and there was evidence tending to sustain it. Tennessee Coal, Iron & R. Co. v. Hamilton (Ala.) 14 So. Rep. 167; Hughes v. Anderson, Cifton Iron Co. v. Dye, Byington v. Longley, Robo v. Carnegie Bros. & Co. and Lentz v. Carnegie Bros. & Co. supra; Crabtree v. Baker, 75 Ala. 91, 51 Am. Rep. 424; Furris v. Dudley, 78 Ala. 124, 56 Am. Rep. 24; Stein v. Burden, 29 Ala. 127, 65 Am. Dec. 394; Pettigrew v. Evansville, 25 Wis. 223, 3 Am. Rep. 50; 6 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 149.

We are of opinion the trial court ruled properly in holding that under the facts of the case the plaintiff could recover only on the counts in case. The boundary line between where trespass ends and case begins is not always easily determined. Under the law the defendant had the right to divert the water from its channel and utilize it in washing the ore. His duty was to return the water to its proper channel. This was done. The tort to plaintiff was neither in the diversion of the water from its channel, nor that defendant used it for his own purposes, but that the use to which it was applied rendered it impure, filled it with clay and objectionable ore and debris, and in this condition it was carried by the flow of the water to plaintiff's farm. The damage inflicted was neither intentional nor direct nor immediate, but was consequential. The evidence of plaintiff which tended to show that the injury was the result of negligence in failing to provide proper basins to contain the water after use, until the sediment settled and the water became pure, if actionable, was clearly in case. Polly v. McCall, 37 Ala. 21; Pruitt v. Ellington, 59 Ala. 454; Bell v. Troy, 35 Ala. 184; Roundtree v. Brantley, 34 Ala. 544, 78 Am. Dec. 470; Williams v. Hay, 120 Pa. 485; 2 Wait, Act. & Def. 110.

We are of opinion the court erred in republished with reference to streams flowing on the public lands of the United States.

Upon the principles as to prior appropriators settled by Irwin v. Phillips, 5 Cal. 140, 63 Am. Dec. 113, a lower proprietor could probably not object to the fouling of water, if he acquired his rights after those of the upper appropriator had become fixed.

But the prior appropriator must permit the water to flow on for the use of the lower proprietors, subject only to the reasonable deterioration in quality and diminution in quantity made necessary by the use of it by him for the purpose for which he appropriated it. Alder Gulch Consol. Min. Co. v. Hayes, 6 Mont. 81.

Most of the decisions upon the subject, however, have been upon the question of the first appropriator's rights against persons subsequently locating further up the stream.

In Hill v. King, 8 Cal. 356, the court at first held that the first appropriator was entitled to the flow of the water pure and undiminished, but on rehearing the doctrine of Bear River & Auburn Water & Min. Co. v. New York Min. Co. 8 Cal. 327, 65 Am. Dec. 325, was followed, which held that the first appropriator is not entitled to have the quality preserved the same as when he acquired his rights, and that ruling was followed in Mokelumne Hill Canal & Min. Co. v. Woodbury, 10 Cal. 185.

In Hill v. Smith, 27 Cal. 476, the court, without referring to Bear River & Auburn Water & Min. Co. v. New York Min. Co. supra, held that a later owner could not so far deteriorate the quality of the water as to render it largely unfit for the purpose for which it was appropriated and make it carry such a quantity of sediment as to impose much labor and expense upon the prior appropriator to keep his ditch clear so that it could carry the water in sufficient quantities to answer his purpose.

In Montana it is held that the first appropriator is entitled to water without material diminution in quantity or quality. Atchison v. Peterson, 1 Mont. 561.

So in Utah water appropriated for domestic and culinary purposes cannot be impaired by the operation of a rock crusher on the stream above the head of the ditch through which it is carried. Crane v. Winsor, 2 Utah, 248.

But a prior appropriator will not be granted an injunction to prevent mining operations by an upper proprietor who permits his tailings to run down the stream, if the latter is fifteen miles further up the stream and numerous tributaries of clear water enter the stream between the two points, while the evidence leaves the question very doubtful as to how much the mining affects the quality of the water, and at most it requires merely a sand gate at the end of the appropriator's ditch and the labor of one man a few minutes each day to make the water fit for such appropriator's purpose. Atchison v. Peterson, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 507, 22 L. ed. 414. H. P. F.

stricting the damages recoverable to the diminution of the rental value for one year. The lands had belonged to plaintiff's testator, and plaintiff was the executor. The legal title was not in him, but the record states that plaintiff had held possession as executor of the lands "since the death of testator." Lands of a decedent are subject to administration, and liable for the payment of his debts. For purposes of administration and for the payment of debts, the executor had authority to take possession of the land, and he had asserted his authority. There was some evidence tending to show permanent injury to some portions of the land. Under the facts, no one could sue for the permanent injury sustained, except the executor, at the time of the institution of this suit. Calhoun v. Fletcher, 68 Ala. 574; Nelson v. Murfee, 69 Ala. 598. The heirs may never succeed to the legal possession and ownership of the land. It was proper to consider the diminution of the rental value, but it was not the exclusive rule for measuring the damages. The difference between the value of the land with and without the permanent injury is recoverable.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Nebraska, Plff. in Err.,

Ezra M. BUSWELL.

*1. The act to establish a state board of health; to regulate the practice of medicine in Nebraska, etc.,—is as much directed against any unauthorized person who shall operate on, profess to heal, or prescribe for, or otherwise treat any physical or mental ailment of another, as against one who practices "medicine, surgery, and obstetrics," as those terms are usually and generally understood.

*2. The object of the statute establishing a state board of health, etc., is to prevent imposition upon the afflicted by ignorant and unqualified pretenders to healing power; and any person not within the exceptions prescribed in said act, and not having complied with its requirements as to a certificate who shall, under any pretense, operate on, profess to heal, or prescribe for, or otherwise treat any physical or mental ailment of another, thereby renders himself liable to its penalties.

EXCEPTIONS by the prosecuting attorney to rulings of the District Court for Gage County, which resulted in the acquittal of the defendant, who was on trial for practicing medicine as a Christian Scientist, without a certificate from the state board of health. Exceptions sustained.

The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. George H. Hastings, Atty. Gen., and R. W. Sabin, County Atty. for Gage County, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Richards & Prout, and Alfred Haslett, for defendant in error:

The section under consideration was drafted by a committee appointed by the state medical society and for the purpose of debarring, if possible, the people of the Christian science faith from carrying out the tenets of their religion and "worshiping Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences."

Smith v. Lane, 24 Hun, 632, was an action brought by the plaintiff to recover for services in the treatment of the defendant for bodily ills. The treatment consisted wholly in rubbing, kneading and pressure. The defendant resisted the claim wholly on the ground that the plaintiff was not a graduate of any medical school, and had no license permitting him to practice either medicine or surgery under the general laws of the state. The court says: "It is manifest that the object of the legislature in the enactment of the chapter was only to provide for regulating the practice of medicine or surgery, as those terms are usually or generally understood, and confining them to such significance, it is evident that they would not include the occupation of the plaintiff. The practice of medicine is a pursuit very generally known and understood, and so also is that of surgery. The former includes the application and use of medicines and drugs for the purpose of curing, mitigating or alleviating bodily diseases, while the functions of the latter are limited to manual operations usually performed by surgical instruments or appliances. It was entirely proper for the legislature, by means of this chapter, to prescribe the qualifications of the persons who might be intrusted with the performance of these very important duties. . . . If the plaintiff's pretensions were well founded then diseases would no longer be formidable, and even death itself would be deprived of its terrors. But because he has professed more than he has the ability to accomplish he cannot, on that account, be subjected to the disability provided for in this act. His system of practice was rather that of nursing than of either medicine or surgery. It could, in no event result in any other injury to the person practiced upon than that of possible financial loss. No bodily disability or diseases could either result from or be aggravated by the applications made by him. And what he did in no just sense either constituted the practice of medicine or surgery."

To place upon this section the construction contended for by the state, and to hold that practices of the defendant are a violation of the law would be to abrogate section 4 of article 1 of the Constitution of this state, which provides that "all persons have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences."

Medicine is not a science, although many of our medical brethren delight in so terming it. Dr. Magendie, an eminent French physician in charge of a Paris hospital, at one time experimented with about four thousand patients under his charge. He divided them equally in three classes, one third he treated according to the prescribed methods of the profession, to another third he gave nothing but bread pills, under the guise of medicine, to the remaining class he gave no medicine whatever, simply the careful nursing of the hospital. The result of the experiment was that of the first class who were treated in the ordinary manner a larger part of them died; of the second class, who were treated with bread pills, a small percent died; of the third class, who received simple nursing, every one recovered. After relating to the students of the Paris medical college the result of the experiment the doctor continued: "Gentlemen: Medicine is a great humbug, it is nothing like science. Doctors are mere empirics, when they are not charlatans. We are ignorant as men can be. I must tell you frankly that I know nothing about medicine. I repeat to you there is no such thing as medical science. I grant you people are cured, but how? Nature does a great deal, but doctors do devilish little."

Sir Astley Cooper, the eminent English physician, said: "The science of medicine is founded on conjecture and improved by murder."

Dr. Armour, of the Long Island College Hospital, in an article in the New York Medical Journal, for January, 1883, says: "Drugs are administered, patients sometimes recover, and we have supposed that we have cured them whereas our remedies have had little or nothing to do with their recovery; very likely it took place in spite of the drugs."

Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, in an address to the Massachusetts Medical Society, said: "I firmly believe that if the whole Materia Medica could be sunk to the bottom of the sea, it would be all the better for mankind and all the worse for the fishes."

It is the work of this profession that is sought to be protected by the act under consideration and by this class of legislation wherever met with.

The most specious excuse for not extending to medical advice the principle of free trade is the same as that given for not leaving education to be diffused under them; namely, that the judgment of the consumer is not a sufficient guarantee for the goodness of the commodity. The intolerance shown by orthodox surgeons and physicians toward unordained followers of their calling is to be understood as arising from a desire to defend the public against quackery. Ignorant people, say they, cannot distinguish good treatment from bad, or skillful advisers from unskillful ones; hence, it is needful that the choice be made for them. And then, following in the track of priesthood, for whose persecutions a similar defense has always been set up, they agitate for more stringent regulations against unlicensed practitioners, and descant upon the dangers to which men are exposed by an unrestricted system.

Spencer, Social Statistics, pp. 408-411.

Ryan, C., filed the following opinion:

The material parts of the indictment upon which the defendant was tried were in the following language: "That Ezra M. Buswell, late of the county aforesaid, on the first day of September in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one, in the county of Gage and state of Nebraska aforesaid, then and there an illiterate man, and unskilled in the art and faculty of medicine and surgery, and devising and intending by divers unlawful means, falsely, unlawfully, craftily, and wickedly, to deceive and defraud the people and citizens of said county of their goods, chattels, and money, to maintain his dishonest course of living, on the first day of September in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one, and thence continually until the finding of this indictment, to wit, for the space of eighteen months, at divers places in said county, falsely and unlawfully did assume upon himself to execute, exercise, and occupy the art, faculty, and science of a physician and surgeon, and did then and there profess to heal and otherwise treat sick persons, of their physical and mental ailments, and did then and there, falsely and fraudulently, as a physician and pretended healer of sick persons, attend on sick persons, and persons with various infirmities, diseases, and wounds, and treat them, and profess to heal them, in the city of Beatrice, and divers other places in said county,—the said Ezra M. Buswell never having been a graduate from any medical college; nor had he a diploma from any medical college, as required by law, to practice medicine in said state, nor had he a certificate from the state board of health of said state, entitling him to practice medicine or surgery, or otherwise treat, or profess to heal, physical or mental ailments, nor had he complied with the law, in any respect, so as to entitle him to practice medicine or surgery, or treat, in any manner, physical or mental ailments; nor had he confined himself to administering gratuitous services in cases of emergency, or to the administering of ordinary household remedies." The defendant was acquitted, and the case is brought to this court under the provisions of sections 483, 515-517, of the Criminal Code. To a compliance on our part with the provisions of the sections just referred to, it is necessary only to consider the sixth instruction given at the request of the defendant. This instruction was in the following language: "(6) The jury are instructed, as a matter of law, that it is manifest, from the law under which defendant is indicted, that the object of the legislature in the enactment thereof was only to provide for the regulation of the practice of 'medicine, sur, gery, and obstetrics,' as these terms are generally understood; and unless you believe from the evidence, and beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, within the time mentioned in the indictment, practiced 'medicine, surgery and obstetrics,' as these terms are usually and generally understood, then you will find the defendant not guilty." The law to which reference was made in the instruction is found in chapter 85 of the Laws of 1891. The Act constituting chapter 85, aforesaid, was entitled "An Act to Establish a State Board of Health; to Regulate the Practice of Medicine in the State of Nebraska," etc. Section 17 thereof was as follows: "Sec. 17. Any person shall be regarded as practicing medicine within the meaning of this act who shall operate on, profess to heal, or prescribe for or otherwise treat any physical or mental ailment of another; but nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit gratuitous services in case of emergency, and this act shall not apply to commissioned surgeons of the United States army or navy, nor to nurses in their legitimate occupations, nor to the administering of ordinary household remedies." The other provisions of the act are, for our purpose, sufficiently indicated in the language already quoted from the indictment. The instruction complained of required, as an indispensable prerequisite to a conviction, that the jury should find that the defendant, within the time mentioned in the indictment, had practiced "medicine, surgery, or obstetrics," as those terms are usually and generally understood. Governed by this instruction, the jury could not do otherwise than acquit, for there was no proof to meet its requirement. Whether or not the instruction was proper, in view of the evidence adduced, is the sole question presented for our determination.

It is conceded that the perfect toleration of religious sentiment, and enjoyment of liberty in all religious matters, is of paramount importance; and, lest the contention of the defendant may be misunderstood or imperfectly stated in our own language, that contained in the brief filed on behalf of the defendant will be freely used. Such evidence as was in that brief, deemed sufficient to illustrate the argument for defendant, was as follows: Richard Walthers testified that his brother's boy came home from Florida in September, 1892; that there were running sores on his legs, caused by rheumatism, and that he could not walk, except by the aid of crutches; that after the defendant had seen him, about two weeks after the boy came back, he laid aside his crutches, and walked by the aid of a cane, and after using that for awhile, threw it away, and walked as other boys do. James Ellerbeck testified to having been bitten by a rattlesnake, and that he at once sought the defendant, and asked him for help. After talking with the defendant at the church rooms, they went to Rev. Buswell's house; and what took place there is best told in the language of the witness himself: "Q. What did you do then? A. The pain ceased after his treatment, and after driving to his house it seemed to get worse, until about 8 o'clock. He talked to me on the Bible, and different subjects in the Bible, and about 8 o'clock he said he would treat me again. I laid down on a lounge, and he sat down, and put his hands over his face, and was in that position, may be, ten or fifteen minutes; and all at once I felt it come right through me, and it raised me up, and I sat on the lounge, and I told him I had wakened up. And from that time on I had no more pain, only there was one or two minutes, when I first got up, and put my foot on the floor, that the stiffness seemed to be hard, for a few minutes. Now, during all this time, I never lost a meal, nor an hour's sleep, after that one treatment." L. Bushnell testified that he was afflicted with a disease that baffled the skill of the physicians who advised him, if he could obtain assistance from scientists that he should try; that he then sought aid from them, and a very short time afterwards was able to go about as usual, and sawed wood for the people of the village in order to earn his livelihood; that about three years prior to the time of giving his testimony, he had fallen down a flight of stairs, and had received serious injuries; that the defendant was sent for, and visited him; and that he recovered without any other aid than that of the prayers of the defendant. The witness Burgess testified of his serious illness from pneumonia, and that the defendant called on him, and explained the Scripture to him, and prayed for him, and that in a short time he recovered. Mrs. Gibbs testified that in the previous January her little boy, four years of age, had an attack of scarlet fever; that the physicians pronounced his case hopeless; that the child was treated by the scientists, and fully recovered. The defendant, Buswell, having been sworn, testified that he was a Christian scientist, so far as he understood, and that he lived up to the teachings of Jesus Christ; that he first studied the Christian science in his home, at Beatrice, and was cured of physical ills through that study. After that he studied with Mary B. G. Eddy in her Metaphysical College, in Boston, of which college he was afterwards a graduate. The term "Christian," as he understood it, means "Christlike;" the teachings of Jesus understood and followed; science, truth understood. He further testified that the Scripture teaches us that God is truth. "Truth," the witness said, "is that which is always the same, can never change; the one Supreme Being, the All Powerful; that which created all things that are; He who made all that was made, and made it good, as is said in His Word. The Scripture tells us to know the truth, and it will make us free. We understand 'to be free' means to be free in the full sense,—free from sickness as well as from sin; that if God can heal the sinner he can heal the sick, or else the sick are more hopelessly lost than the sinner." "The Christian Science Church," said the witness, "has a recognized code and textbooks of theology. These text books are the Bible, Science and Health. Rev. Mary B. G. Eddy, of Boston, is the author of the book called 'Science and Health.' It and the Bible are the recognized standard among Christian scientists, and adherents of that faith." The accused further testified that he had not practiced surgery or medicine, or any of the branches thereof, within the state of Nebraska, within eighteen months preceding the trial; that, in a medical sense, he had not, within eighteen months, treated any physical or mental ailment within that time, for, said he, "I understand with God's laws, and not mortal man's. We can experience this only as we learn of the nothingness of mortal man, and of the omnipotence of God. When persons request aid, and come to us for advice and assistance, we treat them as a mother treats her child that is frightened at some object it fears,—by showing them that God is love, and understanding the all presence of love, there is no room for fear. We treat it as a question of fear; that is, we seek to dispel the fear by showing them the presence of love. The Scripture tells us that perfect love casts out fear. If we can convince ourselves, and those that are suffering, that God is all powerful, and that God is supreme; if we can show them, through the Bible, that God is the power that reigns entirely,—just so far as they understand that, so far will they experience love and harmony, and respond, as we speak of it. So far as I understand them, I have taught and teach the doctrine of Christian Science. Prayer enters into our work. We are taught by the Scripture to pray always. We understand prayer to mean the earnest, sincere desire of the heart; and that desire is that we may know the omnipotence of God, and the nothingness of ourselves. Our authority for this treatment is the Scripture,—Jesus' teachings. Jesus taught His disciples to go out in the world, and He healed the sick, and cast out devils, and raised the dead; and He further said (His last words before his ascension): 'Teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.' 'Teach them, if you are My disciples, to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and lo! I am with you always, even unto the end of the world.' We believe and understand, so far as we obey him, that the same power is for us to-day, as well as eighteen hundred years ago." Continuing his evidence, this witness said: "I have been engaged in this work since I first began to read 'Science and Health' in connection with the Bible, which was eight years ago. I was healed from physical ills through the 'Science and Health' and the Scripture. I was not treated by Christian scientists." In the course of his testimony, this question was asked the witness, and the following answer was elicited: "Q. What is your custom in allowing people and parents to call physicians,—the custom of yourself and church? A. We believe that every one has a right to express their wish, and it is always understood that if they prefer some other treatment, or some other mode, or some one else to aid them, it is their privilege. We always do that. It is taught in our text-books. We never give any medicine. That is entirely contrary to the teaching of Christian-science. I treated Mr. Burgess about three years ago. I found him suffering a great deal. If I remember, he was not able to sit up; was bolstered up in bed, I think. I treated him solemnly, and talked with him of the teaching of the Scripture, and read to him from them, and also from 'Science and Health,' and sought to show him that there was a greater power than man, and that that power ruled in love, and, in proportion as that power was understood, we should realize (demonstrate) the presence of love. At the end of a week, he was able to go to his stock yards. I have no way of knowing the number of persons I have treated within eighteen months by means of Christian science. I may have treated a hundred or more. Of these, only two died."

Commenting upon the facts, counsel for defendant make use of the language following: "To place upon this section [17, supra] the construction contended for by the state, and to hold that the practices of the defendant are a violation of the law, would be to abrogate section 4, article 1, of the Constitution of this state, which provides that all persons have the natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own conscience, and also the second provision of section 4 of the Enabling Act, which provides that perfect toleration of religious sentiments shall be secured, and no inhabitant of said state shall ever be molested, in person or property, on account of his or her mode of religious worship. The defendant, and those of the same faith with him, believe, as a matter of conscience, that the giving of medicine is a sin; that it is placing faith in the power of material things, which belongs alone to Omnipotence. To the Christian scientist, it is as much a violation of the law of God to take drugs for the alleviation of suffering or the cure of disease, as for a Methodist clergyman to take the name of his God in vain to relieve his overwrought feelings. It is as much the duty of the defendant, as his conscience and understanding teach him his duty, to visit the sick and afflicted, and relieve their distress of mind, as it is for the Presbyterian minister to go into his pulpit on Sabbath morning and preach the word of God according to the understanding of that denomination, or visit the bedside of one of his sick parishioners, and administer that religious consolation which is so dear to the heart of the Christian, and which is apparently so necessary to their spiritual welfare. The act of the latter, the eyes of all Christendom look upon in admiration, as the performance of a Christian duty. Upon the former, the able counsel for the state would have the world look as upon the act of a criminal."

The defendant relied upon the teachings of the Bible as his authority as a Christian scientist. It will not, therefore, be amiss to refer to it for instances applicable to his case. In the eighth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, we find an account of Simon, a sorcerer, who had used sorcery, and bewitched the people of Samaria, giving out that himself was some great one. This Simon was thought to be the possessor of great power. Under the ministrations of Philip, he believed, and was baptized. Thereafter, sufficiently for our purpose, there follows a statement of the conduct of this convert, beginning with the eighteenth, and ending with the twenty-third, verse of the chapter just cited. These verses are as follows:

"18. And when Simon saw that, through laying on of the apostles' hands, the Holy Ghost was given, he offered them money,

"19. Saying, Give me also this power, that on whomsoever I lay hands he may receive the Holy Ghost.

"20. But Peter said unto him, Thy money perish with thee, because thou has thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money.

"21. Thou has neither part nor lot in this matter; for thy heart is not right in the sight of God.

"22. Repent therefore of this thy wickedness, and pray God, if perhaps the thought of thine heart may be forgiven thee.

"23. For I perceive that thou art in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity."

It would seem, from this account, that Simon regarded the gift of the Holy Ghost, by the laying on of hands, as something akin to, and an improvement upon, the sorcery which he himself had practiced, and, therefore, that its advantages were proper subjects of barter. The language of Peter, "Thy money perish with thee, because thou has thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money," was a most emphatic and authoritative refutation of the idea that this special gift of God could form a proper basis for money transactions. The universal reprobation in which the conduct of Simon has ever been held has crystallized in the Latin word "Simonia," the English, "Simony," etc.; the derivative, in each instance, signifying either the crime of buying or selling ecclesiastical preferment, or the corrupt presentation of any one to an ecclesiastical benefice for money or reward. In the case at bar the defendant testified as follows: "Q. You may state whether or not you make any charges when people come to you for advice, or when you go to them. A. As a rule I do not. We tell them we leave the question to them and God. I spend my whole time at work, showing the people, through examination and administration, what the teachings of the Scripture are; and Jesus says the laborer is worthy of his meat (?), and we expect that those who we spend our time for to remunerate us for it. If they are not willing to part with the sacrifice themselves, it is not expected that those should reap the benefit." This language puts the matter of compensation in a milder form than that adopted by Simon in the case above cited, but that even this modified claim is open to serious objection we think still further illustrated by an instance to which reference will now be made. In the fifth chapter of the second book of Kings, there is an account of the healing of Naaman of leprosy by compliance with a very simple hydropathic course of treatment prescribed by the prophet Elisha. After he was healed, Naaman said to Elisha, "I pray thee, take a blessing of thy servant;" but Elisha said, "As the Lord liveth, before whom I stand, I will receive none." And he urged him to take it, but he refused. The subsequent proceedings are best given in the language found in verses 20 to 27, inclusive.

"20. But Gehazi, the servant of Elisha the man of God, said, Behold, my master has spared Naaman this Syrian, in not receiving at his hands that which he brought: but as the Lord liveth, I will run after him, and take somewhat of him.

"21. So Gehazi followed after Naaman. And when Naaman saw him running after him, he lighted down from the chariot to meet him, and said, Is all well?

"23. And he said, All is well. My master hath sent me, saying, Behold, even now there be come to me from Mount Ephraim two young men of the sons of the prophets: give them, I pray thee, a talent of silver, and two changes of garments.

"23. And Naaman said, Be content, take two talents. And he urged him, and bound two talents of silver in two bags, with two changes of garments, and laid them upon two of his servants, and they bare them before him.

"24. And when he came to the tower, he took them from their hand, and bestowed them in the house: and he let the men go, and they departed.

"25. But he went in, and stood before his master. And Elisha said unto him, Whence comest thou, Gehazi? And he said, Thy servant went no whither.

"26. And he said unto him, Went not mine heart with thee, when the man turned again from his chariot to meet thee? Is it a time to receive money, and to receive garments, and olive yards, and vineyards, and sheep, and oxen, and men servants, and maid servants?

"27. The leprosy therefore of Naaman shall cleave unto thee, and thy seed forever. And he went out from his presence a leper as white as snow."

In chapter 22 et seq. of Numbers is recorded God's disapproval of Baalam's partly executed project of profiting by the use of the Divine power with which he was endowed.

In the light of these instances cited from defendant's own authority, it is confidently believed that the exercise of the art of healing for compensation, whether exacted as a fee or expected as a gratuity, cannot be classed as an act of worship. Neither is it the performance of a religious duty, as was claimed in the district court. There is no claim in this case that compensation, in one or the other of these methods, was not accepted when tendered. The evidence affirmatively shows the contrary. Not only is this true, but we find a very considerable part of defendant's brief devoted to an argument as to the inefficiency of the established and recognized modes of treatment in the cure of diseases, as compared with defendant's method, as tested by the results attained. The evidence upon which the case was tried convinces us that the defendant was engaged in treating physical ailments of others for compensation. He was within none of the exceptions provided by statute. The instruction which required that, to a conviction, he should be found guilty of practicing medicine, surgery, or obstetrics, as generally or usually understood, was erroneous. The object of the statute is to protect the afflicted from the pretensions of the ignorant and avaricious, and its provisions are not limited to those who attempt to follow beaten paths and established usages. The conservatism resulting from the study of standard authors might be somewhat depended on to minimize the evils attendant upon unlicensed practitioners' attempts to follow regular and approved methods, although, as against even these, the law should be enforced. Still more stringently should its provisions be rendered effective against pretensions based upon ignorance, on the one hand, and credulity, on the other. The statute does not merely give a new definition to language having already a given and fixed meaning. It rather created a new class of offenses, in clear and unambiguous language, which should be interpreted and enforced according to its terms. Under the indictment the sole question presented, upon the evidence, was whether or not the defendant, within the time charged, had operated on, or professed to heal, or prescribe for, or otherwise treated, any physical or mental ailment of another. There was involved no question of sentiment, nor of religious practice or duty. If the defendant was guilty as charged, neither pretense of worship, nor of the performance of any other duty, should have exonerated him from the punishment which an infraction of the statute involved. In cases presented as is this case, no judgment can be rendered in this court, and therefore none will be attempted. The exceptions of the county attorney are sustained.

2. Words which have acquired a well understood meaning by judicial interpretation must be presumed to be used in that sense in a subsequent statute, unless the contrary clearly appears.
3. Common-law terms used in an Act of Congress creating an offense without defining the terms may be interpreted by the common law.
4. Contracts between carriers are not necessarily invalid because they incidentally restrict competition, but this depends upon their reasonableness.
5. An alleged violation of the Anti-Trust Act of Congress must be clearly within its provisions, as the statute is a criminal one.
6. Fraud and illegality in contracts are not to be presumed.
7. An association of railroad companies for mutual protection by establishing and maintaining reasonable rates, rules and regulations is not illegal as a restraint of trade, under the Anti-Trust Act of Congress, merely because it incidentally tends to restrict competition in some degree, where each member of the association must still compete with other members for business, and while regular monthly meetings are provided for at which action may be taken, five days' notice of any proposed reduction of rates or change of rules must be given, and members are bound by the decision of the association, unless they give written notice in ten days thereafter to the contrary, and any member may withdraw on thirty days' notice.
8. An association of railroad companies cannot be held to create a monopoly, within the meaning of the Anti-Trust Act of Congress, where it is not intended to have any trade of its own, but to be a mere adviser of its members, who are competitors of each other.

9. A contract between competing railroad companies is not necessarily "in restraint of trade" and illegal, within the meaning of the Anti-Trust Act of Congress, because it in some manner imposes a restriction upon competition.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kansas in favor of defendants in a proceeding to dissolve the Trans-Missouri Freight Association on the ground that it had violated the United States Anti-Trust Act. Affirmed.

Statement by Sanborn, Circuit Judge:

This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court dismissing a bill brought by the United States against the Trans-Missouri Freight Association and eighteen railroad companies under the provisions of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled, "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies," commonly known as the "Sherman Anti-Trust Act" (26 Stat. at L. 209, chap. 647; Rev. Stat. Supp. 762) to dissolve the association, and enjoin the railroad companies from fulfilling an agreement with each other to have and maintain joint rules, regulations and rates for carrying freight between competing points upon their several roads. The case was heard on the bill and the answers of the several defendants.

The bill alleges that the defendant rail-

NOTE.—The Anti-Trust Act of Congress receives in the above case an extraordinary discussion and review. The briefs of counsel and the opinion of the court very exhaustively present the law applicable to the subject. The decision is quite in accord with that of Queen Ins. Co. v. State (Tex.) 22 L. R. A. 433.

Since this case was prepared for publication we have learned that it has been taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, but considering its great practical importance it is deemed best to report it here without waiting for the decision of that court.

road companies were corporations and common carriers, and that they owned independent and competing lines of railroad in that part of the United States west of the Mississippi and Missouri rivers; that they were engaged in transporting freight among the states and to and from foreign nations, and that they had been encouraged to construct and maintain these competing lines of railroad independent of each other by subsidies and grants of lands from the United States and the people of the states and territories west of these great rivers. The bill then alleges that, not being content with the rates of freight they were receiving, intending oppressively to augment those rates, to counteract the effect of free competition upon them, to establish and maintain arbitrary rates, and to procure large sums of money from the people of those states and territories engaged in interstate commerce, they entered into an agreement on March 15, 1889, which, as subsequently modified, reads thus:

"Memorandum of agreement, made and entered into this fifteenth day of March, 1889, by and between the following railroad companies, viz: Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad, Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway, Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway, Burlington & Missouri River Railroad in Nebraska, Denver & Rio Grande Railroad, Denver & Rio Grande Western Railway, Fremont, Elkhorn & Missouri Valley Railroad, Kansas City, Ft. Scott & Memphis Railroad, Kansas City, St. Joseph & Council Bluffs Railroad, Missouri Pacific Railway, Sioux City & Pacific Railroad, St. Joseph & Grand Island Railroad, St. Louis & San Francisco Railway, Union Pacific Railway, Utah Central Railway, and such other companies as may hereafter become parties hereto. Witnesseth, for the purpose of mutual protection, by establishing and maintaining reasonable rates, rules, and regulations on all freight traffic, both through and local, the subscribers do hereby form an association, to be known as the Trans-Missouri Freight Association, and agree to be governed by the following provisions:

"Article I.

"The traffic to be included in the Trans-Missouri Freight Association shall be as follows:

"1. All traffic competitive between any two or more members hereof passing between points in the following described territory, commencing at the Gulf of Mexico, on the 95th meridian; thence north to the Red river; thence via that river to the eastern boundary line of the Indian territory; thence north by said boundary line and the eastern line of the state of Kansas to the Missouri river, at Kansas City; thence via the said Missouri river to the point of intersection of that river with the eastern boundary of Montana; thence via the said eastern boundary line to the international line,—the foregoing to be known as the 'Missouri River Line;' thence via said international line to the Pacific coast; thence via the Pacific coast to the international line between the United States and Mexico; thence via said international line to the Gulf of Mexico, and thence via said Gulf to the point of beginning, including business between points on the boundary line as described.

"2. All freight traffic originating within the territory as defined in the first section when destined to points east of the aforesaid Missouri river line.

"Exceptions.

"(a) The D. & R. G. and the D. & R. G. W., except their business to and from points in Colorado west of the D. & R. G. line between Denver and Trinidad; also business via their lines between points in Colorado and points in Utah.

"All local business between Denver and Trinidad and intermediate points; all local business of the A., T. & S. F. between Pueblo and Canon City, Colo.; all stone traffic having both origin and destination within the state of Colorado.

"The jurisdiction of this association, in so far as the business of the Denver & Rio Grande and the Denver & Rio Grande Western railway companies is concerned, covers the following traffic, namely:

"All freight traffic to, from, or through all common or junction points in the states of Nebraska and Kansas and the Indian territory, originating at or destined to Denver, Colorado Springs, Pueblo, or Trinidad.

"All freight traffic between Ogden, Spanish Fork, and intermediate points on the one hand, and to, from, or through points in Kansas or Nebraska upon or east of the 103d meridian, on the other hand.

"Traffic which may be excluded under the application of the above is only such as may be delivered to or received from the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad and Denver & Rio Grande Western Railway.

"(b) Traffic included in the Trans-Continental & International Association.

"(c) Traffic passing between points in Kansas or Nebraska and Mississippi river points, Carondelet and south; also traffic passing between points in Kansas or Nebraska and points in the southern states east of the Mississippi river and south of the south line of Kentucky and Virginia, regardless of the route by which the business crosses the Mississippi or Ohio rivers.

"(d) Traffic passing between Missouri river points and points in the territory east of said river.

"(e) All traffic to points on the Northern Pacific and Manitoba railways.

"(f) Traffic to points in Arkansas.

"(g) Coal, stone and gravel from Colorado, Wyoming and Dakota, to points in Kansas and Nebraska, and to Sioux City, Council Bluffs, or Pacific Junction, Iowa, St. Joseph, Kansas City, or Boswell, Mo.

"(h) The interchange of traffic with the Colorado Midland and South Park Companies, to or from Aspen, Colorado, Glenwood Springs, Colorado, and intermediate points, including coal branches therefrom, and Buena Vista, Colorado, and Leadville, Colorado.

"(i) Business to and from Florence, Colorado, by all lines.

* Article II.

"Sec. 1. The association shall, by unanimous vote, elect a chairman of the organization. The chairman may be removed by a two thirds vote of the members.

"Sec. 2. There shall be regular meetings of the association at Kansas City, unless notice shall be given by the chairman that the business to be transacted does not warrant calling the members together, which notice shall be given not less than four days before the day set for the meeting. When a meeting, regular or special, is convened, it shall be incumbent upon each party hereto to be represented by some officer authorized to act definitely upon any and all questions to be considered. Each road shall designate to the chairman one person who shall be held personally responsible for rates on that road. Such person shall be present at all regular meetings when possible, and shall represent his road, unless a superior officer is present. If unable to attend, he shall send a substitute, with written authority to act upon all questions which may arise, and the vote of such substitute shall be binding upon the company he represents.

"Sec. 3. A committee shall be appointed to establish rates, rules, and regulations on the traffic subject to this association, and to consider changes therein, and make rules for meeting the competition of outside lines. Their conclusions, when unanimous, shall be made effective when they so order; but if they differ the question at issue shall be referred to the managers of the lines parties hereto, and if they disagree it shall be arbitrated in the manner provided in article 7.

"Sec. 4. At least five days' written notice prior to each monthly meeting shall be given the chairman of any proposed reduction in rates, or change in any rule or regulation governing freight traffic; eight days in so far as applicable to the traffic of Colorado or Utah.

"Sec. 5. At each monthly meeting the association shall consider and vote upon all changes proposed of which due notice has been given, and all parties shall be bound by the decision of the association so expressed, unless then and there the parties shall give the association definite written notice that in ten days thereafter they shall make such modification, notwithstanding the vote of the association: provided, that, if the member giving notice of the change shall fail to be represented at the meeting, no action shall be taken on its notice, and the same shall be considered withdrawn. Should any member insist upon a reduction of rate against the views of the majority, or if the majority favor the same, and if, in the judgment of said majority, the rate so made affects seriously the rates upon other traffic, then the association may, by a majority vote upon such other traffic, put into effect corresponding rates, to take effect upon the same day. By unanimous consent any rate, rule, or regulation relating to freight traffic may be modified at any meeting of the association without previous notice.

"Sec. 6. Notwithstanding anything in this article contained, each member may, at its peril, make at any time, without previous notice, such rate, rule, or regulation as may be necessary to meet the competition of lines not members of the association, giving at the same time notice to the chairman of its action in the premises. If the chairman upon investigation shall decide that such rate is not necessary to meet the direct competition of lines not members of the association, and shall so notify the road making the rate, it shall immediately withdraw such rate. At the next meeting of the association held after the making of such rate it shall be reported to the association, and, if the association shall decide by a two thirds vote that such rate was not made in good faith to meet such competition, the member offending shall be subject to the penalty provided in section 8 of this article. If the association shall decide by a two thirds vote that such rate was made in good faith to meet such competition, it shall be considered as authority for the rate so made.

"Sec. 7. All arrangements with connecting lines for the division of through rates relating to traffic covered by this agreement shall be made by authority of the association: provided, however, that when one road has a proprietary interest in another the divisions between such roads shall be what they may elect, and shall not be the property of the association: provided, further, that, as regards traffic contracts at this date actually existing between lines not having common proprietary interests, the same shall be reported, so far as divisions are concerned, to the association, to the end that divisions with competing lines may, if thought advisable by them, be made on equally favorable terms.

"Sec. 8. It shall be the duty of the chairman to investigate all apparent violations of the agreement, and to report his findings to the managers, who shall determine by a majority vote (the member against whom complaint is made to have no vote) what, if any, penalty shall be assessed, the amount of each fine, not to exceed one hundred dollars, to be paid to the association. If any line party hereto agrees with a shipper, or any one else, to secure a reduction or change in rates, or change in the rules or regulations, and it is shown upon investigation by the chairman that such an arrangement was effected, and traffic thereby secured, such action shall be reported to the managers, who shall determine, as above provided, what, if any, penalty shall be assessed.

"Sec. 9. When a penalty shall have been declared against any member of this association, the chairman shall notify the managing officer of said company that such fine has been assessed, and that within ten days thereafter he will draw for the amount of the fine; and the draft, when presented, shall be honored by the company thus assessed.

"Sec. 10. All fines collected to be used to defray the expenses of the association, the offending party not to be benefited by the amounts it may pay as fines.

"Sec. 11. Any member not present or fully represented at roll call of general or special meetings of the freight association, of which due and proper notice has been given, shall be fined one dollar, to be assessed against his company, unless he shall have previously filed with the chairman notice of inability to be present or represented.

"Article III.

"The duties and powers of the chairman shall be as follows:

"Section 1. He shall preside at all meetings of the association, and make and keep a record thereof, and promulgate such of said proceedings as may be necessary to inform the parties hereto of the action taken by the association.

"Sec. 2. He shall at all times keep and publish for the use of the members a full record of the rates, rules, and regulations prevailing on all lines parties hereto on business covered by this agreement, and each of the parties hereto agrees to furnish such number of copies of the rates, rules, and regulations issued by it as the chairman may require.

"Sec. 3. He shall construe this agreement and all resolutions adopted thereunder, his construction to be binding until changed by a majority vote of the association.

"Sec. 4. He shall publish in joint form all rates, rules, or regulations which are general in their character and apply throughout the territory of the association, and shall also publish in the manner above such rates, rules, or regulations applying on traffic common to two or more lines as may be agreed upon by the lines in interest.

"Sec. 5. He shall be furnished with copies of all waybills for freight carried under this agreement when called for, and shall furnish such statistics as may be necessary to give members general information as to the traffic moved, subject to the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Railway Association agreement as to lines members thereof.

"Sec. 6. He shall render to each member of the association monthly statements of the expenses of the association, showing the proportions due from each, and shall make drafts on members for the different amounts thus shown to be due.

"Sec. 7. He shall hear and determine all charges of violations of this agreement, and assess, collect, and dispose of the fines for such violations as provided for herein.

"Sec. 8. The chairman shall be empowered to authorize lines in the association to meet the rates of another line or other lines in the association when in his judgment such action is justified by the circumstances; this, however, not to act in any way as an indorsement of an unauthorized rate made by any member.

"Sec. 9. Only parties interested shall vote upon questions arising under the agreement, and in case of doubt the chairman shall decide as to whether any party is so interested or not, subject to appeal, as provided by section 8 of article 8 of the agreement.

"Article IV.

"Any willful under billing in weights or billing of freight at wrong classification shall be considered a violation of this agreement. 24 L. R. A.

ment, and the rules and regulations of any weighing association or inspection bureau as established by it, or as enforced by its officers and agents, shall be considered binding under the provisions of this agreement, and any willful violation of them shall be subject to the penalties provided herein.

"Article V.

"The expenses of the association shall be borne by the several parties in such proportion as may be fixed by the chairman. Any member not satisfied with the allotment so made may appeal to the association, which shall, at its first regular meeting thereafter, determine the matter, which may be done by a two thirds vote of the members.

"Article VI.

"There shall be an executive committee of three members, to be elected by unanimous vote. The committee shall approve the appointment and salaries of necessary employees, except that of the chairman, and authorize all disbursements. All action of this committee shall be unanimous.

"Article VII.

"In case the managers of the lines parties hereto fail to agree upon any question arising under this agreement that shall be brought before the association, it shall be referred to an arbitration board, which shall consist of three members of the executive board of the Interstate Commerce Railway Association: provided, however, that, in case of arbitration in which the members of this association only are interested, they may, by unanimous vote, substitute a special board.

"Article VIII.

"This agreement shall take effect April 1, 1889, subject thereafter to thirty days' notice of a desire on the part of any line to withdraw from or amend the same."

The bill further alleges that this agreement took effect April 15, 1889; that under it rules, regulations, and rates for carrying freight over the railroads of the defendant companies were fixed by the association, and have since been maintained by them; that since that date these railroad companies have declined and refused at all times to fix or give rates for the carriage of freight based upon the cost of constructing and maintaining their several lines of railroad and the cost of carrying freights over the same, and such other elements as should be considered in establishing tariff rates upon each particular road; and that the people engaged in interstate commerce have been compelled to pay the arbitrary rates of freight, and to submit to the arbitrary rules and regulations established and maintained by the association formed under the agreement, and have been and are deprived of the benefits that might be expected to flow from free competition between the several lines of railroad of the defendant companies, and that in this way the defendant companies have combined in restraint of trade and commerce among the states, and have attempted to monopolize, and have monopolized, a part of this commerce.

Three of the railroad companies were not members of the association, and will not be further noticed. The answers of the 15 companies who were members of the association are substantially the same. The first defense in these answers is that the Interstate Commerce Law of February 4, 1887, entitled "An Act to Regulate Commerce" (24 Stat. at L. 379, chap. 104; Rev. Stat. Supp. 529) and the acts amendatory thereof, constitute a complete code of laws regulating that part of commerce among the states and with foreign nations which relates to transportation, and that the Act of July 2, 1890, is not applicable to, and does not govern, them or their actions.

Coming to the merits of the suit, these defendants admit that they are common carriers; that, with some exceptions not important here, they owned independent and competing lines of railroad in that part of the United States west of the Missouri and Mississippi rivers, and that they were engaged in the transportation of freight among the states and territories, and to and from foreign nations, in that region, but they deny that they owned the only through lines of railroad engaged in that business there; and allege that there were several others, to wit, the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, the Great Northern Railway Company, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and the Texas Pacific Railroad Company. They admit that some of them were assisted and encouraged to construct and maintain through competing lines of railroad, independent of each other, by subsidies, land grants, and donations from the United States, and from the people of the various states and territories west of the great rivers. They admit that they entered into the agreement March 15, 1890, and that rules, regulations, and rates of freight have since been fixed and charged by the association thus formed, and that they have complied with and maintained them. They deny, however, that at the time they entered into the agreement they were dissatisfied with the rates of freight they were receiving. They deny that they intended, in connection with the formation of the association or otherwise, to unjustly or oppressively augment such rates, or to counteract the effect of free competition on prices or facilities of transportation, or to establish or to maintain arbitrary rates, or to prevent any one of the defendants from reducing rates, or to procure unreasonably great sums of money from the people of the states and territories west of the great rivers engaged in interstate commerce. They deny that the formation and operations of the association have had any such effects, but aver that they have tended to decrease rates, and to benefit the people and the roads. They deny that they had any intention by the formation of the association to monopolize or attempt to monopolize the freight traffic of the region affected by it, and deny that it has had any such effect. They allege that they were subject to the provisions of the Act of Congress of February 4, 1887, entitled, "An Act to Regulate Commerce," and the acts amendatory thereof. They aver that under that Act they were required to make all charges reasonable and just; that they were prohibited from making any unjust discriminations, or any undue or unreasonable preferences, or from giving any undue advantages, and that they were required to establish a classification of freight and rates of freight, and to publish and file with the Interstate Commerce Commission schedules showing this classification and these rates, and then to abide by and maintain them; that, in order to comply with this law, consultation between and concerted action of the railroad companies conducting the transportation business west of the great rivers was essential; and that they made this agreement and formed this association in order that they might more effectually comply with the provisions of this law than they could do acting independently. They allege that the rates they have established and maintained have been reasonable and just; that since the organization of the association more than 200 reductions of rates have been made through its action; that their agreement forming the association was filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission under the Act, and that the rules, regulations, and rates they have established and maintained have been in strict conformity to the provisions thereof. They deny that the people have been deprived of the benefits which might be expected to flow from free competition in the business of transportation, and allege that the utmost freedom compatible with obedience to the Interstate Commerce Act and with the preservation of the existing agencies of competition prevails, and they insist that their association and action under this contract constitute no combination or conspiracy in restraint of interstate or international commerce.

The opinion filed by the court below when the bill was dismissed is reported in 58 Fed. Rep. 440.

Argued before Sanborn, Circuit Judge, and Shiras and Thayer, District Judges.

Mr. J. W. Ady for appellant.

Mr. George R. Peck, for appellees:

I. The Act of July 2, 1890, commonly called the Anti-Trust Act, does not include, and was not intended to include, combination or agreements between railway companies. The provisions of the Act operate, and were intended to operate, upon other and different combinations, and have no application to agreements or combinations between railway companies.

The Act itself does not assume to deal with transportation or with the carrying trade of the country.

A comparison of the different provisions of the Act, shows that the idea that railway combinations are included in it, cannot for one moment be entertained.

All statutes are read in the light of history. Church of Holy Trinity v. United States, 148 U. S. 457, 38 L. ed. 227.

When the Act under which this suit is brought was passed, the public mind was in an agitated and excited state on the subject of trusts. When the Fifty-first Congress met in December, 1889, a great number of trusts ex isted, some small and some large, some local and some national,—and even international.

So far as congressional regulation of railways was concerned it was a time of profound peace. The people had already demanded a law upon that subject and had obtained it. The subject of Congressional Railway Legislation had had its day; the Interstate Commerce Act had been passed and all of its provisions were in active operation.

Historically considered, trusts were the evils specially in mind when Congress passed the Act under consideration.

Traffic associations were well known, both when the Interstate Commerce Act was passed and when the Anti-Trust Act was passed.

In the very first annual report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, an elaborately prepared official document, the Commission, with all the facts before it, had spoken in high commendation of traffic associations.

With this report, before Congress, is it possible to believe that they intended by the Anti-Trust Act to prohibit traffic associations—the very instrumentalities upon which the Interstate Commerce Commission relied for assistance in carrying on its great work?

Congress positively refused to include transportation.

An amendment was introduced in the House of Representatives specifically including transportation, and it was rejected, as shown by the Congressional record which the court can examine.

Blake v. National City Bank of New York, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 307, 23 L. ed. 119. See Cong. Rec. vol. 21, part 1, p. 96; Cong. Rec. vol. 21, part 4, p. 8153; Cong. Rec. vol. 21, part 4, p. 3857; Cong. Rec. vol. 21, part 5, p. 4099; Cong. Rec. vol. 21, part 5, p. 4104; Cong. Rec. vol. 21, part 5, p. 4128; Cong. Rec. vol. 21, part 5, p. 4753; Cong. Rec. vol. 21, part 5, p. 4857; Cong. Rec. vol. 21, part 6, p. 5118; Cong. Rec. vol. 21, part 6, p. 5950; Cong. Rec. vol. 21, part 6, p. 5981; Cong. Rec. vol. 21, part 7, p. 6116; Cong. Rec. vol. 21, part 7, p. 6206; Cong. Rec. vol. 21, part 7, p. 6312.

Taken as a whole, the Interstate Commerce Act is special and regulative, while the Anti-Trust Act is general and prohibitive.

The penalties, the procedure, the entire machinery by which the two acts are enforced is so different as to make it impossible that they were intended to cover the same subject.

Where a statute in general words is compared with a statute which is special or particular, the general gives way to the special and will not be held to embrace the subject contained in the special statute unless the intention that it should be so is clearly manifested.

S. 18 Wall. 272, 21 L. ed. 841; United States v. Saunders, 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 492, 23 L. ed. 736; Townsend v. Little, 109 U. S. 504, 27 L. ed. 1012.

II. The agreement of March 15, 1889, between the defendants is neither a "contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise," 24 L. R. A.

or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states," nor by virtue of it do the defendants "monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several states." The agreement, therefore, is not a violation of the Act of July 2, 1890.

Whatever in the way of restraint of trade or commerce, or of monopolizing, is illegal at the common law, is illegal under this statute, and not otherwise.

Patterson, Contracts in Restraint of Trade, 52, 53.

Restraint of trade, at the common law, meant that restriction upon freedom of action which, first, deprived the public of the restricted party's industry, and, secondly, precluded the restricted party from pursuing his occupation, and thus prevented him from supporting himself and family.

Oregon Steam Nav. Co. v. Winsor, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 64, 22 L. ed. 815.

A monopoly was originally a grant by the crown to certain persons or corporations of the exclusive right to carry on some business, trade or avocation.

The Monopolies, 11 Coke, 84 b.

Monopoly, at the present day, simply means the obtaining, without a grant from the sovereign, of the exclusive power to carry on a certain trade or business.

Is the Trans-Missouri Association an organization in restraint of trade or commerce? An indispensable element of restraint of trade, in its proper legal sense, is that one or more of the parties to the contract must agree to go out of business, and surrender that which before belonged to him or them to the other parties making the agreement.

The contract between the defendants, constituting the Trans-Missouri Freight Association, is clearly not within the section of the Act which prohibits restraint of trade.

Mitchell v. Reynolds, 1 P. Wms. 181, 192, 197; Oregon Steam Nav. Co. v. Winsor, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 64, 22 L. ed. 815.

The Anti-Trust Act does not forbid contracts and combinations merely on the ground that they are against public policy, but only such as are in restraint of trade or which monopolize or attempt to monopolize.

The phrase "public policy" can only mean the settled policy of a state or government which appears in its constitution, laws and judicial decisions.

Richardson v. Mellish, 2 Bing. 229, 252; Mogul S.S. Co. v. McGregor [1892] 2 App. Cas. 25, 45, 46; Vidal v. Philadelphia, 43 U. S. 2 How. 127, 11 L. ed. 205; Hadden v. Barney, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 107, 18 L. ed. 518.

If the statute has not been violated by the defendants the government can well afford to wait for another opportunity to vindicate public policy.

Contracts in restraint of trade involve a diminution of the number of persons engaged in trade or of the supply furnished the public. If a contract alleged to be in restraint of trade contains one of these elements, then and not until then can public policy come in to determine whether the restraint is of such a character or goes to such extent as to make it violative of public right.

Patterson, Contracts in Restraint of Trade, 17; Fowle v. Park, 131 U. S. 88, 33 L. ed. 67; Diamond Match Co. v. Roeber, 106 N. Y. 473, 60 Am. Rep. 464; Beal v. Chase, 81 Mich. 490; Proctor v. Sargent, 2 Scott, N. R. 289.

The mere fact that a contract places a restriction upon trade or competition is not sufficient to avoid it.

Shrainka v. Scharringhausen, 8 Mo. App. 522; Central Shade Roller Co. v. Oushman, 143 Mass. 363; Rousillon v. Rousillon, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 386; Leather Oloth Co. v. Lonsont, L. R. 9 Eq. 345; Hubbard v. Miller, 27 Mich. 15, 15 Am. Rep. 153; Waterman Thermometer Co. v. Pool, 51 Hun, 157; Perkins v. Lyman, 9 Mass. 523; Gloverster Ininglass & G. Co. v. Russia Cement Co. 154 Mass. 92; Jones v. Fell, 5 Fla. 510; Master Stevedores Asso. v. Walsh, 2 Daly, 1; Collins v. Locke, L. R. 4 App. Cas. 674; Re Greene, 52 Fed. Rep. 104.

The Anti-Trust Act is not intended, and does not profess, to enforce public duties; it is a general Act applicable to individuals as well as to corporations, and as it makes no distinction in the penalties imposed, it is plain that so far as the Act is concerned, it does not place corporations engaged in public duties on any different footing from individuals or corporations engaged in purely private pursuits.

The rule as to agreements in restraint of trade manifestly ought to be much more stringent in respect to individuals and private corporations than it is in respect to railway corporations, for the reason that individuals and private corporations are not subject to the limitations upon their charges which are imposed upon railway corporations by the law of their existence.

The agreement between the different companies constituting the Trans-Missouri Freight Association, discloses not a single element of a monopoly at common law.

The purpose of the agreement was not to raise rates, but to establish and maintain just and reasonable rates; and to establish just and reasonable rates is a right which belongs to every railroad company in the United States. It can never be legally wrong to contract for what is legally right.

The public are deprived of no facilities to which they are entitled; all the roads are in full operation, and as shown by the pleadings, the public are served for just and reasonable rates; how, then, can it be claimed that a monopoly has been established, or that the people have been or can be oppressed?

No such legal doctrine as free and unrestricted competition ever existed. Our legislative, judicial and commercial history for the past twenty-five years has all been against the doctrine of unrestrained competition.

As executive officers of the government in the control of railways, what the Interstate Commerce Commission has said and done on this subject amounts to an executive construction of the existing laws on the subject, and as such will be followed by the courts, except upon the most clear and conclusive showing that it is erroneous.

The only criticism upon the associations, to be found anywhere in their reports, is that they have not in all cases lived up to their articles of agreement as closely as they ought, and that they should be strengthened and made more effective in their organization.

The agreement establishing the Trans-Missouri Freight Association was made long before the passage of the Anti-Trust Act. Making the agreement, therefore, was not a violation of this Act, for the Act was not then in existence. Whatever violation is now asserted consists, and must consist, in doing something—in acts that contravene the law. If the question of tendency is before the court, how can that tendency be established except by a consideration of what has actually happened by carrying out the agreement? What will happen can only be determined by a consideration of what has happened.

Mr. John M. Thurston with Messrs. A. L. Williams, N. H. Loomis and R. W. Blair, for the Union Pacific Railway Co. et al appellees:

I. The articles of agreement of the Trans-Missouri Freight Association are justified by the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act; and the objects sought to be attained by that association, as shown by its articles of agreement, are made necessary by the requirements of that Act.

Congress has left it entirely to the voluntary action of the carriers subject to the Act, to arrange the details for the interchange of traffic between them.

"Where the law commands anything to be done, it authorizes the performance of whatever may be necessary for executing its commands."

II. The Interstate Commerce Act and its amendments form a special code of laws for the regulation of common carriers engaged in interstate traffic.

III. The Anti-Trust Act, under which this suit is brought, is general in its nature, and it is only by a literal construction of the Act, which is broad enough to include contracts of every kind and nature, that it can be said to include the articles of agreement in question.

IV. A statute in general terms, or treating the subject in a general manner, will not repeal the particular provisions of a prior statute, unless the general act indicates a plain intention to do so.

Homer*, 96 U. S. 187, 24 L. ed. 811; Brown v. Philadelphia County Comrs. 21 Pa. 87.

V. The Interstate Commerce Act is one special in its nature, and with a particular object in view. The Act under which this suit is brought is one of a general nature, disclosing no intent to repeal any of the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act. It follows, therefore, that none of the provisions of that Act are repealed by the Anti-Trust Act, and that the articles of agreement in question, which are authorized and made necessary by the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act, are not in conflict with the Anti-Trust Act.

VI. The provisions of the Anti-Trust Act, under which this action is brought, were not intended to and do not relate to the business of common carriers, and therefore the articles 24 L. R. A.

of agreement in question are not in conflict with that Act.

The different portions of a statute are to be construed with reference to each other and in a sense which harmonizes with the subject matter and general purpose of the statute.

VII. The articles of agreement of the Trans-Missouri Freight Association are not in restraint of trade and commerce, they do not create, nor attempt to create a monopoly, and are in no wise obnoxious to the provisions of the Anti-Trust Act.

By the common law, contracts in restraint of trade were those which prevented a person from pursuing his trade or from engaging in business either generally, or within a particular locality, or for a certain period of time.

In Ray, on Contractual Limitations, p. 194, a work frequently quoted in complainant's brief, the modification of the ancient rule is thus referred to:

"The tendency of recent adjudications is to conform to the spirit which induced such modified legislation, and it is now clearly marked in the direction of relaxing the rigor of the doctrine that all contracts in general restraint of trade are void, irrespective of special circumstances. Indeed, it has of late been denied that a hard and unjust rule of that kind has ever been the law of England.

"The law has for centuries permitted contracts in restraint of trade when reasonable, and in Hornor v. Crafts, 7 Bing. 785, Tindal, Ch. J., considered a true test to be, whether the restraint is such only as to afford a fair protection to the interests of the party in favor of whom it is given, and not so advantageous as to interfere with the interest of the public. When the restraint is general, but at the same time is coextensive only with the interest to be protected and with the benefit meant to be conferred, there seems to be no good reason why, as between the parties, the contract is not as reasonable as when the interest is partial, and there is a corresponding partial restraint. There is no public reason which necessarily condemns the one and not the other.

Sanborn, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Contracts between competing corporations, commonly termed "pooling contracts," to divide their earnings from the transportation of freight in fixed proportions, have long been held void by the courts as against public policy. Such contracts do not simply restrict competition, they tend to destroy it; and, if they do not effect that result, it is only because they do not completely accomplish their main purpose. When acting independently, the spur of self-interest drives each corporation to furnish the people with the best accommodations and the safest and most rapid transportation at the lowest profitable rates, in order that it may attract larger patronage and gather increased gain. But under the operation of a pool this incentive to exertion is withdrawn. Each carrier finds it to its interest to enhance the price of carriage, and finds that its profits are not sensibly diminished by furnishing poor facilities for transportation and inexpensive and mean accommodations. In 1887 Congress recognized and adopted this rule of public policy, and by section 5 of "An Act to Regulate Commerce," commonly called the "Interstate Commerce Act" (24 Stat. at L. 379, chap. 104; Rev. Stat. Supp. 539) prohibited such contracts between common carriers engaged in interstate or international commerce. That Act, however, prohibited contracts for the pooling of freights of different and competing railroads only; it prohibited contracts that thus destroyed competition; it did not prohibit all contracts that in any way restricted or regulated competition. By the Act of July 2, 1890, entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies," commonly called the "Anti-Trust Act" (26 Stat. at L. 24 L. R. A.

309, chap. 647; Rev. Stat. Supp. 762) Congress provided that:

"Section 1. Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

"Sec. 2. Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize, any part of the trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor."

"Sec. 4. The several circuit courts of the United States are hereby invested with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain violations of this Act."

The government bases this suit on these provisions of the latter Act. It claims that the contract in question, and the association formed under it, are illegal on three grounds: First, because the contract prevents free and unrestricted competition between competing lines of railroad; second, because it tends to create a monopoly; and third, because the railroad corporations have through this contract abandoned the discharge of some of their duties to the public.

The first ground stated is chiefly relied on, and it presents questions of deep interest, the decision of which must have a far-reaching and important influence on the transportation system of the nation. The government does not claim that the contract and association assailed effected a pooling of freights, or that they tend to retard improvement in the facilities afforded for safe, quick, and convenient transportation, or that they are obnoxious to any of the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act; but it insists that the Anti-Trust Act prohibits all contracts and combinations between competing railroad corporations which in any manner restrict free competition. The argument is, the Anti-Trust Act prohibits any contract between competing railroad companies that restricts competition. This contract restricts competition; therefore it is illegal. Is, then, every contract between competing railroad companies that in any manner imposes a restriction upon competition a "contract in restraint of trade" and illegal within the meaning of the Anti-Trust Act? Is the existence of restriction upon competition the standard by which the legality of these and all other contracts must be measured under that Act? and if not, by what standard shall their legality be determined? These are questions that the position of the government compels us to consider before we can determine whether or not this contract is void. Their determination demands a careful examination and construction of that part of the Anti-Trust Act which declares that "every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states," is illegal. No definition of these terms is found in this Act.

but the terms are not new. For more than 200 years before it was passed the courts of England and America had from time to time declared that certain classes of contracts in restraint of trade were against public policy, and therefore illegal and void under the common law. The line of demarcation between these illegal contracts and the innumerable valid agreements that are daily made in the business world had been drawn by long lines of decisions, and had been repeatedly pointed out by the Supreme Court of the United States. Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Co. 130 U. S. 396, 409, 32 L. ed. 979, 984; Fowle v. Park, 131 U. S. 88, 33 L. ed. 67. Two years before its passage Congress had enacted the Interstate Commerce Law. They had there provided a code of rules and established a commission for the express purpose of regulating that part of interstate and international commerce which relates to transportation. Under these circumstances, three well settled rules of construction must be applied to ascertain the meaning and scope of the Act:

(1) It must be read in the light of all general laws upon the same subject in force at the time of the passage of the Act.

(2) Where words have acquired a well understood meaning by judicial interpretation, it is to be presumed that they are used in that sense in a subsequent statute, unless the contrary clearly appears.

(3) Where Congress creates an offense, and uses common law terms, the courts may properly look to that body of jurisprudence for the true meaning of the terms used, and, if it is a common law offense, for the definition of the offense if it is not clearly defined in the Act adopting or creating it. United States v. Armstrong, 2 Curt. 446; United States v. Coppersmith, 4 Fed. Rep. 198; Re Greene, 52 Fed. Rep. 104, 111; McCool v. Smith, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 459, 469, 17 L. ed. 218, 221; McDonald v. Hovey, 110 U. S. 619, 628, 28 L. ed. 269, 271.

Thus we are brought to a consideration of the statutes in force and the decisions that had been rendered when this Act was passed to determine what contracts in restraint of trade were then illegal, for it is clear both from the rules to which we have referred and from the title of the Act, viz: "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies," that it was such contracts, and such contracts only, that Congress intended to declare unlawful and criminal in interstate commerce.

Under the common law, the ground on which contracts in restraint of trade were declared unlawful was that they were against public policy. But when it becomes necessary to consider grounds of public policy in the determination of a case, it is well to bear in mind the oft quoted remarks of Justice Burrough in Richardson v. Mellish, 2 Bing. 252, that public policy "is a very unruly horse, and when you once get astride of it you never know where it will carry you. It may lead you from the sound law." Public policy changes with the changing conditions of the times. It is hardly to be expected that a people who are transported by steam with a rapidity hardly conceived of a century ago, who are in constant and instant communication with each other by electricity, and who carry on the most important commercial transactions by the use of the telegraph while separated by thousands of miles, will entertain precisely the same views of what is conducive to the public welfare in commercial and business transactions as the people of the last century, who lived when commerce crept slowly along the coasts, shut out of the interior by the absence of roads, and hampered by an almost impassable ocean. In 1415 a writ of debt was brought on an obligation by one John Dier, in which the defendant alleged the obligation in a certain indenture which he put forth, and on condition that if the defendant did not use his art of a dyer's craft, within the city where the plaintiff, etc., for half a year, the obligation to lose its force, and said that he did not use his art within the time limited. Hull, J., said: "In my opinion, you might have demurred upon him that the obligation is void, inasmuch as the condition is against the common law; and, per Dieu, if the plaintiff were here, he should go to prison till he paid a fine to the king." Y. B., 2 Hen. V. fol. 5, pl. 26. In 1841, Lord Langdale, master of the rolls, held that a contract made by a lawyer not to practice his profession in Great Britain for 20 years was not against public policy, and that it was valid. Whitaker v. Howe, 8 Beav. 883. In 1843, the court of exchequer held that an agreement not to practice as a surgeon dentist in London or in any other town where the plaintiffs might have been practicing was reasonable and lawful so far as it related to London, but against public policy and void as to the other towns. Mallan v. May, 11 Mees. & W. 652, 667. In 1869, Vice Chancellor James sustained a contract by vendors not to carry on or allow others to carry on in any part of Europe the manufacture or sale of certain kinds of leather so as in any way to interfere with the exclusive enjoyment by the purchasing company of the manufacture and sale thereof, and issued an injunction to enforce it. Leather Cloth Co. v. Lonsont, L. R. 9 Eq. 845. In 1889 the supreme court of New York sustained a contract not to manufacture or sell thermometers or storm glasses throughout the United States for ten years. Watertown Thermometer Co. v. Pool, 51 Hun, 157, 163. And in 1891 the supreme court held that a contract of a railroad corporation giving the Pullman Southern Car Company the exclusive right to furnish all drawing room and sleeping cars required by that road during a period of fifteen years was not an illegal restraint of trade, and sustained it. Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 139 U. S. 79, 35 L. ed. 97. It is with the public policy of to-day, as illustrated by public statutes and judicial decisions, that we have now to deal. In considering that subject, we are not to be governed by our own views of the interests of the people, or by general considerations tending to show what policy would probably be wise or unwise. Such a standard of determination might be unconsciously varied by the personal views of the judges who constitute the court. The public policy of the nation must be determined by its Constitution, laws, and judicial decisions. So far as they disclose it, it is our province to learn and enforce it, beyond that it is unnecessary and unwise to pursue our inquiries. Vidal v. Philadelphia, 43 U. S. 2 How. 127, 197, 11 L. ed. 205, 283; Swann v. Swann, 21 Fed. Rep. 299.

Turning first, then, to the decisions, we find that it has long been settled that contracts or combinations of the producers or dealers in staple commodities of prime necessity to the people, to restrict or monopolize their supply or enhance their price, pooling contracts, or combinations between such producers or dealers to divide their profits in certain fixed proportions, and pooling contracts or combinations between competing common carriers, are illegal restraints of trade, and void; while contracts or combinations between employers or workmen to fix and abide by certain prices for labor or services may be valid in their inception, but become illegal restraints of trade whenever the associations formed under them interfere with the freedom of those who are not members to refuse to abide by their prices, or to employ or be employed at other rates, or whenever such associations undertake to prevent nonmembers from using their property or their labor as they see fit. The main purpose of contracts of these classes that are thus held illegal is to suppress, not simply to regulate, competition; and, if suppression is not effected, it is because the contracts fail to accomplish their purpose. It is evident that there is a wide difference between such contracts and those the purpose of which is to so regulate competition that it may be fair, open, and healthy, and whose restriction upon it is slight, and only that which is necessary to accomplish this purpose. It does not necessarily follow that contracts of the latter class constitute illegal restraints of trade because those of the former classes do.

To maintain his proposition that any contract between common carriers that restricts competition in any degree is an illegal restraint of trade, the counsel for the government has cited numerous cases where such expressions as the following are found in the opinions of the courts: "The people have a right to the necessities and conveniences of life at a price determined by the relation of supply and demand, and the law forbids any agreement or combination whereby that price is removed beyond the salutary influence of legitimate competition." De Witt Wire Cloth Co. v. New Jersey Wire Cloth Co. 14 N. Y. Supp. 277. "It is against the general policy of the law to destroy or interfere with free competition, or to permit such interference or destruction." Stewart v. Erie & W. Transp. Co. 17 Minn. 872. "Combinations and conspiracies to enhance the price of any article of trade and commerce are injurious to the public." People v. Fisher, 14 Wend. 9, 28 Am. Dec. 501. "Whatever destroys, or even restricts, competition in trade, is injurious, if not fatal, to it." Hooker v. Vandewater, 4 Denio, 849, 858, 47 Am. Dec. 24 L. R. A.

258. A careful and patient examination of the cases cited, however, discloses the fact that the contracts considered in those cases, which are not of doubtful authority, were of one of the classes to which we have referred, or rest upon some other ground than the existence of restriction upon competition. They were cases involving contracts of competing producers or dealers to limit the supply and enhance the price of, or to monopolize, staple commodities, like Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay Coal Co. 68 Pa. 178, 8 Am. Rep. 159; India Bagging Assn. v. Kock, 14 La. Ann. 168; United States v. Jellicoe Mountain Coal & C. Co. 19 L. R. A. 758, 46 Fed. Guthrie*, 85 Ohio St. 886; and People v. North River Sugar Ref. Co. 54 Hun, 354; or cases involving pooling contracts, like Craft v. McConoughy, 79 Ill. 846, 22 Am. Rep. 171; Hooker v. Vandewater, 4 Denio, 849, 47 Am. Dec. 258; Stanton v. Allen, 5 Denio, 434, 49 Am. Dec. 282; Anderson v. Jett, 6 L. R. A. 390, 89 Ky. 375; Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Co. 130 U. Berry*, 40 Ark. 252; or cases involving combinations of workmen which compelled nonmembers to abide by the prices for labor which they had fixed or to abandon their employment, like People v. Fisher, 14 Wend. 9, 28 Am. Dec. 501, and United States v. Workingmen's Amalgamated Council, 54 Fed. Rep. 994, 1000; or cases where the contracts were ultra vires the corporations, and their purpose and effect was to monopolize trade, like Central R. Co. v. Collins, 40 Ga. 582; Hazlehurst v. Savannah, G. & N. A. R. Co. 43 Ga. 18; and Western U. Teleg. Co. v. American U. Teleg. Co. 65 Ga. 160, 38 Am. Rep. 781; or cases of questionable authority, like Com. v. Carlisle, Bright, (Pa.) 36, 89. See, contra, Snow v. Wheeler, 113 Mass. 179, 185; Boven v. Matheson, 14 Allen, 499; Skrasinka v. Scharringhausen, 8 Mo. App. 522; and Carew v. Ruthorford, 106 Mass. 1, 14, 8 Am. Rep. 287. It was natural that in the discussion of contracts of these classes the courts should condemn in unmeasured terms the suppression of competition, but in none of these cases were they required to hold, and in none of them did they hold, as we understand the opinions when read in relation to the facts of the cases respectively, that every restriction of competition by contracts of competing dealers or carriers was illegal. These decisions rest upon broader ground,—on the ground that the main purpose of the obnoxious contracts was to suppress competition, and that they thus tended to effect an unreasonable and unlawful restraint of trade; they rest on the well settled rules, and come within the well defined classes, to which we have above referred.

A more extended view of the authorities strengthens this conclusion, and makes plain the line of demarcation which separates legal contracts that incidentally restrict competition from illegal contracts in restraint of trade. The decision in the leading case upon this subject (Mitchell v. Reynolds, 1 P. Wms. 181, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. [7th Am. ed.] pt. 2, p. 708) is the case which Chief Justice Fuller says is the foundation of the rule in relation to the invalidity of contracts in restraint of trade (Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Co. 180 U. S. 409, 82 L. ed. 984) held that a contract that clearly restricted competition was not an illegal restraint of trade. The action was upon a bond the condition of which was that the obligor, who was the assignor of a lease of a bakehouse and messuage in the parish of St. Andrews Holborn, would not exercise his trade of a baker within that parish for three years. The contract was held valid, and the action sustained. This decision was rendered in 1711. Chief Justice Parker, in delivering it, declared that contracts in partial restraint of trade were valid if made upon sufficient consideration, but that contracts in general restraint of trade were illegal, because they deprived the party restrained of his livelihood and the subsistence of his family, and the public of a useful member. The point actually decided, that contracts in partial restraint of trade may be sustained, has been uniformly approved, but in the development of the law applicable to this subject there has been added to it the further condition that the restriction imposed must be reasonable in view of all the facts and circumstances of each particular case. The remark of Chief Justice Parker that contracts in general restraint of trade are illegal—a remark that was not necessary to the determination of the question before him—has been, to say the least, greatly modified by subsequent decisions. There is a plain tendency in the later authorities to repudiate the proposition that there is any hard and fast rule that contracts in general restraint of trade are illegal, and to apply the test of reasonableness to all contracts, whether the restraint be general or partial. In Tullis v. Tullis, 1 El. & Bl. 391, the court of queen's bench held, in 1853, that a covenant restricting competition, which bound the covenantor not to exercise his trade of a canvassing publisher in London or within 150 miles of the general postoffice, or in Dublin or Edinburgh, or within 50 miles of either, or in any other town where the covenantor or his successors had an establishment or might have had one within six months preceding, was not an illegal restraint of trade, and enforced it. In Mogul S.S. Co. v. McGregor, 21 Q. B. Div. 544, certain shipowners engaged in the carrying trade between London and China had formed an association for the purpose of keeping up the rate of freights in the tea trade, and securing that trade to themselves. They accomplished this purpose by allowing a rebate of 5 per cent on all freights paid by shippers who shipped in their vessels only, and thus partially or entirely excluded the plaintiffs, who were competing shipowners, from the tea carrying trade. The latter brought suit for an injunction and damages, but, notwithstanding the obvious restriction upon free competition, Lord Coleridge held that the association was not an unlawful combination in restraint of trade, and gave judgment for the defendants. This decision was rendered in 1888. It was sustained on appeal (23 Q. B. Div. 598), and finally affirmed by the house of lords. [1892] App. Cas. 25. In Parkins v. Lyman, 9 Mass. 523, the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts held, in 1813, that a contract by a merchant not to be interested in any voyage to the northwest coast of America was not invalid as in restraint of trade. In Diamond Match Co. v. Roeder, 106 N. Y. 478, 60 Am. Rep. 464, a contract of a match manufacturer never to manufacture or sell any friction matches in the District of Columbia, or in any part of the United States except Idaho and Montana, was sustained and enforced. In Oregon Steam Nav. Co. v. Winsor, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 64, 22 L. ed. 815, decided in 1878, a contract between two steam navigation companies engaged in the business of transportation on the rivers, bays, and waters of California, and on the Columbia river and its tributaries, respectively, was declared by the Supreme Court not to be in restraint of trade, although it prohibited the use of a certain steamer in the waters of California for ten years. And in 1890 the supreme court of New Hampshire in an exhaustive and persuasive opinion held that contracts by which a railroad corporation leased its road and rolling stock to a competitor for many years were not necessarily against public policy or void at common law, when the purpose of the contracts and combinations did not appear to be to raise the rate of transportation above the standard of fair compensation, or to violate any duty owing to the public by non-competing companies. Manchester & L. R. Co. v. Concord R. Co. (N. H.) 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 319, 9 L. R. A. 689. If further authority is wanted for the proposition that it is not the existence of the restriction of competition, but the reasonableness of that restriction, that is the test of the validity of contracts that are claimed to be in restraint of trade, it will be found in Hoole v. Park, 181 U. S. 88, 97, 83 L. ed. 67, 74; Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Co. 180 U. S. 396, 82 L. ed. 979; Re Greene, 52 Fed. Rep. 104, 118; Hornner v. Graves, 7 Bing. 735, 743; Hubbard v. Miller, 27 Mich. 15, 19, 15 Am. Rep. 153; Roussillon v. Roussillon, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 851, 363; Leather Cloth Co. v. Lonsont, L. R. 9 Eq. 845, 854; Wickens v. Evans, 3 Younge & J. 318; Ontario Salt Co. v. Merchants Salt Co. 18 Grant. Ch. 540; Mallan v. May, 11 Mees. & W. 652, 657; Whittaker v. Howe, 3 Beav. 383; Kellogg v. Larkin, 3 Pinney, 123, 150; Beul v. Chase, 81 Mich. 490; Skrainka v. Scharringhausen, 8 Mo. App. 522, 525; Wiggins Ferry Co. v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 73 Mo. 389; Gloucester Ininglass & G. Co. v. Russia Cement Co. 154 Mass. 92, 94; Watertown Thermometer Co. v. Pool, 51 Hun, 157, 163; Master Stevedore's Assn. v. Walsh, 2 Daly, 1; Hodge v. Sloan, 107 N. Y. 244; Brown v. Rounsavell, 78 Ill. 589; Jones v. Fell, 5 Fla. 510, 515.

From a review of these and other authorities, it clearly appears that when the Anti-Trust Act was passed the rule had become firmly established in the jurisprudence of England and the United States that the validity of contracts restricting competition was to be determined by the reasonableness of the restriction. If the main purpose or natural and inevitable effect of a contract was to suppress competition or create a monopoly, it was illegal. If a contract imposed a restriction that was unreasonably injurious to the public interest, or a restriction that was greater than the interest of the party in whose favor it was imposed demanded, it was illegal. But contracts made for a lawful purpose, which were not unreasonably injurious to the public welfare, and which imposed no heavier restraint upon trade than the interest of the favored party required, had been uniformly sustained, notwithstanding their tendency to some extent to check competition. The public welfare was first considered, and the reasonableness of the restriction determined under these rules in the light of all the facts and circumstances of each particular case.

But it is said that railroad corporations are quasi public corporations, and any restriction upon their competition is against the public policy of the nation. It is not to be denied that there are some expressions to be found in adjudged cases, notably in Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Co. 180 U. S. 396, 409, 82 L. ed. 979, 984; West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Ohio River Pipe Line Co. 23 W. Va. 600, 625; Chicago Gaslight & C. Co. v. Peoples Gaslight & C. Co. 121 Ill. 580, and Western U. Tele. Co. v. American U. Tele. Co. 65 Ga. 160, 88 Am. Rep. 781,—to the effect that where a business is of such character that it cannot be restrained to any extent whatever without prejudice to the public interests, the courts decline to enforce or sustain contracts imposing such restraint, however partial. But the language employed by the courts in these cases should be read in the light of the circumstances under which it was uttered, and with due reference to the point actually adjudicated. Thus in the earliest of these cases (Western U. Tele. Co. v. American U. Tele. Co.) it was held that a contract between a railroad company and a telegraph company by which the former granted to the latter the exclusive right to construct a telegraph line along its right of way, necessarily excluded all other telegraph lines from the use of a right of way that by condemnation had been devoted to public uses, and was void, because it was in restraint of trade, and tended to create a monopoly. In West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Ohio River Pipe Line Co. it was held that an owner of 2000 acres of oil land could not grant to one pipe line company an exclusive right to lay a pipe line across said lands, because the legislature, by authorizing pipe line companies to condemn lands for the construction of such lines, had thereby declared that the public had an interest in their construction, and that a contract which precluded such companies from laying a line across an extensive tract of land was necessarily opposed to public policy. In Chicago Gaslight & C. Co. v. Peoples Gaslight & C. Co. the court held that a gas company, which had accepted a charter authorizing it to lay pipes and to supply gas throughout the entire limits of the city, could not disable itself from the performance of the public duty it had undertaken by entering into a contract with another company not to lay pipes and supply gas in a large section of said city. And in Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Co. a like contract by one gas company with another to abandon the discharge of public duties which had been devolved upon it by its charter was held, on that account, to be against public policy, and void, and to be void on the further ground that the contract was in open violation of a statute which prevented the company from "entering into a . . . contract with any other gas company whatever."

No doubt can be entertained that the contract involved in each of the cases last referred to was against public policy for its marked tendency to create a monopoly, and to suppress healthy competition. Two of the contracts were also vicious in the respect that the corporation had attempted to disable itself from exercising powers which had been conferred upon it for the public advantage. But we think, in view of the state of facts on which the decisions were predicated, and the points actually adjudicated, it would be unwise to deduce an unbending rule that any and every contract between two railway companies which enjoins or contemplates concert of action in the matter of establishing freight or passenger rates between competitive points is against public policy, and an unlawful restraint of trade. No case, we believe, has yet gone to that extent, or has declared that the business of transporting freight and passengers by rail is of such character that no restraint whatever upon competition therein is permissible. On the contrary, contracts between common carriers which imposed some restrictions upon competition have been frequently sustained by our highest courts, and the rule has been often applied that the test of their validity was not the existence, but the reasonableness, of the restriction imposed. Oregon Steam Nav. Co. v. Winsor, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 64, 22 L. ed. 315; Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 189 U. S. 79, 35 L. ed. 97; Mogul SS. Co. v. McGregor, 21 Q. B. Div. 544; Manchester & L. R. Co. v. Concord R. Co. (N. H.) 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 319, 9 L. R. A. 689; Wiggins Ferry Co. v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 78 Mo. 389, 39 Am. Rep. 519. But even if such an extreme view, as is above indicated, was once tenable, we fail to see how it can well be maintained since the passage of the Interstate Commerce Law, and the action that has been taken thereunder by the government Commission which was created to enforce its provisions. The Interstate Commerce Law imposes several important restrictions upon the right of railway companies to do as they please in the matter of making and altering rates, and Congress has thereby expressed its conviction that unrestrained competition between carriers is not, at the present time, and under existing conditions, most conducive to the public welfare, but that other things are quite as essential to the public good. Mark the difference in public policy towards merchants and railroad companies exhibited by the common law and by the Interstate Commerce Act. Merchants may refuse to sell their wares at all, they may refuse to transact any business; but railroad companies are common carriers; they must furnish transportation when requested; they must operate their roads or forfeit their franchises; merchants may charge any price they see fit for their wares, but railroad companies are restricted to reasonable and just charges for transportation (Interstate Commerce Act, § 1); merchants may sell articles of like character and value for as many different prices as they have different customers, but railroad companies are restricted to the same charges to all their customers for like services (Interstate Commerce Act, § 2); merchants may give to any customers or any localities any preference or advantage they choose over other customers or localities, but railroad companies are prohibited from giving any undue preference or advantage to any party or place (Interstate Commerce Act, § 3); merchants may sell articles of inferior value for higher prices than those they charge and receive for those of greater value, but railroad companies are prohibited from charging or receiving a greater compensation for a short haul than for a long haul (Interstate Commerce Act, § 4); merchants may keep their prices secret; railroad companies must publish their rates for transportation, and are prohibited from charging or receiving a greater or less compensation than that specified in the published schedules (Interstate Commerce Act, § 6); merchants may change their prices instantly and without notice, railroad companies are prohibited from increasing their rates except after ten days' public notice or from decreasing them except after three days' public notice (Interstate Commerce Act, § 6); merchants may transact their business free from the supervision or interference of the government; but railroad companies are subject to the supervision of a Commission, established by the government, authorized to take the necessary proceedings for the enforcement of these restrictions (Interstate Commerce Act, § 12). These restrictions relate almost exclusively to rates for the transportation of freight and passengers. They are numerous, radical, and effective. They became operative by an Act of Congress three years before the Anti-Trust Act was passed, and they establish beyond cavil that from that date the public policy of the nation was that competition between railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce should not go wholly unrestricted.

If we turn now to the published reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission, whose opinion on such matters is certainly entitled to great consideration, we find the view even more clearly expressed that it was the purpose of Congress to place important restraints upon competition, that uncontrolled struggles for patronage by railway carriers are frequently detrimental to the public welfare, that rate wars are especially injurious to the business interests of the country and contrary to the spirit of existing laws, that the Interstate Commerce Act invites conferences between railway managers, and that concert of action in certain matters by railway companies is absolutely essential to enable it to accomplish its true purpose.

In the Fourth Annual Report of the Commission, at page 19, we find the following statement:

"It is thus seen at every turn that the regulation of rates on a consideration of the pecuniary or other situation of any single road, and without a survey of the whole field of operations whereby its business may be affected, and under a supposition that what is done in respect to that road may be limited in its consequences, is entirely antagonistic to all principles of railroad transportation. The railroad managers have perceived this from the very first, and it is because they have perceived this that they have been compelled to organize themselves into railroad associations, for the purpose of agreeing upon classifications and rates, and upon a great variety of other matters pertaining to the methods of conducting interlocking and overlapping business, and all business affected by competitive forces." And on page 21 of the same report the following:

"In former reports, the Commission has referred to the undoubted fact that competition for business between railroad companies is often pushed to ruinous extremes, and that the most serious difficulties in the way of securing obedience to the law may be traced to this fact. When competition degenerates to rate wars, they are as unsettling to the business of the country as they are mischievous to the carriers, and the spirit of the existing law is against them."

In the Second Annual Report, on page 25, when speaking of the unity of railroad interests, the Commission uses this language:

"But the voluntary establishment of such extensive responsibility would require such mutual arrangements between the carriers as would establish a common authority, which should be vested with power to make traffic arrangements, to fix rates, and to provide for their steady maintenance, to compel the performance of mutual duties among the members, and to enforce promptly and efficiently such sanctions to their mutual understandings as might be agreed upon."

And in the same report, on page 28, we find the following:

"A short road may sometimes make itself little better than a public nuisance by simply abstaining from all accommodation that could not by law be forced from it. It would not be likely to do this unless for some purpose of extortion from other roads, but the existence of a power to annoy and embarrass is a fact of large importance. The public has an interest in being protected against the probable exercise of any such power. But its interest goes further than this; it goes to the establishment of such relations among the managers of roads as will lead to the extension of their traffic arrangements with mutual responsibilities, just as far as may be possible, so that the public may have, in the services performed, all the benefits and conveniences that might be expected to follow from general federation. There is nothing in the existence of such arrangements which is at all inconsistent with earnest competition. They are of general convenience to the carriers as well as to the public, and their voluntary extension may be looked for until, in the strife between roads, the limits of competition are passed, and warfare is entered upon. But, in order to form them, great mutual concessions are often indispensable, and such concessions are likely to be made when relations are friendly, but are not to be looked for when hostile relations have been inaugurated."

In the First Annual Report, on page 83, the Commission further said:

"To make railroads of the greatest possible service to the country, contract relations would be essential, because there would need to be joint tariffs, joint running arrangements and interchange of cars, and a giving of credit to a large extent, some of which were obviously beyond the reach of compulsory legislation, and, even if they were not, could be best settled, and all the incidents and qualifications fixed, by the voluntary action of the parties in control of the roads respectively. Agreement upon these and kindred matters became, therefore, a settled policy, and short independent lines of road seemed to lose their identity, and to become parts of great trunk lines, and associations were formed which embraced all the managers of roads in a state or section of the country. To these associations were remitted many questions of common interest, including such as are above referred to. Classification was also confided to such associations, it being evident that differences in classification were serious obstacles to a harmonious and satisfactory interchange of traffic. But what perhaps, more than anything else, influenced the formation of such associations, and the conferring upon them of large authority, was the liability, which was constantly imminent, that destructive wars of rates would spring up between competing roads to the serious injury of the parties and the general disturbance of business. Accordingly, one of the chief functions of such associations has been the fixing of rates, and the devising of means whereby their several members can be compelled or induced to observe the rates when fixed."

It would extend this opinion to an unreasonable length if we assumed to state the reasons which probably influenced Congress to impose some restrictions upon competition in the matter of railway transportation, and to place railway carriers under the operation of a law which, for its successful execution, as pointed out by the Interstate Commerce Commission, seems to some extent to invite conference and concert of action. It is likewise unnecessary for us to state the reasons why railroad companies should be accorded the privilege of entering into arrangements with other companies which may, to some extent, regulate competition. Reasons to that effect have been stated with great ability and persuasive force in some of the cases to which we have already referred, notably in Manchester & L. R. Co. v. Concord R. Co. (N. H.) 8 Inters. Com. Rep. 819, 9 L. R. A. 689. But, without entering into that discussion, it is sufficient to say that, in our judgment, there was no hard and fast rule in force when the Anti-Trust Act was enacted which made every contract between railroad companies void on grounds of public policy if it in any wise checked competition. In our judgment, the more reasonable doctrine then prevailed, especially in view of the recent passage of the Interstate Commerce Act, that such contracts were void, if, judged in the light of all the circumstances and conditions under which they were made, they unreasonably restricted competition.

In view of the foregoing principles, it remains for us to examine the contract which is alleged to be in violation of the Anti-Trust Act, but before doing so a preliminary observation will not be out of place. The Anti-Trust Act is a criminal statute, and it should not be so construed as to subject persons to the penalties thereby imposed unless the contract complained of is one that is clearly within the provisions of the statute. It is also well to note that the case comes before us simply on bill and answer. The bill alleges that its purpose, and that of the association formed under it, was to suppress competition, enhance rates of freight, and monopolize the traffic. The answers deny these averments, and allege that the purpose of the contract and association was to carry into effect the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act, and to make rates public and steady. The bill alleges that the effect of the contract and association has been to raise the rates of freight above those which the public might have reasonably expected to obtain from free competition. The answers deny this allegation, and aver that the effect has been to maintain reasonable rates, and that more than 200 reductions of rates have been effected through the association. Upon a hearing on bill and answer the averments of fact contained in the bill are overcome by the denials of the answer, and the averments of fact in the answer stand admitted. Tanster v. Clark, 5 Allen, 66; Brinckerhoff v. Brown, 7 Johns. Ch. 217; Perkins v. Nichols, 11 Allen, 542.

The result is that the government's right to relief here rests upon the contract itself, and the fact that the rates maintained under it have not been unreasonable, and that many reductions have been made under its operation. The ordinary rules of interpretation must then be applied to the language of this contract, and, if it appears that its purpose and tendency were to unreasonably restrict competition, it must be declared illegal. Dillon v. Barnard, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 430, 437, 22 L. ed. 678, 676; Interstate Land Co. v. Maxwell Land Grant Co. 139 U. S. 569, 577, 35 L. ed. 278, 281.

In construing the contract it must also be remembered that fraud and illegality are not to be presumed, and that the purpose of the contract is that which is clearly manifest by its terms. In Mitchell v. Reynolds, 1 P. Wms. 181, the unfortunate remark "that wherever such contract stat indifferentior, and for aught appears, may be either good or bad, the law presumes it prima facie to be bad," fell from Chief Justice Parker. This seems to be the reverse of the proposition that every man is presumed to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty. It has long been repudiated by the courts of England and America. The burden is on the party who seeks to put a restraint upon the freedom of contract to make it plainly and obviously clear that the contract is against public policy, and the true rule of construction is that neither fraud nor illegality is to be presumed, but the contract is to be assumed to have been made in good faith for the purpose which appears on the face of it, and not colorably for any other. Printing & N. Reg. Co. v. Sampson, L. R. 19 Eq. 462; Tallis v. Tallis, 1 El. & Bl. 891; Rousillon v. Rousillon, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 851, 865; Stewart v. Erie & W. Transp. Co. 17 Minn. 872, 891; Marsh v. Russell, 66 N. Y. 289; Plippen v. Stickney, 8 Met. 884, 889.

Proceeding, then, to an examination of the contract, we find it to be substantially as follows: In the preamble there is a declaration that the association is formed for "mutual protection by establishing and maintaining reasonable rates, rules, and regulations, both through and local." Article 1 declares that substantially all traffic competitive between two or more members in that part of the United States between the Mississippi and Missouri rivers and the Pacific ocean shall be governed by the association. It is provided by article 2 that the association shall choose a chairman by unanimous vote; that there shall be regular monthly meetings of the association in which each member must be represented by some responsible officer authorized to act definitely on all questions to be considered; that a committee shall be appointed to establish rates, rules, and regulations for the traffic, and that these shall be put into effect; that any railroad company may give five days' written notice prior to any monthly meeting of any proposed reduction of rates or change of rules, and eight days' notice as to the traffic of Colorado or Utah; that thereupon the reduction or change shall be considered and voted upon by the association at the next monthly meeting, and all members shall be bound by the decision of the association, "unless then and there the parties shall give the association definite written notice that in ten days thereafter they shall make such modification notwithstanding the vote of the association;" that any member may without notice, at its peril, make any rate, rule, or regulation necessary to meet the competition of outside lines, subject to a liability to pay a penalty of $100 if the association decides by a two thirds vote that the rate, rule, or regulation was not necessary for that purpose; that all arrangements with connecting lines for the division of through rates relating to traffic covered by the agreement shall be made by authority of the association, and that the chairman of the association shall punish violations of the agreement by fines not exceeding $100 in any case. Article 8 makes the chairman the executive officer of the association, requires him to publish and furnish to the members of the association the rates, rules, and regulations established, and all changes in them, and requires him to enforce the provisions of the contract. Article 4 prohibits under-billing or billing at a wrong classification. Articles 5 and 6 provide for the appointment of the necessary employees and the payment of the necessary expenses of the association. Article 7 provides for arbitration in case the managers of the parties to the agreement fail to agree upon any question arising under it; and article 8 provides that any member may withdraw from the association on 80 days' notice.

It is obvious at a glance that this agreement is not affected by any of the vices of an ordinary pooling contract. The income of each member of the association under the terms of the agreement is still measured by the amount of freight and the number of passengers it carries, and it is still to the interest of each member of the association to make that patronage as great as possible, by affording to the public superior facilities for safe, speedy, and convenient transportation. Under the operation of the agreement, each company must still compete with its associate members in the character of its roadbed, quality of its equipments, length of route, convenience of its terminal facilities, and in the efficiency of its management, for all of these considerations will necessarily have a marked influence upon the amount of its patronage.

In other of its features, also, the contract is not subject to criticism. In these days, when persons engaged in many other callings and avocations are in the habit of meeting at intervals, as associations, for the purpose of cultivating more friendly relations and establishing regulations conducive to the general welfare of the trade, it is difficult to see upon what just grounds representatives of railway companies can be denied the right of forming associations for the purpose of friendly conference and to formulate rules and regulations to govern railway traffic. The fact that the business of railway companies is irretrievably interwoven, that they interchange cars and traffic, that they act as agents for each other in the delivery and receipt of freight and in paying and collecting freight charges, and that commodities received for transportation generally pass through the hands of several carriers, renders it of vital importance to the public that uniform rules and regulations governing railway traffic should be framed by those who have a practical acquaintance with the subject, and that they should be promulgated and faithfully observed. The advisability of establishing such rules and regulations in the mode above indicated, particularly for the uniform classification of freight, has been frequently pointed out in the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Indeed, the benefits that would result from uniform rules and regulations, and from uniformity in the classification of freight, seem to us so obvious that we need not stop to enumerate them.

We are of the opinion, therefore, that the stipulations of this agreement enjoining a monthly conference between representatives of the various members of the association, and the appointment of a committee to formulate rules and regulations governing the traffic embraced by the agreement are not only not opposed to public policy, but, if faithfully carried out, will tend to promote the public interests. It is also obvious, we think, that the stipulation requiring five days' written notice of a proposed reduction in rates does not, in and of itself, render the contract unlawful. It is certain that a contract not to reduce established rates without a public notice of three days, and not to increase them without a notice of ten days, would not be against public policy, because the Interstate Commerce Act has prohibited such changes with less notice. The plain object of this provision was to prevent competitors from resorting to secret, unfair, and ruinous methods of warfare, to make competition fair and open, and to enable shippers to modify their action to suit the coming changes. There is no purpose of the provision, or of the policy that dictated it, that would not be as well, if not better, served by a notice of fifteen or forty days, as one of three days.

But it is urged that the contract in question restrains competition in rates, and is therefore unlawful. That it does have some tendency to check competition in that respect will not be denied; but that the restraint imposed is slight, that there is abundant room within the terms of the agreement for the play of all the healthy forces of competition, and that it has a pronounced tendency to prevent sudden and violent fluctuations in rates, commonly termed "rate wars," seems to us to be equally manifest. It is not reasonable to suppose that any member of the association which, by virtue of its situation, can really afford to transport freight or passengers between any two competitive points for a substantially less sum than its competitors, will be likely to forego the advantage that its situation gives it, even under the operation of the agreement. It is much more probable that, under the operation of the agreement, as under the influence of free competition, the rates between competitive points will be largely, if not entirely, based upon the rate which the road having the shortest line and best facilities esteems fair and reasonable compensation.

It will be observed that under the terms of the agreement no member of the association has bound itself to be governed by a rate fixed by a vote of the majority for a longer period than ten days after the monthly meeting next succeeding its notification of a proposed change in rates; and for that reason the limitation imposed by the contract upon the right of a member of the association to adopt such a rate as it sees fit is very slight, and the power reposed in the association is correspondingly small. We fail to see, therefore, that the natural or probable effect of this contract will be to sensibly raise either freight or passenger rates above the level which they would attain under the influence of what is termed "unrestricted competition." On the other hand, it seems highly probable that the contract in question will prevent sudden and violent fluctuations in freight rates, such as often upset the business calculations of entire communities, and that this was one of the main reasons which led to the formation of the association. We are also persuaded that it will have a sensible tendency to induce a more uniform system of classification throughout the great region where the association operates, and also to induce the establishment of a more perfect code of rules and regulations governing freight traffic. It may also tend to prevent stealthy, secret, and unfair methods of warfare, and to make the strife for patronage among the members of the association open, fair, and honorable. All of these are objects that are in line with the true spirit of the Interstate Commerce Act and an intelligent public policy.

The result is that this contract, in view of all the circumstances of the case and the situation of the parties thereto, does not impose such unreasonable restraints on competition as will warrant us in holding that it is one of those contracts or conspiracies in restraint of trade and commerce among the several states which fall within the inhibition of the Anti-Trust Act of July 2, 1890.

Nor is there any monopoly of trade, or any attempt to monopolize trade, within the meaning of that Act, evidenced by this contract. So far as can be learned from it, the association has never intended to have, and never has had or attempted to have, any trade. It has not held or attempted to obtain or hold any property except the moneys necessary for the bare expenses required to pay its officers and employes. It has been and is a mere adviser with its members upon disputed questions submitted by the contract to its consideration. So far as can be learned from the contract, each member of the association is striving with every other in its territory, whether a member of the association or not, to divert from the latter and gather to itself all possible trade. There are provisions in the contract that the chairman may authorize members to meet the rates of competitors who are not members of the association, and that any member may meet the rates of such a competitor at its peril; but these provisions were necessary for the protection of members of the association against the attacks of non-members. Without such provisions unreasonably low rates established by the latter would draw away the business of the members, and deprive them of the opportunity to compete on equal terms. These provisions give no company any higher right or greater power than it had before the contract was made, but simply reserved to each the privilege of exercising its original right to meet competition without giving the fifteen days' notice in case of a warfare upon it by a non-member.

A monopoly of trade embraces two essential elements: (1) The acquisition of an exclusive right to, or the exclusive control of, that trade; and (2) the exclusion of all others from that right and control. There is nothing in this contract indicating any purpose or attempt to obtain such a monopoly. The great transportation systems of the Great Northern Railway Company, the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and the Texas Pacific Railroad Company were operated in the region subject to the regulation of this association, but none of these companies were members of it; and, even if they had been, there would still have been no evidence of any attempt to monopolize trade here, because each member is left to compete with every other for its share of the traffic. Re Greens, 52 Fed. Rep. 104, 115.

The position that these railroad companies have so far disabled themselves from the performance of their public duties by the execution of this contract as to give ground for the avoidance of the contract, and for a forfeiture of their franchises, cannot be successfully maintained. It is well settled upon principle and authority that, where a corporation by a contract entirely or substantially disables itself from the performance of the duties to the public imposed upon it by the acceptance of its charter, the contract is void, and its franchise may be forfeited. The reasons for this rule, and some of the limitations of it, were stated by this court in Union Pac. R. Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 10 U. S. App. 98, 51 Fed. Rep. 309, 317-321; and it is unnecessary to repeat them here. It goes without saying that this rule in no way limits the power of a corporation to discharge its duties through agents of its own selection. There is no doubt that each of these corporations could lawfully appoint an expert or a committee of experts upon the subject of classification and rates of freight upon its road, empower him or them to fix the rates, and then maintain them for forty days unchanged. Practically the fifteen representatives of these companies, at a meeting of the association, their chairman, and their committee that originally fixed the rates and rules, together constitute an advisory committee on rates and rules of traffic, composed of men whose intimate knowledge of the needs of the shippers, and of the character and quantities of the commodities transported through the different portions of the wide area traversed by these railroads, and whose wide experience in the effect of various rates upon the accommodation of the public and the business of the companies fit them well to carefully consider and wisely establish just and reasonable rates throughout this territory. Such a committee each company acting independently might have appointed, and it is not perceived that the fact that two or more companies appoint the same men to establish rates and rules for the traffic upon their respective roads in any way invalidates the appointment of either.

Moreover, the power delegated to the association, its committee and chairman, is so limited in extent and so restricted in time that it is hardly worthy of serious consideration as the ground for the avoidance of a contract and the forfeiture of a franchise. The power granted to the committee originally chosen to establish the rates and rules expired by limitation upon a thirty days' notice of withdrawal from the association; the power of the association itself to prevent modifications and changes in the rules and rates established ceases after fifteen days' notice of an intention to make the modifications and changes notwithstanding its action. It is true that there is a provision in the second article of the agreement that regular meetings of the association shall be held, "unless notice shall be given by the chairman that the business to be transacted does not warrant calling the members together," but the remark of the counsel for the government that this gives the chairman power to prevent the consideration of proposed changes in rates, and thus to maintain them indefinitely, by preventing a meeting of the association, cannot be seriously considered. The effect of the contract is that, when a company gives notice of a proposed change of any importance, the meeting shall be held. Such a notice presents business to be transacted that does warrant calling the members together. If, under such circumstances, the chairman gives notice that there is no such business, he violates the contract. The presumption is that he will not violate it; and, if he does do so, that is no ground for an avoidance of the contract.

The result is that neither this contract nor the association formed under it can be held to be obnoxious to the provisions of the Anti-Trust Act in view of the facts admitted by the pleadings in this suit, and in the absence of other evidence of their consequences and effect.

Many of the considerations to which we have referred are presented upon the argument of the question whether or not the Anti-Trust Act applies to or in any way governs transportation companies that are engaged in that part of interstate and international commerce which consists solely of the transportation of persons and property, in view of the very substantial regulation of this part of commerce provided by the Interstate Commerce Act. The views we have expressed render it unnecessary to determine this question, and we express no opinion upon it. We rest this decision on the ground that, if the Anti-Trust Act applies to and governs interstate and international transportation and its instrumentalities, the contract and association here in question do not appear to be in violation of it.

The decree below is affirmed, without costs.

Thayer, D. J., concura.

Shiras, D. J., dissenting:

I am unable to concur in the conclusion reached by the majority of the court in this case, and propose to state the reasons for such nonconcurrence.

Assuming that the Anti-Trust Act of July 2, 1890, is applicable to interstate railroad companies and the business transacted by them, it seems to me entirely clear that the contract entered into by the railway companies forming the Trans-Missouri Freight Association is in contravention of the statute, in that it deprives the public of the benefit of free competition between the associated railway companies, and thereby subjects the commerce of the regions tributary to these lines of railway to the possibility, if not the certainty, of paying increased rates for the transportation of freight over the same.

It is doubtless entirely true that at the present time a more liberal rule prevails than in the earlier days in regard to contracts affecting the business carried on by private citizens or corporations, when the same is essentially of a private nature, and only indirectly affects the public at large. As is pointed out in the opinion of the court, the use of steam and electricity in connection with the mercantile and commercial business of the world has so greatly increased the facilities for commercial intercourse that contracts which a century ago would have been in fact an unreasonable restriction upon trade in its then condition would not now produce the same result, and hence would not fall within the condemnation of the principle which declares unlawful all contracts or combinations which work an unreasonable restriction upon trade and commerce. The principle itself, however, remains in force at the common law even in regard to business enterprises which deal only with matters of private interest, and only incidentally affect the community at large. At an early day a distinction was recognized at the common law between the rules applicable to business pursuits of a purely private nature and those connected with matters directly affecting the community at large; as, for instance, the dealing in commodities forming the necessities of life. Contracts or combinations tending to create a monopoly in the latter articles were condemned as contrary to public policy, when like contracts affecting other kinds of property were held to be valid; and the same principle holds good at the present time. Another distinction which is now firmly established and enforced grows out of the nature of the business contracted about, and the relation the contracting parties bear thereto. An individual or a private corporation engaged in a purely private enterprise may lawfully enter into contracts or combinations in regard thereto which would be invalid and illegal if the business was of a public nature, and the corporation was created for the purpose of engaging therein. Thus in Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Co. 180 U. S. 396, 82 L. ed. 979, the Supreme Court, speaking by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, declared that—

"The supplying of illuminating gas is a business of a public nature to meet a public necessity. It is not a business like that of an ordinary corporation engaged in the manufacture of articles that may be furnished by individual effort. . . . Hence, while it is justly urged that those rules which say that a given contract is against public policy should not be arbitrarily extended so as to interfere with the freedom of contract (Printing & N. Reg. Co. v. Sampson, L. R. 19 Eq. 463) yet in the instance of business of such character that it presumably cannot be restrained to any extent whatever without prejudice to the public interest, courts decline to enforce or sustain contracts imposing such restraint, however partial, because in contravention of public policy. This subject is much considered, and the authorities cited in West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Ohio River Pipe Line Co. 22 W. Va. 600; Chicago Gas- light & C. Co. v. People's Gaslight & C. Co. 121 Ill. 530; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. American U. Teleg. Co. 65 Ga. 160, 38 Am. Rep. 781. . . . Innumerable cases, however, might be cited to sustain the proposition that combinations among those engaged in business impressed with a public or quasi public character, which are manifestly prejudicial to the public interest, cannot be upheld."

In West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Ohio River Pipe Line Co. 22 W. Va. 600, it is said:

"If there be any sort of business which from its peculiar character can be restrained to no extent whatever without prejudice to the public interest, then the courts would be compelled to hold void any contract imposing any restraint, however partial, on this peculiar business, provided, of course, it be shown clearly that the peculiar business thus attempted to be restrained is of such a character that any restraint upon it, however partial, must be regarded by the court as prejudicial to the public interest."

In Chicago Gaslight & C. Co. v. People's Gaslight & C. Co. 121 Ill. 530, it is declared that—

"The ordinary rule that contracts in partial restraint of trade are not invalid does not apply to corporations like appellant and appellee, because they were engaged in a public business, and in furnishing that which was a matter of public concern to all the inhabitants of the city."

It is not necessary to extend the citation of authorities upon this general proposition, but it is of vital importance to bear in mind the distinction that exists in this particular between private individuals or corporations engaged in ordinary business avocations and public corporations engaged in the performance of a public or governmental duty, like that of building and operating a public highway in the form of a railway line.

From the earliest days the duty of constructing and maintaining the public roads of a country has been recognized as one incumbent upon the government. To secure the construction of a railway running over the property of many individuals, the right of eminent domain must be called into exercise, and thus the character of a public enterprise is impressed upon it both by reason of the purpose it is intended to subserve and by reason of the governmental power exercised in its creation and maintenance. So, also, corporations created for the purpose of building and operating public highways in the form of railroads are of necessity public, not private corporations, because they are formed for the purpose of engaging in the public work of constructing and operating a highway for the use of the people at large, and because they are authorized to call into exercise the governmental right of eminent domain, a right which cannot be lawfully conferred upon a private corporation engaged solely in enterprises private in their nature. The failure to recognize the distinction existing between private enterprises carried on by individuals or private corporations, and public duties performed through the agency of public corporations, in my judgment has mised the court in reaching the conclusion announced in the majority opinion.

As applied to private associations, the modern authorities undoubtedly sustain the proposition therein laid down, "that it is not the existence of the restriction of competition, but the reasonableness of that restriction, that is the test of the validity of contracts that are claimed to be in restraint of trade;" but that, in my judgment, is not the test of validity when the action of public corporations relative to public duties is brought in question.

Parties engaged in the manufacture or sale of lumber, dry goods, or other like articles primarily owe no duty to the public in connection therewith. They may limit or enlarge, continue or discontinue the business, as they please, and may charge exorbitant prices or the contrary. In these particulars they owe no special duty to the public, for they are not exercising any sovereign or public powers in carrying on such private enterprises, nor are they charged with the performance of a public duty. Hence they are at liberty to enter into contracts with other private parties engaged in like pursuits which may tend to regulate or restrict the business carried on by them, subject, however, to the rule that restrictions unreasonably affecting the freedom of trade and commerce cannot be sustained, because thereby the public interests are affected. Touching contracts between private parties in regard to pursuits essentially private in their nature, the test of validity we thus find to be the actual effect thereof on the public welfare. In regard to such private enterprises the public has no voice in the management thereof, nor any right of dictating what shall or shall not be done by the owners thereof, nor have the latter become bound to carry on the business in the interest or for the benefit of the public primarily. The contrary is true with regard to public corporations, clothed with the power to fulfill public duties, and engaged in enterprises the purpose of which is to discharge a governmental duty, and which require in their performance the exercise of the sovereign right of eminent domain.

Such public corporations owe primarily a duty to the community, and the relations existing between them and the public are in many particulars radically different from those pertaining to private corporations. Neither extended argument nor the citation of authorities is needed to show that the business of railway transportation is one of a public character, and which reaches and affects the business interests of the entire community. When a highway in the form of a railroad is constructed and put in operation, all parties living in the regions adjacent thereto are dependent upon the railroad for the carrying on of all business which involves the transportation of persons or property in connection therewith. The farmer is compelled to use the railway for the transportation of the products of his farm to market. The merchant must use the same agency in bringing to his place of business the merchandise in which he deals. Practically the business of the community, whether in connection with articles of prime necessity, like food or fuel, or the other articles which are produced or dealt in by the people at large, becomes of necessity wholly dependent upon the facilities for transportation furnished by the given railway. As to the majority of the community living along its line, each railway company has a monopoly of the business demanding transportation as one of its elements. By reason of this fact the action of the corporation in establishing the rates to be charged largely influences the net profit coming to the farmer, the manufacturer, and the merchant from the sale of the products of the farm, the workshop, and manufactory, and of the merchandise purchased and resold, and also largely influences the price to be paid by every one who consumes any of the property transported over the line of railway. There is no other line of business carried on in our midst which is so intimately connected with the public as that conducted by the railways of the country.

Certainly, if it be true, as held in Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Co. 180 U. S. 396, 83 L. ed. 979, that the supplying of gas for illuminating purposes is a business of a public nature, because it supplies a public necessity, and that it is of such a character that contracts between companies engaged therein, looking to a regulating of competition, cannot be sustained because inimical to the public welfare, then it must also be true that the furnishing facilities for the transportation of the products of the country by means of railways is likewise a public business, and one of such character that contracts or combinations between the corporations engaged therein, intended to limit the effect of free competition upon the rates charged the public, must be held to be prejudicial to the public interests, and therefore to be invalid. It is said in the opinion of the court that—

"We find that it has long been settled that contracts or combinations of producers or dealers in staple commodities of prime necessity to the people, to restrict or monopolize their supply or enhance their price, pooling contracts or combinations between such producers or dealers to divide their profits in certain fixed proportions and pooling contracts or combinations between competing common carriers, are illegal restraints of trade, and void."

Are not railway companies engaged in the transportation of articles of prime necessity to the people? Do they not handle the food products of the country, the fuel, and all the other necessities of life? Do not the rates charged for the transportation of these articles have as much to do with determining the prices paid by the community as the rates charged by those engaged in buying and selling the same upon the open market? If combinations among the dealers in such articles to avoid competition and enhance the cost to the consumer are illegal and void, why are not combinations among common carriers engaged in the transportation of the same articles, tending to enhance the cost to the consumer by avoiding the effect of competition upon the rates of transportation, equally void?

If I correctly understand the opinion of the majority, it is therein admitted that it is the settled law that contracts or combinations between producers or dealers in staple commodities of prime necessity to the people, tending to monopolize the supply or enhance the price, are contrary to public policy and therefore void; and yet it is maintained that public corporations like railway companies may combine to fix the rates to be charged for the transportation of the like commodities, which, of necessity, affects the cost to the consumer as well as the value to the producer, and that contracts thus arbitrarily establishing the rates to be charged, and avoiding the effect of competition thereon, cannot be held to be invalid, unless it be clearly shown that the rates thus fixed are unreasonable. It seems to me the two propositions are clearly at variance.

The right to freely contract and combine possessed by private parties engaged in private pursuits is limited and denied when they come to deal with staple commodities, because the whole community is interested in these articles of prime necessity, and any contract affecting them affects the public; and clearly public corporations are under a more stringent rule in this particular.

Unlike private parties engaged in private pursuits, which only incidentally, if at all, affect the public welfare, corporations created for the purpose of constructing and operating the modern form of public highways owe primarily a duty to the public. They are created to subserve a public purpose, to wit, to furnish the means for the transportation of the people and property of the country, and they are under constant obligation to use their corporate powers in the interest of and for the benefit of the community from which these powers have been derived.

The right to demand transportation for one's self or property over such highways belongs to every member of the community, and the rate to be paid for such service is a question which affects every one using the highway, and, in addition, every member of the community is affected by the rates charged, for the amount thereof enters into and affects the price of every article that is bought and sold in the community. The duty of transporting persons and property over a line of railway is a public duty, assumed by the corporation operating the particular line, and in the proper performance thereof the public has a direct interest. The proper performance of this duty includes the rate of compensation to be charged for the services rendered, and this is a question in which the public has a direct and most important interest, and all contracts or combinations intended to affect the rate to be charged directly affect the public welfare. Clearly, therefore, railway transportation of persons and property comes within the classes of business, which, in the language of the Supreme Court in Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Co. 130 U. S. 396, 33 L. ed. 979, are of such a public character that presumably they cannot be restrained to any extent whatever without prejudice to the public interest.

In the opinion of the majority it is practically assumed that the same freedom to contract or combine with others is possessed by the public corporations engaged in railway transportation as belongs to private parties engaged in private pursuits. It does not so seem to me, either upon principle or authority. Private corporations are not created for the primary purpose of furthering the public interests, nor do they assume the performance of a public duty. Conducting private enterprises for private gain, there is no presumption that their acts will affect the public welfare, and hence their freedom of contract and action is not to be limited or denied, unless it clearly appears that the interests of the community will be injuriously affected by the action proposed to be taken. On the other hand, in the case of public corporations engaged in carrying on a public enterprise, it is apparent that every course of action intended to affect the business transacted by the corporation must of necessity affect the public interests.

A railway corporation engaged in the transportation of the persons and property of the community is always carrying on a public business, which at all times directly affects the public welfare. All contracts or combinations entered into between railway corporations, intended to regulate the rates to be charged the public for the service rendered, must of necessity affect the public interests. By reason of this marked distinction existing between enterprises inherently public in their character and those of a private nature, and further, by reason of the difference between private persons and corporations engaged in private pursuits, who owe no direct or primary duty to the public, and public corporations created for the express purpose of carrying on public enterprises, and which, in consideration of the public powers exercised in their behalf, are under obligation to carry on the work intrusted to their management primarily in the interest and for the benefit of the community, it seems clear to me that the same test is not applicable to both classes of business and corporations in determining the validity of contracts and combinations entered into by those engaged therein.

In the case of railway companies engaged in the public business of transporting persons and property from state to state over the highways of the country, it is, in my judgment, clearly contrary to the public welfare, and therefore illegal, for these public corporations to enter into contracts and combinations intended to limit or nullify the effect of free and unrestrained competition upon the rates to be charged the public for the services rendered in the transportation of persons or property over the public highway. So far as the national government has dealt with this question, it has as yet not undertaken to declare by statute what rates shall be charged by the railway companies, nor has it established a fixed maximum or minimum limit. In this particular the public has relied upon the effect of competition in keeping the rates charged within reasonable bounds. Hence it is that all sections of the country have so eagerly striven to secure the construction of competing lines of railway. There is scarcely a town or city in the community that has not felt the need of securing access to rival lines of transportation, in order that it might enjoy the benefits of competition in reducing the freight and passenger tariffs of the railway companies. If, after a community has by donations or taxation, expended a large sum in securing the construction of a second line of railway for the purpose of thereby enjoying the benefits of competition, it is open to the two railway corporations to combine together, and by contract establish a tariff of rates which neither company is at liberty to depart from, it is clear that the community is thereby deprived of its only protection against unfair charges.

In my judgment, the community is absolutely entitled to the protection against unfair rates which is afforded by free and unrestrained competition between the companies engaged in the transportation business of the country, and any contract or combination which is intended to restrict competition in this particular is inimical to the public welfare, and is therefore illegal.

In the opinion of the majority of the court it is urged, in substance, that it is lawful to place a reasonable restriction upon competition, and that, therefore, the question in each case is whether the restriction placed upon competition results in the imposition of unreasonable rates for the services rendered. This is the rule in regard to private parties engaged in private pursuits, because as to such pursuits a restriction upon competition does not affect the public unless it is unreasonable, and the public has no right of complaint until its interests are unfavorably affected; but, as I have endeavored to maintain, in the case of public railway corporations, the work they are engaged in is inherently of a public nature, and any contract or combination entered into between them, intended to affect the rates to be charged, must of necessity affect the entire community. In view of the public interest in the rates charged for transportation over the public highway, and in the absence of legislation affording other means of protection, the community cannot be deprived of the safeguard secured by free and unrestricted competition between the different lines of railway without placing the welfare of the public in subjection to the interests or supposed interests of those managing these corporations, which certainly cannot be lawfully done.

But it may be argued that due protection in this particular is afforded by holding that reasonable restriction upon competition as to rates will be sustained, and unreasonable restrictions will be held invalid. I apprehend that no other meaning can be given to this proposition than that, if the rates established under a given restriction upon competition are reasonable, then they will be sustained; otherwise not. The reasonable rates which the community is entitled to enjoy are those which result from free and unrestrained competition, and not those which are agreed upon by the railway companies in the absence of competition. In the absence of legislation establishing a standard for reasonable rates, and in the absence of rates fixed by free competition, what practicable criterion is there for determining whether a tariff of rates agreed upon by railway companies is or is not reasonable with reference to the public? If it be the law that railway companies may combine together, and by contract agree upon the schedule of rates to be charged, and bind themselves under penalties not to depart from the schedule thus established, and if the individual citizen can obtain no relief against the exaction of rates thus fixed, unless he can in each instance prove to a court and jury that the rate charged is unreasonable, then he is in fact wholly without remedy. The great cost and other evils of litigation of this character would ordinarily deter the private citizen from the effort to maintain his rights by an appeal to the courts.

But if the citizen should assume these burdens, and should contest the rightfulness of the charges complained of, he would, under the view advanced in the majority opinion, be compelled to establish by competent evidence that the rate complained of was unreasonable. By what criterion is the question of the reasonableness of the rate charged to be determined? The article shipped is perhaps a carload or two of livestock or of wheat or other like products. Is the citizen to be compelled to attempt to prove what it really costs the railway company to transport these cars? Is the inquiry to embrace an investigation into the cost of the construction of the road, of the equipping the same, and of operating the road on the one hand, and into the total amount and character of the business done by the road, and of the amounts received therefrom, so as to ascertain whether a due relation exists between the income and expenditure? It must be apparent to any one that it would be wholly impracticable to enter upon such an investigation, and, if it was entered upon, the citizen would be at such a disadvantage as to amount to a total denial of justice to him. If it be said that the reasonableness of the rate charged is to be ascertained by comparison with the rates charged for like services by other railroads, then the rates accepted as the standard of comparison must be such as are the result of free competition, because it would not do to accept as a standard rates fixed by a combination, for it could not be known that these rates are reasonable, and the proposed standard would be without value as evidence. The difficulties that would of necessity be encountered by any citizen in establishing the unreasonableness of a particular rate charged him are such as to render a remedy by that method of no value, and hence it is that at all times the citizen is entitled to the protection afforded him by absolutely free competition between railway companies. Any contract or combination which tends to deprive the citizen of the protection thus afforded him is contrary to public policy.

In the opinion of the majority a very full and careful analysis is made of the various provisions of the contract entered into by the defendant companies, and the benefits to be derived therefrom are pointed out. I do not doubt that in many respects the provisions of this contract, if carried out, would operate beneficially for the companies and without injury to the public; but the illegality of the contract, in my judgment, lies in the fact that its main purpose is to protect the companies from the effects of free competition in reducing the rates to be collected for the transportation of freight over the lines of railway operated by the contracting corporations. Certainly the defendants, if they considered themselves bound by this agreement, were no longer at liberty to compete with each other in the matter of rates to be charged the public.

The rates are to be established by a committee, and are to be observed by all the contracting parties, with a liability to a penalty for any breach of the contract. It is clearly evident that the defendants entered into this contract in the expectation that thereby a schedule of rates would be fixed which would differ from those which would prevail in the absence of such concerted action.

The several companies are no longer left free to fix rates based upon considerations pertaining to their own lines of railway, the cost of operating the same, and the facilities possessed for handling the business. If the making and enforcement of this contract would not have the effect of establishing a schedule of rates other and different from what would obtain in the absence of the contract, what induced the companies to enter into it?

I can place no other construction upon this contract than that its main object was to remove the question of rates from the field of competition. In my judgment, it is not necessary to enter upon a minute examination of the averments made in the bill and denied or admitted in the answer. The bill charges and the answer admits that the defendant companies entered into the contract in question, and the main issue in controversy is as to the validity of the contract. As I construe it, the invalidity thereof is apparent upon its face, in that it clearly appears that the purpose of the contract was to establish by agreement a schedule of rates which was to bind all the contracting companies, and which each company was bound to enforce as against its patrons; thus depriving the public of the protection resulting from free and unrestrained competition between these public corporations. It matters not that the particular rates now enforced under this contract may be wholly reasonable. That is not the question. The point to be decided is whether these public corporations, engaged in a public enterprise, have the right to agree that they will cease to compete with each other.

Whether these corporations shall or shall not be relieved from the effects of free and fair competition in the carrying on of the public work they are engaged in is a question to be decided by the people, acting through the proper governmental agency. It is not for the railway companies to decide when they will compete with each other and when they will not. The public welfare demands that they should remain always subject to the operation of this principle of free competition, unless they are freed therefrom by legislative action, whereby other safeguards are substituted for that afforded the public by the operation of the principle named.

If I correctly apprehend that portion of the majority opinion which deals with the effect of the Interstate Commerce Act, it is therein argued that this Act radically changes the rights of the railway companies and the public in this particular, and that it was intended thereby to free the companies from the effects of free competition. With all due deference to my brethren, I must yet be permitted to say that it seems to me that the opinion always loses sight of the distinction existing at the common law between parties following private pursuits and public corporations engaged in public enterprises.

The Interstate Commerce Act did not materially change the rights pertaining to the public. It created certain machinery for the better enforcement and protection of the public interests, but the rights to be protected were already in existence, and the statute in this respect is only declaratory of common law principles. Before the enactment of that statute, railway companies were recognized to be public corporations, charged with the duties and obligations pertaining thereto. As common carriers they were under legal obligation to deal with the public, and to afford equal facilities to every citizen, and they were only entitled to demand reasonable, and not exorbitant, compensation for the services rendered by them. The purpose of the Interstate Commerce Act was not so much to change the legal rights of the common carriers and of the public as it was to compel a change in the practices of the railway companies, and to enforce compliance on their part with the duties and obligations which rested upon them under the principles of the common law. The line of argument followed by the majority seems to assume that the main purpose of the Interstate Commerce Act is to regulate the relations between the competing lines of railway, and to protect the weaker lines of railway and the capital invested therein from being absorbed by the stronger competitor. That there are evils of this nature of great magnitude is not to be denied, but the Interstate Commerce Act was not enacted for their eradication.

The primary purpose of that Act was to deal with the relations existing between the common carriers and the public, and to enforce the rights of the latter. Experience had shown that railway companies had, in many instances, favored particular localities or particular parties or particular classes of business at the expense of the community at large, and the Act was, in the language used by the Supreme Court in Union Pac. R. Co. v. Goodridge, 149 U. S. 680, 37 L. ed. 896, intended "to cut up by the roots the entire system of rebates and discriminations in favor of particular localities, special enterprises, or favored corporations, and to put all shippers on an absolute equality." The uniformity and equality of rates sought to be secured by that Act are not between the schedules of rates charged by the several companies, but between the charges actually made by each railway company to its patrons. The Act does not require the schedule of rates adopted by one company to conform to that of a rival company. What it does demand of each company is that, in dealing with its customers, it shall make no unjust discrimination, but shall, for the like service performed under similar circumstances, charge the same rate to all. The Act provides that all charges for the transportation of persons or property from state to state shall be reasonable and just, but no standard for ascertaining whether a given rate is reasonable or not is established by the Act.

I fail, therefore, to perceive the force of the argument that the adoption of the Interstate Commerce Act worked a radical change in the relations existing between railway companies and the public, and that one effect thereof was to authorize the former to combine together for the purpose of escaping the effect of competition upon the rates to be charged the public for the services rendered. Before the adoption of that Act the community was certainly entitled to the protection derived from free competition between the lines of railway engaged in interstate traffic, and there is nothing in that Act which deprives the public of this safeguard. That Act was intended to secure to the public the enjoyment of the pre-existing right to reasonable rates upon interstate commerce, and to defend the public against the evils resulting from unjust discrimination on behalf of favored parties, localities, or classes of business.

In the opinion of the court are found citations from the reports of the Interstate Commission in which are depicted the evils that are occasioned to the railway companies and the public by warfares over rate charges, and the advantages that are gained in many directions by proper conference and concert of action among the competing lines. It may be entirely true that, as we proceed in the development of the policy of public control over railway traffic, methods will be devised and put in operation by legislative enactment whereby railway companies and the public may be protected against the evils arising from unrestricted competition and from rate wars which unsettle the business of the community, but I fail to perceive the force of the argument that, because railway companies, through their own action, cause evils to themselves and the public by sudden changes or reductions in tariff rates, they must be permitted to deprive the community of the benefit of competition in securing reasonable rates for the transportation of the products of the country. Competition, free and unrestricted, is the general rule which governs all the ordinary business pursuits and transactions of life. Evils, as well as benefits, result therefrom. In the fierce heat of competition the stronger competitor may crush out the weaker. Fluctuations in prices may be caused that result in wreck and disaster, yet, balancing the benefits as against the evils, the law of competition remains as a controlling element in the business world. That free and unrestricted competition in the matter of railroad charges may be productive of evils does not militate against the fact that such is the law now governing the subject. No law can be enacted nor system be devised for the control of human affairs that in its enforcement does not produce some evil results, no matter how beneficial its general purpose may be. There are benefits and there are evils which result from the operation of the law of free competition between railway companies. The time may come when the companies will be relieved from the operation of this law, but they cannot, by combination and agreements among themselves, bring about this change. The fact that the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act may have changed in many respects the conduct of the companies in the carrying on of the public business they are engaged in, does not show that it was the intent of Congress in the enactment of that statute to clothe railway companies with the right to combine together for the purpose of avoiding the effects of competition on the subject of rates.

There are three general methods by which these rates may be established. It may be done by direct legislative enactment (whereby either fixed rates or a maximum or minimum limit are enacted by the statute or by provisions for the adoption of rates by a commission) or the rates may be adopted by the independent action of each company, acting under the spur of self-interest, and controlled by the effect of free competition, or the rates may be fixed by means of agreements or combinations between the rival lines of railway, whereby each contracting company is bound to charge the rate thus fixed and agreed upon. Congress has not yet undertaken to establish a standard of rates, either directly or through the action of a commission or the equivalent. Neither, in my judgment, has Congress, in enacting the interstate commerce statute and the amendments thereto, conferred upon the railways the right to enter into combinations for the purpose of compelling the members to charge the rates fixed by a committee of the association, in whose deliberations the public have no part, and the avowed purpose of which is to evade the operations of the law of competition, which is as yet the only safeguard upon which the public can rely for the securing of the adoption of reasonable charges upon interstate traffic. I had always supposed that the enactment of the interstate commerce statute was the result of a popular demand, which insisted upon relief being given to the community as against the methods pursued by the railway companies which, in some particulars at least, were deemed to be inimical to the public interests. Looking at the causes which brought about the enactment of this statute, and the evils at which it was aimed, it does seem clear that it is wholly wrested from its purpose when it is held that it creates numerous radical and effective changes in the public policy of the nation touching competition between railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce. For the better protection of the rights of the public, and to sweep away the system of discriminations in favor of localities, individuals, or classes of business which had come into vogue, the Interstate Commerce Act was intended to introduce radical changes in railway methods, but it never was intended to curtail the rights of the public and enlarge those of the railway corporations in any substantial particular. The argument of the majority is that, even if it were admitted that under common law principles all contracts or combinations between public common carriers for the establishment of rates would be held to be contrary to public policy, nevertheless the enactment of the Interstate Commerce Act revolutionized the law in this particular, and authorized railway companies to enter into combinations for the purpose of establishing reasonable restrictions upon the freedom of interstate commerce.

Reading that Act in the light of the causes leading to its enactment, I cannot find in any of its provisions foundation for the theory that it was intended to confer upon railway companies the right to enter into combinations which, under the principles of the common law, would be illegal, because contrary to public policy. The reasoning of the court is to the effect that "the interstate commerce law imposes several important restrictions upon the right of railway companies to do as they please in the matter of making and altering rates, and Congress has thereby expressed its conviction that absolutely free competition between carriers is not at the present time conducive to the public welfare, and that other things are more essential to the public good."

I do not quarrel with the proposition that the Interstate Commerce Act imposes important restrictions (not upon the right, however) but upon the practice of railway companies to do as they please in the matter of making and altering rates. But how does that fact tend to show that the Act places restrictions upon the rights of the public? The Congress of the United States may place restrictions upon the rights of the railway companies and upon the rights of the public, but the fact that Congress may enact laws which are intended to change the methods pursued by the companies in certain particulars does not necessarily restrict the rights of the public. But if it be admitted that by some possible mode of construing the Interstate Commerce Act, and the action of the Commission created thereby, it can be held that under its provisions the railway companies became clothed with the right to combine together, and by mutual agreement to create restrictions upon the freedom of interstate commerce so long as the same are reasonable,—which is the position of the court,—then would it not follow that the right thus created by the Interstate Commerce Act is abrogated by the later enactment found in the Anti-Trust Act, which expressly declares, not that unreasonable contracts, combinations, or restrictions are illegal, but that every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states is illegal? The statute declares that restraint of interstate commerce, all restraints, every restraint of such trade and commerce brought about by contracts, combinations in the form of trusts or otherwise, or by conspiracy, are illegal. The statutory declaration in effect is that interstate trade and commerce are to remain free from restriction. The declaration of the court is, in effect, that railway companies engaged in interstate commerce may place restrictions upon such commerce; that the right so to do, if not existing under the common law, is conferred upon railway companies by the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act; that such restrictions cannot be held to be illegal unless it is shown that they are unreasonable, and the presumption is in favor of their reasonableness and consequent legality. I cannot believe that such is the meaning of the Interstate Commerce and the Anti-Trust acts. When the latter Act was adopted, it had been declared by the Supreme Court of the United States to be the law that, with regard to the classes of business that are of a public nature, and are carried on to meet a public necessity, contracts imposing restraints thereon, however partial, cannot be sustained, because in contravention of public policy. It cannot be successfully questioned that railway companies engaged in interstate trade and commerce are carrying on a business of such public character as of necessity places it in the class declared by the Supreme Court to be of such a nature that no restraint thereof, however partial, is permissible. It is a familiar principle that statutes are to be construed with reference to and in the light of the law existing at the date of their enactment. Thus reading the Anti-Trust Act, is not the first section thereof intended to clearly enunciate in statutory form the principle already declared to be the law by the Supreme Court? The Interstate Commerce and Anti-Trust acts were passed for the protection of the interests and enforcement of the rights of the public. The view taken thereof in the opinion of the court results in curtailing the rights of the public and in enlarging the powers of railway companies. If the law be as is therein declared, then these public corporations, engaged in carrying on the public duty of constructing and operating the public highways, over which, of necessity, nearly the entire traffic of the country must be carried, are at liberty to combine together and determine in secret to conclave the rates they will demand from the public for the services rendered, and enforce the imposition of the schedules thus fixed by penalties assessed against any party to the combination which may vary from the agreed schedule, and the individual citizen has no relief against rates thus fixed, unless he can satisfy some court or jury that the rate charged is unreasonable.

It is admitted in the opinion of the court that the contract in question has some tendency to check competition in rates, but it is said the restraint is slight, and therefore lawful. If the natural tendency is to check competition in the matter of rates, and to place a restraint, though but slight, upon the freedom of interstate traffic, what tribunal is to determine when the proper boundary has been passed, and by what standard is the lawfulness of the restraint to be measured? The legal consequence of the position of the court is that railway companies, by combinations between themselves, may fix the schedule of rates to be charged the public, and may bind themselves under penalties not to depart from the rates thus agreed upon, and the citizen is bound to pay the tariff thus established, unless he can satisfy a court that the sum charged is unreasonable. It may sound well to say that the courts are open to the citizen, and that they will afford him protection against the exaction of unreasonable rates, but we know that the supposed remedy would only aggravate the original wrong. It is said in the opinion of the court that there is nothing in the contract described in the bill which indicates any purpose or attempt to obtain a monopoly of the trade of the region traversed by the defendant corporations; that the systems of the Great Northern, the Northern Pacific, the Southern Pacific, and Texas Pacific railway companies are operated in the region subject to the regulations of the defendant association, but they are not members of it, and therefore the defendant companies cannot monopolize the entire traffic of the region. The great majority of the patrons of the several lines of railway represented in the association in question do not live at competitive points. As to each of them the line of railway nearest to them has, of necessity, an absolute monopoly of the carrying trade belonging to the business in which they are engaged. Of what advantage to a farmer, a merchant, or a manufacturer doing business at or adjacent to a station upon a given line of railway is the fact that 20 or 50 or 500 miles from his place of business there is another railway line? The distance is so great, and the cost of reaching the same is so great, that he is practically debarred from making use of the same, and he has no choice in the matter. Parties doing business at competitive points may have free choice, and as to them it may be true that neither competing line has a monopoly of the business transacted at places where competition, being free and unrestricted, may work out its legitimate results, but this is not true of persons engaged in business at noncompetitive points. As to them, the control of the railway company adjacent to them is practically absolute. Of necessity, in such case the railway company has a complete monopoly of the entire transportation traffic of the region in which there is in fact no competing line. Against the evil tendencies of this monopoly, protection is afforded to the citizen by securing free and unrestrained competition between the lines of railway at the several points or localities where they in fact come into active competition, and, reasonable rates having thus been secured at these points, we have a standard established by which it may be determined whether the rates charged from intermediate noncompetitive points are reasonable or not, and the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act forbidding a greater charge for a shorter than a longer haul under similar circumstances may be invoked to secure a proper proportionate relation between the rates at competitive and noncompetitive points. If, however, the railway companies may combine together to fix the rates to be charged at competitive points, thus eliminating the effect of free competition, how fares it with the citizen residing at the noncompetitive point? By the very necessities of his location he is debarred from choosing the line of railway he will patronize. He is compelled to avail himself of the facilities afforded by the line nearest him. The railway therefore has the absolute monopoly of the transportation pertaining to the business of the citizen. It likewise has the exclusive control of the rates to be charged; and if the company, by contracts and combinations with the other lines of railway operating in the same region, may free itself from the restrictions afforded by free competition, what is lacking to constitute a complete and absolute monopoly of the transportation business thus dependent upon the given line of railway? The direct and necessary consequence of the contract entered into by the defendant companies is to create and perfect an absolute monopoly in each of the contracting parties over that part of the business carried over their respective lines which comes from that portion of the territory in which there is not in active operation a competing line; and, even as to regions which are so situated that competition might be had in the absence of contracts preventing the effects thereof, a like monopoly is created by the contract entered into by the defendant companies.

In the matter of rates, competitive points are those where the transportation business of the locality is sought by two or more competing lines. In the case of sales of property at public auction, it is the rule that combinations among proposed purchasers, whereby it is agreed that they will not bid against one another, but the property shall be bid off at an agreed price for the common benefit of all the contracting parties, are illegal, and a sale thus made is voidable, because all fair competition is prevented by such combination. If the competitors for the transportation business of a given locality agree that there shall be no competition between them on the subject of rates to be charged, does not the same evil result? In the one case it is sought to deprive the owner of his property, without paying to him the fair value that would probably be bid in case competition was not stifled by the agreement between the purchasers. In the other the citizen is subjected to the payment of charges which are not the result of free competition, but are the result of combinations and mutual agreements, entered into for the express purpose of eliminating competition as an element in the determination of the rate to be charged. Thus points and localities which are competitive so long as there is active rivalry between the railway lines seeking the business of the region cease to be such when the rival lines combine and become, in effect, but one upon the subject of the charges to be demanded of the citizens. In such event the citizen becomes subject to a monopoly as complete and absolute as though there was but a single line of railway within his reach. Thus is found in the contract and combination entered into by the defendant companies elements which directly tend to the establishment of a monopoly, complete and absolute, over the transportation traffic in the region traversed by the lines of the defendant companies, due to the undeniable fact that the price charged for the transportation of the property of the community exercises a controlling influence over the question of the success or failure of the various business pursuits and avocations upon which the citizens are dependent for a livelihood, and, moreover, it directly affects and controls the cost to the public of all the necessities of life.

The declaration found in article I. of the contract shows upon its face the main purpose of the combination, it being therein recited that "the traffic to be included in the Trans-Missouri Freight Association shall be as follows: (1) All traffic competitive between any two or more members hereof passing between points in the following described territory," etc. Does not this clearly show that the main purpose of the contracting parties is to deal with that traffic which, in the absence of combinations between the railway companies, would be controlled by the results of competition, and to deal with it in such manner that it will cease to be competitive traffic and become the subject of combinations and agreements whereby the rates to be charged—which is the essential element in which the public has a vital interest—is removed from the protection derivable from free and unrestrained competition, and is left to the determination of committees appointed by the railway companies, whose action is binding upon the members of the association, and against which the individual citizen is without adequate remedy, no matter how unjust the rate fixed by the committee may in fact be?

Another feature observable on the face of this contract is that by the exceptions contained in article I. the traffic between many points and in some classes of freight are excepted out from the operation of the agreement, and thus it appears that it is the express purpose of the defendant companies to carry on part of their business subject to the results flowing from combinations between the carriers, and other portions are not to be affected thereby. Is it not the natural result that the public will be subjected to different burdens, and that differences in rates will be charged, which in effect will result in discriminations for or against particular localities? But I shall not dwell upon this and other points of minor importance. As I view the subject, the inherent and fatal vice existing in the combination and agreement entered into between the defendant railway companies is found in the fact, patent upon the face of the contract, that it is the main purpose of the contracting parties to stifle competition in the matter of rates to be charged the public. The illegality of such purpose is not dependent upon the extent of the restraint placed upon the freedom of the public business, but upon the fact that the avowed intent is to place a restraint, whether slight or great, upon a class of business which is inherently and always of a public nature, and touching which the declaration of the law, both common and statutory, is that it must remain wholly free and unrestricted. If the protection afforded by fair and free competition can be evaded and nullified by means of combinations such as are contemplated and provided for in the contract entered into by the defendants in this case then the only safeguard against unreasonable rates will be stricken down, and thus interstate commerce will be subjected to the restraints and injuries flowing from the imposition of tariff rates agreed upon by the companies, but in the establishment of which the public has no direct control through legislation, nor direct influence through the effect of free competition.

In my judgment, the right to insist upon free competition between railway companies engaged in carrying on interstate commerce is a right which belongs to the public, of which it cannot be deprived except by its own consent, and every contract or combination between these public corporations which tends to remove the business carried on by them from the influence of free competition tends to deprive the public of this right, of necessity tends to subject interstate commerce to burdens which are a restraint thereon, is inimical to the public welfare, is contrary to public policy, and in contravention of both the language and spirit of the Anti-Trust Act of July 2, 1890.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

Sidney J. KOHN et al., Respts.,
v.

1. A demand of goods in the hands of a carrier by virtue of a chattel mortgage after condition broken but without any legal process made by a constable acting merely as agent of the mortgagees will not make the carrier liable for conversion if it refuses to surrender them where the goods were received from a third person who has a bill of lading therefor.
2. No admission as to the ownership of chattels in possession of a carrier is shown by the fact that the one holding the bill of lading remains silent when an unsuccessful demand is made by a third person for them upon the carrier in his presence under alleged title papers, which will make the carrier's refusal to comply with the demand wrongful.

(Pope, J., dissents.)

(November 18, 1892.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Newberry County affirming a judgment of a trial justice in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged conversion of certain chattels. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. F. J. Caldwell, for appellant:

A refusal upon demand is no evidence of conversion, if the party bona fide and reasonably refuse on the ground of his not being satisfied that the party making the demand is the real owner of the goods, etc.

1 Chitty, Pl. *160.

In action of trover against bailee (hirer) of slave by bailor, the bailee should not be allowed to prove ownership of property in a third person, being held incapable of disputing the title of his bailor.

He is responsible if he delivers to a third person who afterwards appears not the rightful owner.

Mr. George S. Mower, for respondents: In Spriggs v. Camp, 2 Speers, L. *181, it was also held that the mortgagor had no more than a permissive possession under a license resulting from the covenant in the mortgage. It would seem to follow that where the mortgagor parted with the possession, the mortgagee would be entitled to recover upon a refusal to deliver the property upon demand. There is no doubt that after breach of condition the legal title vests in mortgagee.

Any withholding of the property against the will of the owner is evidence of a conversion.

Jones v. Dugan, 1 McCord, L. 480. See also Hutchinson v. Bobo, 1 Ball. L. 546; Harris v. Saunders, 2 Strohn. Eq. 370.

A refusal by the mortgagor to deliver possession of the property on demand amounts to a conversion of it, and action for the conversion will lie.

Wrongful intent is not an essential element of the conversion.

Lavery v. Sneathen, 68 N. Y. 522, 23 Am. Rep. 184.

In the case at bar there was a refusal to deliver the property to the owner upon demand.

Lewis v. Mobley, 20 N. C. 323, 34 Am. Dec. 379.

The appellant could not, even if an adverse claim had been made by Clendenning, defend or defeat respondents' action by asserting that it had decided in favor of Clendenning, and had aided him in removing the property against the will of the respondents, who were clearly entitled to the property under their mortgage.

McIver, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs bring this action to recover damages for the conversion of certain personal property alleged to belong to plaintiffs. The facts may be briefly stated as follows: On the 13th of October, 1887, one Clendenning delivered to the agent of defendant company at Prosperity the property in question, consisting of a lot of household goods, to be shipped by defendant's train to Laurens. After said agent had received and receipted for said goods, defendant's agent was notified by an agent of plaintiffs not to ship said goods, as they belonged to plaintiffs under a mortgage given by Clendenning to plaintiffs, the condition of which had been broken. The goods were, however, placed on the cars, and the cars sealed. Soon after this, and just before the arrival of the train for Laurens, one Hair, a constable, appeared at the depot with the mortgage, upon which an indorsement had been made by a trial justice, purporting to authorize said Hair to take possession of the goods, and demanded them from defendant's agent, who refused to deliver them, upon the ground that the paper was not sufficient; "that I ought to have had a distress warrant." Clendenning was present at the time, but, so far as appears from the evidence, neither said nor did anything. The goods remained at the depot, in the car in which they had been placed the evening before, until 1 o'clock the next day, when they were sent on to Laurens; no further steps having in the meantime been taken by plaintiffs to obtain possession of said goods. The mortgage above spoken of was given by Clendenning to the plaintiffs to secure the payment of a note which fell due on the 1st of May, 1887. The plaintiffs having obtained judgment for the value of the goods, defendant appeals upon the several grounds set out in the record, which need not be specifically stated, as the case turns upon the single question whether a common carrier who has received goods for transportation from one person, and given him a bill of lading therefor, is bound to surrender them upon demand to a third person, who claims to be the true owner thereof, under pain of being liable to an action for the conversion of said goods at the suit of such third person. It is conceded that under the stringent rule of the common law a common carrier is liable as an insurer for goods committed to his charge for transportation, and nothing but the act of God or the public enemies will excuse him for failure to deliver the goods at their destination to the person to whom he has contracted to deliver them,—the consignee. Under this rule it is very obvious that the carrier would be liable to his bailor even if the goods were taken from his possession by process of law, and much more so if he voluntarily delivered them to the true owner, for this would not be either the act of God or of the public enemy. But it is claimed, and, we think, justly, that this stringent rule has been modified so as to excuse the carrier from liability where the goods have been taken from his possession by process of law, provided the carrier gives prompt notice of such seizure to his bailor; for, as it is well put by Campbell, Ch. J., in Pingree v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co., 66 Mich. 143: "If he is excusable for yielding to a public enemy, he cannot be at fault for yielding to actual authority what he may yield to usurped authority." See also Stiles v. Davis, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 101, 17 L. ed. 33. And the same doctrine is, at least impliedly, recognized, though the point was not distinctly raised, in our own case of Faust v. South Carolina R. Co., 8 S. C. 118. It is also contended 24 L. R. A.

that the rule is still further modified so as to excuse the carrier from liability to his bailor for the nondelivery of goods intrusted to him for transportation if he can show that he has delivered the goods to a third person, who was the true owner, and entitled to the possession thereof, and the case mainly relied upon to establish this proposition is The Idaho, 93 U. S. 575, 23 L. ed. 978, though there are cases which have been decided in several of our sister states recognizing the same doctrine. In our own state, however, we have no case, so far as we are informed, which recognizes this modification of the rule as to a carrier's liability. It is true that the case of Robertson v. Woodward, 8 Rich. L. 251, does seem to recognize the doctrine that an ordinary bailee—not a common carrier—may dispute the title of his bailor in an action of trover brought by the latter by showing that his bailor had sold the subject of the bailment before the bailment arose, and that defendant was authorized to defend the action, for the benefit of the purchaser. But it seems to us somewhat difficult to reconcile that case with the previous case of Manning v. Norwood, 2 Mill. Const. 374. Be that as it may, however, and assuming, for the purposes of this case, that the stringent rule of the common law as to a carrier's liability has been thus further modified; as contended for by respondents, the question still remains whether the rule thus modified applies to this case. It will be observed that the cases which establish or recognize this modification of the rule only go to the extent of holding that a common carrier may deliver the goods intrusted to him for transportation to the rightful owner upon his demand, and, if he does, he may defend himself against an action brought by his bailor to recover damages for the nondelivery according to the contract of bailment by showing that he has delivered the goods to the rightful owner; but none of them go to the extent of holding that he is bound to deliver them to one who demands them as rightful owner, unless it be the case of Wells v. American Exp. Co., 55 Wis. 23, 42 Am. Rep. 695. In that case a package of money was intrusted to the carrier to be delivered to Wells & Cartwright. When the package addressed to Wells & Cartwright reached its destination, the money was demanded by Wells alone, he claiming to be the sole owner, and that Cartwright had no interest in it, to which Cartwright, being present, assented verbally, though "there was no assignment by Cartwright of his apparent interest in the package to Wells, and no written order by Cartwright to deliver to Wells, and no offer of any receipt or acquittance from both." The defendant refused to deliver the money to Wells alone, and insisted also that the money had been subjected to garnishee proceedings against Cartwright. Wells then brought his action, not upon the bill of lading or express receipt, but for money had and received, and the court held that, "irrespective of the garnishment," the plaintiff, having established his individual right to the money, was entitled to recover. The authorities cited by the learned judge, while they do establish the doctrine that a common carrier may, with safety, deliver to the rightful owner, do not establish the doctrine that he is bound to do so; and his as-assumption that the one follows from the other is not, in our judgment, well founded. In addition to this, the action in that case was for money had and received, which does not necessarily imply a tort on the part of defendant; while here the action is for the conversion of the goods, which does involve the idea of tort. Again, in that case it appeared that Cartwright, one of the persons named as consignee, was not only present when Wells, the other consignee, demanded the money, claiming it as his individual property, but actually assented to such claim, and hence the carrier had no excuse for refusing to comply with the demand.

It seems to us that the whole case turns upon the question whether a carrier, resting under very stringent obligations to his bailor, is bound to assume the burden, where a third person makes a demand upon him for goods intrusted to him for transportation, not enforced by legal process, of showing not only that such third person is the rightful owner, but is also entitled to the immediate possession of the goods. It seems to us that common justice would require that such burden should be assumed by the claimant, who is most likely to have the means of meeting it, and not upon the carrier, who cannot be supposed to know anything about the real ownership of the goods; and has a right to assume that the person from whom he received possession of the goods was such rightful owner; possession of personal property being evidence of title. The most that could be properly required of the carrier would be to hold the goods, notifying his bailor of the demand which had been made upon him, and let the claimant contest with the bailor the question of ownership. Under these views, we do not think that the judgment below can be sustained. The goods were not seized or demanded under any legal process. The fact that the person selected as the agent of plaintiffs to enforce their mortgage claimed to be a constable cannot affect the question, for, even where a mortgage of personal property is placed in the hands of the sheriff, with instructions from the mortgagee to seize and sell the mortgaged property, the sheriff does not act officially, but merely as the private agent of the mortgagee. Robins v. Ruff, 2 Hill, L. 406. It is claimed, however, that the bailor, Clendenning, being present when the goods were demanded of the defendant's agent by the agent of the plaintiffs, and saying nothing, was an admission that plaintiffs were the rightful owners, and entitled to the immediate possession of the goods, and therefore defendant had no excuse for refusing to comply with the demand. We cannot take that view. We do not see what obligation rested upon him to interpose in the colloquy between the agents of plaintiffs and defendant. He delivered the goods for shipment to the defendant, and held its bill of lading obligating defendant to deliver them according to its terms, and there was no occasion for him to speak. If he had stood silently by and allowed the defendant to deliver the goods to plaintiffs, claiming to be the rightful owners, without protest or objection, we can very well see how he might have been estopped from subsequently claiming them from defendant; but we do not see how his silence when plaintiffs were making an unsuccessful demand on defendant could possibly affect the question involved here.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded for a new trial.

McGowan, J., concurring:

The amount involved in this case is not large, but the principle is important. After careful consideration, it seems to me that, when a common carrier is intrusted with property for transportation, his first responsibility is to the person who has intrusted him with the property, and, upon claim of the property by a third party, that he should not be required, at his risk, to judge between the parties as to the ownership of the property. He should, however, always and at once yield to the force of legal process, which intervenes and takes the property, thus relieving the carrier from the responsibility of being judge in the matter. I have not been able to satisfy myself that the paper presented to the official of the railroad in this case was in the proper sense "legal process." It seems to have been a simple mortgage of personal property, after condition broken, but there was about it none of the usual indicia of legal process, such as a summons, warrant, writ, or seal of the court. It did not appear that there had been any judicial determination of the matter, and the paper was in the hands of one who, on the occasion, was acting merely as the agent of the mortgagees. For this reason I concur in the opinion of the chief justice.

Pope, J.: I dissent, and will file a dissenting opinion.

NOTE.—This case has been held in type for the purpose of embodying the dissenting opinion in the report, but the opinion has not yet been filed and it is impracticable to wait longer for it. [ED.]

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the General Term of the Court of Common Pleas for the City and County of New York, affirming a judgment of the Trial Term in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiffs' property caused by third persons with whom defendants had contracted for the shoring up of adjacent buildings during the process of excavation for a cellar on defendants' land. Reversed.

Statement by Andrews, Ch. J.:

The plaintiffs were wholesale merchants, and lessees of the first floor and basement of No. 632, Broadway, New York city, where they conducted the business of the sale of millinery goods. The defendants owned the adjacent lot on the south, and, being about to erect a new building thereon, upon a plan which required their lot to be excavated twenty-two feet below the curb, entered into a written contract with the firm of F. & S. E. Goodwin, professional shorers, whereby that firm agreed as follows: "We agree to do the shoring, sheath piling, and bridging (as required by law) that is necessary to erect buildings Nos. 628 and 630 Broadway, running through to Crosby street; do the work, according to plans and specifications, for the sum of one thousand one hundred and seventy-five dollars; work to commence at once when ready ($1,175), also agree to be responsible for any accident by improperly doing the work." The foundation of the southern wall of the building occupied by plaintiffs was nine feet below the surface, and, unless shored up in some way during the progress of the excavation on the defendant's lot, the wall would naturally be undermined, and would probably fall. The contractors entered upon the premises occupied by the plaintiffs, and inserted needle beams in the basement of the building, breaking the wall for that purpose, and occasioned serious damage to the stock of goods of the plaintiffs from dirt and their exposure to dampness, and greatly hindered them in the transaction of their business. There was conflicting evidence upon the question whether the contractors obtained permission from the plaintiffs to enter the premises for the purpose of shoring up the wall. The plaintiffs denied that such permission was given, and they gave evidence tending to show that they protested against such entry, and that the contractors, in defiance of their protest, invaded their premises, and committed the trespasses of which they complain. On the part of the defendants one of the contractors testified, in substance, that before commencing the work he informed one of the plaintiffs that he was employed to do the shoring, and pointed out what was necessary to be done; that he consented that the witness might proceed with the work. The judge submitted to the jury the question whether such consent was given, and charged them that if consent was given the plaintiffs could not recover in this action. It was conceded that the Goodwins were independent contractors, and the judge so charged the jury. It was shown that they had large experience in this kind of work, and their competency was not questioned. One of the contractors testified that he had forty years' experience, and he further testified: "I know of no other way in which I could have shored up that brick wall than the way which was employed." It does not appear that the defendants gave any directions to the contractors during the progress of the work, or that they had any knowledge of the circumstances under which they entered the plaintiffs' premises, or whether such entry was with or without the license of the plaintiffs. Their connection with the transaction commenced and ended, so far as appears, with the making of the written contract above given, except that one of the plaintiffs, after the work had progressed for some time, asked one of the defendants to intercede with the contractors to do the work in a way which would cause them less inconvenience, which he promised to do. The defendants neither employed nor had any control of the men engaged in the work. They were employed and paid by the contractors. The court charged the jury that if the plaintiffs gave no license to the contractors to enter the premises to do this work the defendants were liable for the injury sustained by the plaintiffs.

Mr. Nathaniel Myers, for appellants:

The plaintiffs' building was not entitled to be supported by defendants' land.

Radcliff v. Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. 203, 58 Am. Dec. 357.

The judgment in this case can find no justification in anything contained in the Act of the legislature of 1855.

(a) Because that act is unconstitutional.

That statute imposes a servitude upon land not existing under the common law, and it finds no justification in the police power of the state or any other constitutional power.

(b) That the Act of 1855 applies only to a case where the one excavating is "afforded the necessary license to enter on the adjoining land, and not otherwise."

Goodwin was an independent contractor; and the defendants are not liable for his acts, they having simply contracted with him to do "necessary" things in a "lawful" way.

One contracting with another to do a lawful act is presumed to have contracted with him to do it in a lawful manner.

If the contract is a legal one the wrongful acts of the independent contractor are his own, and not those of the party with whom the contract is made, but who has no control over the details of the work nor over the means which the contractor employs to fulfill his contract.

It was error for the court to charge the jury that although they should find that plaintiffs had consented to the entry by Goodwin and to his inserting the needles, still their verdict should be for plaintiffs, if they found that Goodwin did his work negligently.

Mr. Eugene S. Ives, for respondents:

The necessary effect of the contract whereby the defendants employed Mr. Goodwin was the trespass and the damage consequent thereupon.

Under such cases the employer as well as the contractor is liable.

Pierrepoint v. Loveless, 72 N. Y. 211; Atlanta & F. R. Co. v. Kimberly, 87 Ga. 161.

The claim of the appellants to the effect that the defendants had a right to enter upon the premises of the plaintiffs without permission is not sound.

Johnson v. Oppenheim, 55 N. Y. 286.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The entry by the contractors upon the premises without the license and against the protest of the plaintiffs was a trespass, and rendered them liable for the damages sustained by the plaintiffs to their possession, and to the merchandise in the store, resulting from the unlawful entry. The liability would extend also to any person who advised or directed the unlawful acts. It was upon this principle that the court charged the jury that the defendants were liable if the entry was without the license of the plaintiffs. The court regarded the contract made by the defendants with the contractors as in law a direction by them to the contractors to commit the trespass complained of. If this view is well founded, there was no error in the charge. But we are of the opinion that the construction placed upon the contract by the trial judge is not warranted. The Goodwins were independent contractors. This was so ruled by the court on the trial, and was conceded on the argument here. This fact is only important to exclude any liability founded on the ordinary relation of master and servant. Where this relation exists, the master may be liable for the wrongful act of the servant, although committed without his authority, and even in violation of his instructions, provided it was committed in the business of the master, and within the scope of the servant's employment. Higgins v. Waterliet Turnp. & R. Co. 46 N. Y. 23, 7 Am. Rep. 293. But where a trespass has been committed upon the rights or property of another, by the advice or direction of a defendant, it is wholly unimportant what contractual or other relation existed between the immediate agent of the wrong and the person sought to be charged. The latter cannot shelter himself under the plea that the immediate wrongdoer did the act in execution of a contract, or that he came within the definition of an independent contractor as to the performance of the work in the execution of which the tortious act was committed. If he advised or directed the act, his liability is established. The contract entered into between the defendants and the contractors did not, as we construe it, authorize the contractors to commit a trespass upon the premises of the plaintiffs. In construing the contract, it is important to consider the situation. The defendants were about to tear down the old building on their premises, and erect a new one according to plans which required an excavation of their lot to the depth of twenty-two feet. They had a lawful right to make the excavation.

The excavation would probably endanger the adjacent wall of the building of the plaintiffs. No common-law duty was imposed upon the defendants to shore up or protect the wall from injury. The building of the plaintiffs had no easement of support by the land of the defendants. The rule of the common law placed the burden of protecting the wall from injury from the excavation upon the owners of the wall. The defendants were bound only to the exercise of reasonable care in making the excavation, doing no unnecessary damage. Dorrity v. Rapp, 72 N. Y. 308, and cases cited. Under the common law they had no right to enter upon the premises of the plaintiffs to shore up the wall, nor would they have been under any duty to do so, even if they were permitted by the owners of adjacent premises. The legislature, recognizing the hardships imposed upon owners of improved property by the rule of common law, intervened by the Act, chapter 6 of the Laws of 1855 as to the cities of New York and Brooklyn. By that Act the duty was imposed upon lot owners proposing to excavate their lots to the depth of more than 10 feet below the curb to protect at their own expense a wall on or near the boundary line of adjacent premises from injury from such excavation, "if afforded the necessary license to enter on the adjoining land, and not otherwise." The contract between the defendants and the contractors was made under this condition of the law. The defendants contemplated an excavation on their lot more than ten feet in depth. The Law of 1855 cast upon them the duty to protect the wall on the lot of the plaintiffs, "if afforded the necessary license to enter" for that purpose. The defendants made the contract, as is to be inferred, without having obtained the permission of the plaintiffs to enter upon their premises, but upon the assumption that the permission would be given. The contractors bound themselves to do the shoring "as required by law." They were not authorized by the contract to enter the adjacent premises without permission of the owners and occupants. It was necessarily implied that they were employed to discharge the obligation imposed upon the defendants by the Act of 1855, and it was a prerequisite that the consent of the owners or occupants should be obtained before entry could be lawfully made. The defendants neither in terms authorized an entry by the contractors as trespassers, nor can such intention be presumed. On the contrary, the contractors were to act "as required by law." It would have been a complete answer to a claim by the defendants for a breach of the contract by the contractors that the latter were unable to obtain the permission of the plaintiffs to enter the premises to do the work required, and that it could not have been done without such entry. If there was any evidence that the defendants advised or directed the trespass, other than that furnished by the contract, it should have been submitted to the jury. There was none to justify a ruling as matter of law that, in the absence of a license to enter, the defendants were liable. We think the trial judge erred, and that the judgment below should be reversed, and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event.

1. Acts of a railroad or other private corporation in the execution of charter or statutory powers are not within the rule that legislative authority for acts causing consequential injury to private property is a bar to a claim for indemnity.
2. The use of explosives in blasting on one's own premises does not constitute a nuisance which will create a liability, without regard to negligence, where the blasting is the only proper mode of accomplishing a necessary work.
3. Injury to another's house by a mere concussion, without throwing rock or other material on the premises, occasioned by blasting on one's own premises in order to adapt them to a lawful use, when that mode is the only proper one and the work is transacted with due care and diligence, creates no liability.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fifth Department, affirming a judgment of the Monroe County Circuit in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's property by blasting for defendant's right of way. Reversed.

Statement by Andrews, Ch. J.:

This appeal is from a judgment of the general term of the fifth department affirming a judgment on verdict for the plaintiff. The principal facts upon which the question presented arises are as follows: The defendant is a railroad corporation organized under the general railroad law of this state. In 1887 it owned a lot in the city of Rochester extending from the west side of St. Paul street to the Genesee river, adjacent to a lot owned by the plaintiff on the south, purchased by her in 1885, on which was a dwelling occupied by her, fronting on St. Paul street, the north side of which was about six feet south of the north line of her lot. The defendant projected an extension of its road from a point east of St. Paul street to the Genesee river, and thence across the river by a bridge. It obtained the consent of the municipal authorities to cross St. Paul street by a tunnel or cutting, and proceeded to extend its road across the street to the river. Its line crossed St. Paul street from a point on the east side of the street opposite the lot of the defendant, striking the center of defendant's lot on the west side, and thence ran longitudinally through the lot to the bank of the river. It became necessary, in order to comply with the conditions imposed by the city authorities, that the defendant's roadbed at the crossing should be depressed 15 feet or more below the surface of the street. The excavation required for this purpose involved also the necessity of continuing the cutting through the lot of the defendant so as to procure a uniform grade. The soil extended about 10 feet below the surface, and underlying that was rock, which it became necessary to remove to the depth of about 4 feet. It was loosened by blasting with gunpowder. It was claimed by the plaintiff, and evidence was given tending to show, that in consequence of the blasting the plaintiff's house was seriously injured; that the foundations were cracked, the beams and joists pulled apart, the plaster loosened, and that, generally, the house was wrenched, and rendered insecure. It is not claimed that any rock or materials were thrown by the blasts upon the plaintiff's lot. In what particular way the injury was produced was not shown. It may be inferred that it was caused by the jarring of the ground or the concussion of the atmosphere created by the explosions, or by both causes combined. It was, however, affirmatively proven, without contradiction, that there was no disturbance of the earth on the sides of the excavation, and that gas and water pipes in the street, exposed by the excavation, were not displaced or injured. It was substantially conceded that the defendant exercised due care in conducting the blasting, and that it was necessary in order to remove the rock. There was evidence tending to show that the persons engaged in the work were informed from time to time during its progress that injury was being done to the plaintiff's house. The trial judge instructed the jury that the defendant, in using powerful explosives in blasting rock, used them at its peril, and that if the plaintiff's house was injured thereby the defendant was liable for the damages occasioned, and "that it made no difference whether the work was done carefully or negligently." Exception was taken by the defendant to this instruction. The jury found that the damage to the house from the blasting was $1,750, and this sum was included in the verdict. The court overruled the contention of the defendant that in constructing its road it was acting under legislative authority, and was on that ground, in the absence of negligence, exempted from liability, even although, as between individuals, an action might be maintained.

Other facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. P. M. French, for appellant:

Mr. David Hays, for respondent:

The blasting was a nuisance and defendant 34 L. R. A.

is liable to the plaintiff for the damage which she suffered from it.

Wood, Nuisance, § 142; Cooley, Torts, pp. 607, 608.

Each person should so use his own as not to injure his neighbor's property.

Carhart v. Auburn Gas Light Co. 23 Barb. 297.

The blasting by the defendant constituted a nuisance, for it directly and necessarily damaged the plaintiff's property, and the defendant is therefore liable, though the blasting may have been carefully done.

Hay v. Cohoes Co. 2 N. Y. 159, 51 Am. Dec. 279.

The question is ordinarily one of reasonable use. Such use of property as necessarily destroys one's neighbor's property is prima facie unreasonable.

Cogswell v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 108 N. Y. 10, 57 Am. Rep. 701; St. Helen's Smelting Co. v. Tipping, 11 H. L. Cas. 642; Fish v. Dodge, 4 Denio, 311, 47 Am. Dec. 254; *Campbell v. C. 481; McAndrews v. Collier, 42 N. J. L. 189, 86 Am. Rep. 508.

There is an obvious distinction between the liability of a private corporation to public prosecution for a legalized nuisance and its liability to a private action for damages arising from such nuisance. In the one case, the legislative authority is a protection, and in the other it is not.

Wood, Nuisance, § 750; Tiffin v. McCormack, 34 Ohio St. 638, 32 Am. Rep. 408; Bohan v. Port Jervis Gas Light Co. 9 L. R. A. 711, 122 N. Y. 18; Heeg v. Licht, 80 N. Y. 579, 36 Am. Rep. 654; Loose v. Buchanan, 51 N. Y. 476, 10 Am. Rep. 623.

Where the damage is the necessary consequence of just what the defendant is doing, or is incident to the business itself, or the manner in which it is conducted, the law of negligence has no application, and the law of nuisance applies.

Hay v. Cohoes Co. 2 N. Y. 159, 51 Am. Dec. 279; McKeon v. See, 51 N. Y. 300, 10 Am. Rep. 659.

The latter drift of the law is in the direction of greater security to life and property.

Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 122, 43 Am. Rep. 146.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We entertain no doubt of the correctness of the ruling at the circuit that the defendant stands in no better position in defending the action than if the controversy was between individuals. The rule that the legislature may, in the public interest and for public purposes, authorize and legalize acts causing consequential injury to private property, not amounting to a taking, without providing compensation, and that the legislative authority may be pleaded in bar of any claim for indemnity, although if the act had been done with such authority an action would lie, has no application to acts of a railroad or other private corporation in the execution of chartered or statutory powers. The rule adverted to, although operating in some cases with great severity, which compels an individual to bear a special loss for the benefit of the community at large, in place of distributing the burden, is an application of the maxim, "solus populi est suprema lex," and rests upon the transcendent power of the legislature, within constitutional limitations, to enact whether it may deem essential to the public welfare. But while there are decisions which give countenance to the view that an authority conferred upon a railroad corporation to construct a railroad carries with it immunity from liability in executing the work for consequential damage to private property, to the same extent as pertains to the sovereign in executing public works, (Bellinger v. New York Cent. R. 23 N. Y. 42) it is now the settled doctrine in this state that the powers granted to such corporations are to be construed as privileges conferred, but upon the understanding that they shall be exercised in strict conformity to private rights, and under the same responsibility as though the acts done in execution of such powers were done by an individual, (Cogswell v. New York N. H. & H. R. Co. 103 N. Y. 10, 57 Am. Rep. 701.) This doctrine accords with reason, and with the presumed intention of the legislature. The franchises of a railroad corporation are conferred in consideration of supposed public benefits which will result from the construction of its road. The projectors of such an enterprise are moved by considerations of personal advantage. To acquire corporate character and privileges, they are willing to subject themselves to certain public duties. But it is quite unreasonable that in executing its corporate powers the corporation should be exempted from liability for injuries to private property, as though it was acting as a strictly public agent. There may be limited exceptions, as in cases of highway crossings, where an adjustment of the grade becomes necessary, working a consequential injury to adjacent landowners, which is remediless; and the legislative authority will also bar any remedy for certain discomforts consequent upon the necessary operation of the road, such as noise and smoke of passing trains. We therefore agree with the courts below that the right of the plaintiff to recover in this case, and the liability of the defendant, depend upon the same rule as would govern the parties if both were natural persons, and the injury to the plaintiff's dwelling had resulted from blasting by an adjacent owner on his land in the course of adapting it to individual uses.

The plaintiff, upon the findings of the jury, sustained a serious injury. It is true that witnesses on the part of the defendant gave evidence tending to show that the house was imperfectly constructed, and that the foundation walls were giving way before the excavation was commenced. But, the verdict having been affirmed by the general term, there can be no controversy here that the blasting caused damage to the house to the amount of the verdict. But mere proof that the house was damaged by the blasting would not alone sustain the action. It must further appear that the defendant, in using explosives, violated a duty owing by him to the plaintiff in respect of her property, or failed to exercise due care. Wrong and damage must concur, to create a cause of action. If the injury was occasioned by the omission to use due care, this alone would sustain the action, even if the right of the defendant to use explosives in removing the rock was conceded. If one, by carelessness in making an excavation on his own land, causes injury to an adjoining building, even where the owner of the house has no easement of support, he will be liable. Leader v. Mozon, 8 Wils. 460; Lawrence v. Great Northern R. Co. 16 Q. B. 643-653; Leake, Real Prop. 248.

The law exacts from a person who undertakes to do even a lawful act on his own premises, which may produce injury to his neighbor, the exercise of a degree of care measured by the danger, to prevent or mitigate the injury. The defendant could not conduct the operation of blasting on its own premises, from which injury might be apprehended to the property of his neighbor, without the most cautious regard for his neighbor's rights. This would be reasonable care only under the circumstances. If it was practicable, in a business sense, for the defendant to have removed the rock without blasting, although at a somewhat increased cost, the defendant would, we think, in view of the situation, and especially after having been informed of the injury that was being done, have been bound to resort to some other method. There is evidence that rock from some parts of the excavation was loosened by the use of iron bars, and if this was practicable as to all of it, the jury might well have found that this means should have been adopted. So, also, if less powerful blasts might have been used, which, if used would not have occasioned injury, or would have lessened it, the omission to use them might well be considered as negligence. The mode of exercising a legal right, where there is a choice of means, may of itself give a cause of action. The plaintiff, however, on this record, is precluded from claiming that the judgment may be sustained because of negligence in the mode of blasting. It must be assumed from concessions made on the trial, and from the rule of law laid down by the court, that blasting was the only mode of removing the rock practically available, that it was conducted with due care, and that it was necessary to enable the defendant to conform to the roadbed to the established grade. This is a case, therefore, of unavoidable injury to the plaintiff's house, occasioned by the act of the defendant in blasting on his own premises in order to adapt them to a lawful use; the mode adopted being the only practicable one, and the work having been prosecuted with due care and without negligence. The question is whether the act of the defendant, connected with the resulting injury, was a legal wrong, for which the plaintiff has a right of action.

The general rule that no one has absolute freedom in the use of his property, but is restrained by the coexistence of equal rights in his neighbor to the use of his property so that each, in exercising his right, must do no act which causes injury to his neighbor, is so well understood, is so universally recognized, and stands so impregnably in the necessities of the social state, that its vindication by argument would be superfluous. The maxim which embodies it is sometimes loosely interpreted as forbidding all use by one of his own property, which annoys or disturbs his neighbor in the enjoyment of his property. The real meaning of the rule is, that one may not use his own property to the injury of any legal right of another. The cases are numerous where the lawful use of one's property causes injury to adjacent property, for which there is no remedy, because no right of the adjacent owner is invaded, although he suffers injury. The cases of excavation furnish a striking illustration. The easement of natural support of the land of one by the land of the adjacent owner applies only to lands in their natural condition, and does not extend so as to give the owner of a building erected on the confines of his land the right to have it supported laterally by the land of his neighbor; and so it has become the settled doctrine of the law that if one, by excavating on his own land adjacent to the land of his neighbor, using due care, causes a building on the neighbor's land to topple over, there is no remedy, provided the weight of the building caused the land on which it stood to give way. There is, in the case supposed, injury, but no wrong, because what was done by the adjacent owner was in the lawful and permitted use of his own property. Wyatt v. Harrison, 3 Barn. & Ad. 871; Partridge v. Scott, 3 Mees. & W. 220; Lasala v. Holbrook, 4 Paige, 170, 8 L. ed. 391, 25 Am. Dec. 524; Thurston v. Hancock, 12 Mass. 220, 7 Am. Dec. 57.

The fundamental proposition upon which the plaintiff's counsel rests his argument in support of the recovery is that the use of the explosives in blasting constituted, under the circumstances, a private nuisance, and that, according to the general rule of law, one who creates or maintains a nuisance is liable for any special injury to person or property resulting therefrom. The right of the defendant to excavate on its land for its roadbed is not challenged, but the right to use the destructive agency of gunpowder in the work of excavating, liable to produce injury, and which did occasion it, is denied. The exception is not to the thing done, but to the mode of doing it. It is to be observed, however, that, under the concessions in the case and the rulings on the trial, it must be assumed that the excavation could not have been done except by the use of explosives. This mode of doing the work was therefore of the substance of the right, if the right existed at all. It has been frequently said that the right of an owner of land to use his property as he likes does not justify the maintaining of a nuisance or the commission of a trespass; and Blackstone after stating that where one, by smelting works on his own land, causes noxious vapors, which injure the corn or grain on his neighbor's land or damages his cattle, this would be a nuisance, proceeds to say "that if you do any other act in itself lawful, which yet being done in that place, necessarily tends to the damage of another's property, it is a nuisance, for it is incumbent on him to find some other place to do that act, where it will be less offensive." 2 Bl. Com. chap. 13, p. 218.

There are many illustrations in the books of the doctrine stated by the learned commentator, that the use of one's own land for the purpose of a lawful trade may become a nuisance to his neighbor. But whether a particular act done upon, or a particular use of, one's own premises, constitutes a violation of the obligations of vicinage, would seem to depend upon the question whether such act or use was a reasonable exercise of the right of property, having regard to time, place, and circumstances. It is not everything in the nature of a nuisance which is prohibited. There are many acts which the owner of land may lawfully do, although it brings annoyance, discomfort, or injury to his neighbor, which are damnum absque injuria. The case of the building caused to fall by an excavation in an adjoining lot, already referred to, is an illustration. The right of an owner of a mine to excavate the mineral in his mine, although by so doing it causes the water to collect therein, and to be discharged into an adjacent mine on a lower level, thereby causing damage to the mine of such adjacent owner, is another illustration of a lawful use of property, followed by damage to the property of another, for which no action lies. Smith v. Kenrick, 7 C. B. 515; Baird v. Williamson, 15 C. B. N. S. 876; Wilson v. Waddell, L. R. 2 App. Cas. 95. In referring to these cases in Hurdman v. North-Eastern R. Co. L. R. 3 C. P. Div. 168, the court said: "The owner of lands holds his right to the enjoyment thereof subject to such annoyance as is the consequence of what is called the 'natural use by his neighbor of his land,' and that, where an interference with his enjoyment by something in the nature of a nuisance is the cause of complaint, no action can be sustained, if this is the result of a natural use by a neighbor of his land." Whether a particular act or thing constitutes a nuisance may depend on the circumstances and surroundings. The use of premises for mechanical or other purposes, causing great noise, disturbing the peace and quiet of those living in the vicinity, and rendering life uncomfortable, or filling the air with noxious vapors, or causing vibration of the neighboring dwellings, constitute nuisances, and such use is not justified by the right of property. Fish v. Dodge, 4 Denio, 811, 47 Am. Dec. 254; McKeon v. Sea, 51 N. Y. 300, 10 Am. Rep. 659; Cogswell v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. supra.

These and like cases are those where the property of the owner is appropriated to a permanent use, which is a constant and serious interference with the enjoyment by other property owners of their property. But there is a manifest distinction between acts and uses which are permanent and continuous, and temporary acts, which are resorted to in the course of adapting premises to some lawful use. For example, the erection of an iron building adjacent to a dwelling might, for the time being, cause as much noise and discomfort as would arise from conducting the business of finishing steam boilers on adjacent premises; but this would not constitute a nuisance, and the owner of the dwelling would have no remedy. The streets may be obstructed temporarily, subject to municipal regulations, for the deposit of building materials, and the party would not be chargeable with maintaining a nuisance. The test of the permissible use of one's own land is not whether the use or the act causes injury to his neighbor's property, or that the injury was the natural consequence, or that the act is in the nature of a nuisance, but the inquiry is, Was the act or use a reasonable exercise of the dominion which the owner of property has by virtue of his ownership over his property, having regard to all interests affected, his own and those of his neighbors, and having in view, also, public policy?

The rule announced by the trial judge, that the use, by an owner of property, of explosives, in excavating his land, is at his peril, and imposes liability for any injury caused thereby to adjacent property, irrespective of negligence, is far-reaching. It would constitute, if sustained, a serious restriction upon the use of property, and in many cases greatly impair its value. The situation in the city of New York furnishes an apt illustration. The rocky surface of the upper part of Manhattan island makes blasting necessary in the work of excavation, and, unless permitted, the value of lots, especially for business uses, would be seriously affected. May the man who has first built a store or warehouse or dwelling on his lot, and has blasted the rock for a basement or cellar, prevent his neighbor from doing the same thing, when he comes to build on his lot adjoining, on the ground that by so doing his own structure will be injured? Such a rule would enable the first occupant to control the uses of the adjoining property, to the serious injury of the owner, and prevent, or tend to prevent, the improvement of property. The first occupant, in building on his lot, exercised an undoubted legal right. But his prior occupation deprived his neighbor of no legal right in his property. The first occupant acquires no right to exclude an adjoining proprietor from the free use of his land, nor to use his own land to the injury of his neighbor subsequently coming there. Platt v. Johnson, 15 Johns. 218, 8 Am. Dec. 233; Thurston v. Hancock, supra; Tipping v. St. Helen's Smelt. Co. 1 Ch. App. 66; Campbell v. Seaman, 68 N. Y. 568, 20 Am. Rep. 567. The fact of proximity imposes an obligation of care, so that one engaged in improving his own lot shall do no unnecessary damage to his neighbor's dwelling; but it cannot, we think, exclude the former from using the necessary and usual means to adapt his lot to any lawful use, although the means used may endanger the house of his neighbor.

We have found no case directly in point upon the interesting and important practical question involved in this appeal. It was held in the leading case of Hay v. Cohoes Co. 2 N. Y. 159, 51 Am. Dec. 279, that the right of property did not justify the owner of land in committing a trespass on the land of his neighbor by casting rocks thereon in blasting for a canal on his own land for the use of his mill, although he exercised all due care in executing the work. In that case there was a physical invasion by the defendant of the land of the plaintiff. This, the court held, could not be justified by any consideration of convenience or necessity connected with the work in which the defendant was engaged. In the conflict of rights the court considered that public policy required that the right of defendant to dig the canal on his own land must yield to the superior right of the plaintiff to be protected against an invasion of his possession by the act of the defendant. The case of Benner v. Atlantic Dredging Co. 134 N. Y. 158, 17 L. R. A. 230, was the case of an injury to the plaintiff's house, resulting from the jarring caused by the blasting of rocks in Hell Gate; and it was held that the injury is remediless, for the reason that the defendant was acting under the authority of the government of the United States, by virtue of a contract authorized by congress. It has been held that the keeping of gunpowder in large quantities near inhabited dwellings is a nuisance, and in the case of explosion subjects the party keeping it to liability for damages occasioned thereby. Myers v. Malcolm, 6 Hill, 292, 41 Am. Dec. 744; Heeg v. Licht, 80 N. Y. 579, 36 Am. Rep. 654. So, also, it has been held that the working of quarries by the use of gunpowder, to the injury of property in the vicinity, gives a right of action. Tiffin v. McCormack, 34 Ohio St. 638, 32 Am. Rep. 406; Scott v. Bay, 3 Md. 481. Many of the cases cited by counsel are cases of the permanent appropriation of property, for damages, or noxious uses causing damage. The distinction between such cases and those where the injury arises from acts done in the necessary adjustment of property for a lawful use by means necessary, and not unusual, but involving damage to adjacent property, has been adverted to. We recognize the difficulty of formulating a general rule regulating the rights of adjacent landowners in the use of their property, and we realize how narrow the margin is which separates this from some decided cases. In Marvin v. Brewster Iron Min. Co. 55 N. Y. 557, 14 Am. Rep. 322, the opinion of the learned judge who wrote in that case sustains the conclusion we have reached in this case. But the point was not necessarily involved, since it was held that the defendant there had acquired by grant the right to employ blasting in removing the mineral, and that the plaintiff, a subsequent grantee of the surface, could not complain of injury to his house therefrom, in the absence of negligence on the part of the defendant in conducting the work. Judge Folger, in that case, said: "Whatever it is necessary for him [defendant] to do for the profitable and beneficial enjoyment of his own possession, and which he may do with no ill effect to the adjacent surface in its natural state, that he may do, though it harm erections lately put there." If the learned judge intended to lay down the rule that the owner of land may do anything on his own land which would do no injury to the adjacent property if it had remained in its natural state, the proposition is probably too broad. One may do in a barren waste many things which he could not lawfully do in or near an inhabited town. But the defendant here was engaged in a lawful act. It was done on its own land, to fit it for a lawful business. It was not an act which, under all circumstances, would produce injury to his neighbor, as is shown by the fact that other buildings near by were not injured. The immediate act was confined to its own land; but the blasts, by setting the air in motion, or in some other unexplained way, caused an injury to the plaintiff's house. The lot of the defendant could not be used for its roadbed until it was excavated and graded. It was to be devoted to a common use; that is, to a business use. The blasting was necessary, was carefully done, and the injury was consequential. There was no technical trespass. Under these circumstances, we think, the plaintiff has no legal ground of complaint. The protection of property is doubtless one of the great reasons for government. But it is equal protection to all which the law seeks to secure. The rule governing the rights of adjacent land-owners in the use of their property seeks an adjustment of conflicting interests through a reconciliation by compromise, each surrendering something of his absolute freedom so that both may live. To exclude the defendant from blasting to adapt its lot to the contemplated uses, at the instance of the plaintiff, would not be a compromise between conflicting rights, but an extinguishment of the right of the one for the benefit of the other. This sacrifice, we think, the law does not exact. Public policy is sustained by the building up of towns and cities and the improvement of property. Any unnecessary restraint on freedom of action of a property owner hinders this. The law is interested, also, in the preservation of property and property rights from injury. Will it, in this case, protect the plaintiff's house by depriving the defendant of his right to adapt his property to a lawful use, through means necessary, usual, and generally harmless! We think not.

NEW YORK SUPREME COURT (Special Term.)

Re Petition of the Trustees of the WORTHINGTON COMPANY.

Payne's Arabian Nights, Fielding's Tom Jones, the works of Rabelais, Ovid's

Arts of Love, The Decameron of Boccaccio, The Heptameron of Queen Margaret of Navarre, Rousseau's Confessions, Tales from the Arabian, and Aladdin, are not so immoral that a receiver will be prevented from disposing of them when found among the assets which come into his hands.

NOTE.—Unlawfulness of obscene and indecent publications.

The above case, though it reports a mere special term order made for the guidance of a receiver, was made, as the court states, after consultation with other judges; and is of so much public interest that it ought not to be omitted from this series, in view of the improbability of getting a decision on the precise question from the court of last resort.

At common law.

So long ago as 1770 John Wilkes was convicted "of an obscene and impious libel," consisting of his "Essay on Women." Rex v. Wilkes, 4 Burr. 2527.

Again in Rex v. Curl, 7 Strange, 788, an obscene book was held indictable at common law. One judge, Fortescue, was of a different opinion, basing it on the case of Queen v. Read, 8 Ann. in B. R., which was a case not brought to judgment, but one in which the question was made as to such an offense being punishable in the temporal courts, on the ground that it was cognizable in the spiritual courts only. This question was, however, settled in Rex v. Curl.

Indecent pictures.

The same doctrine was followed in Com. v. Sharpless, 2 Serg. & R. 61, 7 Am. Rep. 632, in which the exhibition of indecent pictures for money was held indictable at common law.

So in Dugdale v. Reg. 1 EL. & Bl. 425, 17 Jur. 548, Deans. C. C. 64, 22 L. J. M. C. 50, it was held to be a misdemeanor at common law to procure indecent prints with intent to publish them, but not to keep them without such intent.

Somewhat akin is the decision in Reg. v. Grey, 4 Fost. & F. 73, that an offensive and disgusting figure of a man naked down to the waist, covered with eruptive sores, exposed by a herbalist, though with innocent motive, and though the exhibition was not indecent, was a nuisance.

But under the Illinois Criminal Code, § 223, the mere possession of indecent and obscene pictures constitutes an offense. Fuller v. People, 32 Ill. 182.

Under U. S. Stat. 1857, chap. 63, imported stereoscopic slides were condemned to be destroyed as indecent. United States v. One Case of Stereoscopic Slides, 1 Sprague, C. C. 467.

Under New York Penal Code, § 817, photographs, as well as other pictures, books, and writings of an obscene and indecent character, cannot lawfully be sold. The section also prohibits that they be given away, or kept for that purpose. People v. Muller, 98 N. Y. 408, 48 Am. Rep. 635, affirming 32 Hun, 209.

The sale of an obscene print in private is indictable, although the object of the purchaser was to get evidence to prosecute the seller. Reg. v. A. Carille, 1 Cox, C. C. 229.

The introduction of an obscene print into a school is indictable, under Tenn. Code, § 4847, making such introduction into a family, school, or place of education, as well as the sale or distribution thereof an offense. State v. Pennington, 5 Lea, 506.

Tests of decency.

In Reg. v. Hicklin, L. R. 3 Q. B. 360, 16 Week. Rep. 801, 37 L. J. M. C. 59, 11 Cox, C. C. 19; S. C. Reg. v. Wolvenhampton, 18 L. T. N. S. 365, the test of obscenity is thus stated: "Where the tendency of the matter charged as obscene is to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences, and into whose hands a publication of this sort may fall," and "where it would suggest to the minds of the young of either sex, or even to persons of more advanced years, thoughts of an impure and libidinous character."

The facts are stated in the opinion.

The same language, substantially, is used in United States v. Slenker, 32 Fed. Rep. 691; United States v. Clarke, 58 Fed. Rep. 732; United States v. Harmon, 45 Fed. Rep. 414.

So in United States v. Bennett, 16 Blatchf. 338, the court uses similar language.

In United States v. Harmon, supra, the court says: "While there may be individuals and societies of men and women of peculiar notions or idiosyncrasies, whose moral sense would neither be deprived nor offended by the publication now under consideration, yet the exceptional sensibility, or want of sensibility, of such, cannot be allowed as a standard by which its obscenity is to be tested. Rather is the test, 'What is the judgment of the aggregate sense of the community reached by it? What is its probable, reasonable effect on the sense of decency, purity, and chastity of society, extending to the family, made up of men and women, young boys and girls?'"

And in another case the court said: "That which shocks the ordinary and common sense of men as an indecency, is the test." United States v. Davis, 2 Fed. Rep. 326.

In this case it is said that one can be vulgar without being indecent, within the meaning of the statute. Ibid.

So a letter may be indecent and not obscene. See United States v. Clarke, supra.

The court in the case of United States v. Harmon, supra, referring to a newspaper report of an opinion by the supreme court of New South Wales, holding that a pamphlet on "The Law of Population" by Mrs. Besant was within the pale of legitimate discussion, said that it had no access to the pamphlet to determine the character of the language employed, and proceeded to say concerning the newspaper publication which was before it for decision: "The problem of population and other questions of social ethics and the sexual relations, may be publicly discussed on such a high plane of philosophy, thought, and fitness of language as to make it legally unexceptionable. They may be discussed so as to be plain yet chaste, so as to be instructive and corrective without being coarse, vulgar, or seductive. But when such publication descends to the low plane of indecent illustrations and grossness of expression as adopted by Dr. O'Neill, it loses all claim to respectability."

In People v. Muller, 32 Hun, 209, the court said in respect to vicious and immoral photographs: "The difference between such photographs and pictures and those which avoiding all decency of position are calculated by their symmetry, beauty, or purity simply to inspire admiration, or produce emotions of chaste pleasure, is striking and apparent to all. In the one case the effect is coarse, demoralizing, and sensual, while in the other the chaste elegance and beauty would not be debasing but refining by the degree of admiration produced by it.

And the court of appeals in the same case declared "mere nudity in painting and sculpture is not obscenity" and that "the proper test of obscenity in a painting or statue is whether the motive of the painting or statue, so to speak, as indicated by it, is pure or impure." People v. Muller, 96 N. Y. 493, 43 Am. Rep. 635.

Following the idea that the common sense of mankind should decide the question, it is held in the same case that the opinion of artistic experts as to the obscenity of photographs is not admissible. Ibid.

Although in the case of Re WORTHINGTON COMPANY, the books in question are compared by the court with Shakespeare, Chaucer, Sterne, and the Old Testament Scriptures for the sake of determining their character, and this is clearly a valuable test in determining the question, the courts have refused to allow the jury to make comparisons of this sort. Thus in United States v. Clarke, 38 Fed. Rep. 732, the court directed the jury that they were not called upon to decide whether the Bible, Shakespeare, Chaucer, Sterne, Suetonius, must be excluded from the mails, but were to judge only of the publication involved in that case.

So in Montross v. State, 72 Ga. 261, 53 Am. Rep. 840, counsel were not allowed to read other articles and show other pictures to the jury for comparison with the publications involved in that case.

Under Texas Penal Code, § 343, respecting words "manifestly designed to corrupt the morals of youth," a composition so intended need not be on its face and of itself manifestly of this character. Smith v. State, 24 Tex. App. 1.

Questions for court and jury.

It is generally held that the question of obscenity in any particular publication is for the jury and not for the court. United States v. Bennett, 16 Blatchf. 338; United States v. Clarke, 38 Fed. Rep. 500; Com. v. Landis, 8 Phila. 453.

So in respect to photographs or other pictures, the obscenity is a question for the jury. People v. Muller, 32 Hun, 209, affirmed in 96 N. Y. 406, 43 Am. Rep. 635; United States v. One Case of Stereoscopic Slides, 1 Sprague, C. C. 167.

This rule is limited in United States v. Smith, 45 Fed. Rep. 478, by holding that the question is ordinarily for the jury, but that it is within the province of the court to determine whether a verdict establishing the obscenity would be set aside as against evidence and reason.

While in McNair v. People, 89 Ill. 441, this question is declared to be for the court and not for the jury.

Motives and object of publication.

Where a publication is manifestly obscene, the defendant's motive in publishing it is immaterial. United States v. Bennett, 16 Blatchf. 338; United States v. Harmon, 45 Fed. Rep. 414; Reg. v. Hicklin, L. R. 8 Q. B. 360, 16 Week. Rep. 801, 37 L. J. M. C. 89, 11 Cox, C. C. 19; S. C. Reg. v. Wolverhampton, 13 L. T. N. S. 895.

Thus in Reg. v. Hicklin, supra, the fact that the sincere motive of a person in selling an obscene book entitled "The Confessional Unmasked" was to expose what he deemed errors of the Church of Rome, was held not to relieve him from an indictment for selling the book indiscriminately, although with no purpose of gain.

But the purpose with which a book is published may have a bearing on the question whether or not it is indecent, as the cases agree in holding that books which are perfectly lawful when published for scientific and medical purposes may, especially when accompanied by illustrations, be indecent and obscene for purposes of general circulation. Com. v. Landis, 8 Phila. 453; United States v. Chesman, 19 Fed. Rep. 497; United States v. Harmon, supra; United States v. Clarke, 38 Fed. Rep. 500; United States v. Smith, 45 Fed. Rep. 478.

Mr. James M. Fisk for petitioners.
Mr. Anthony Comstock filed a brief in opposition to the petition.

O'Brien, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

After consultation with some of my brethren

And the sale of a pamphlet, which is a substantially correct report of the trial of a person for selling the obscene book called "The Confessional Unmasked," is within the Statute, 20 & 21 Vict. chap. 83, prohibiting the sale of obscene publications. Steele v. Brannan, 7 L. R. C. P. 261, 41 L. J. M. C. 85, 23 L. T. N. S. 509, 20 Week. Rep. 607.

Mailing obscene letters.

A letter was held in Thomas v. State, 103 Ind. 419, to be a "paper" within the meaning of Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 1997, prohibiting mailing or otherwise sending any obscene book, paper, pamphlet, etc.

But this case follows United States v. Gaylord, 17 Fed. Rep. 438, which was subsequently overruled. In addition to United States v. Gaylord, which held that a letter was a "writing," within U. S. Rev. Stat., § 3893, prohibiting the mailing of obscene writings, the same decision was made in United States v. Hanover, 17 Fed. Rep. 444; United States v. Britton, Id. 731; United States v. Morris, 18 Fed. Rep. 900; United States v. Thomas, 27 Fed. Rep. 682.

But these decisions were contrary to other decisions in the federal courts, and were overruled in United States v. Chase, 135 U. S. 255, 34 L. ed. 117, which held that obscene matter in a sealed letter, with only the address on the outside, was not unmailable as a "writing," within the meaning of U. S. Rev. Stat., § 3893; and to the same effect were the decisions in United States v. Mathias, 36 Fed. Rep. 862; United States v. Loftis, 8 Sawy. 194, 12 Fed. Rep. 671; United States v. Comerford, 25 Fed. Rep. 902; United States v. Williams, 3 Fed. Rep. 484; United States v. Huggett, 40 Fed. Rep. 636.

This section 3893 was amended in 1888 so as to prohibit the mailing of a "letter" as well as other publications named.

And while it was held in United States v. Wilson, 58 Fed. Rep. 768, that a private letter, which is sealed, although containing obscene matter, is not within that section as amended, since the letter must be a "publication" to be prohibited thereby, all other federal cases since that amendment have held that a letter, although sealed, is within the prohibition of that section, if it contains obscene matter. United States v. Andrews, 58 Fed. Rep. 861; United States v. Gaylord, 50 Fed. Rep. 410; United States v. Martin, Id. 918; Re Wahl, 42 Fed. Rep. 822.

And even an absence of any words which are in themselves obscene will not relieve a letter from a charge of illegality, under said section 3893, if the meaning of the letter is plainly improper, as in case of a proposal, however guardedly worded, for illicit intercourse. United States v. Martin, supra.

So a charge on a postal card of such relations between the person addressed and a third person is indecent or scurrilous. United States v. Pratt, 2 Am. L. T. N. S. 228.

And the same rule applies to letters giving prohibited information as to where obscene pictures may be obtained, though the letters did not in themselves show that the pictures are obscene. United States v. Grimm, 50 Fed. Rep. 523.

And a similar rule applies to a newspaper advertisement by a physician of unlawful treatment, although the unlawful purpose is guardedly expressed. United States v. Kelly, 3 Sawy. 566.

A sealed letter is also "notice" within the clause of U. S. Rev. Stat., § 3893, as to prohibited information. United States v. Foote, 13 Blatchf. 418.

And the fact that the information in respect to prohibited matters under that section which a letter purports to give is false in respect to the place at which the unlawful articles can be procured, or as to the effect of such articles, is immaterial. United States v. Bott, 11 Blatchf. 346.

A letter may be indecent and not obscene under U. S. Rev. Stat., § 3896, as amended in 1883, and if not obscene cannot be excluded from the mails as a "publication of an indecent character." United States v. Clark, 43 Fed. Rep. 574.

Under the New Jersey statute prohibiting the sending of indecent letters to women, a letter is "sent to" a woman when enclosed in an envelope directed to her husband with a request that he hand it to her. Larson v. State, 49 N. J. L. 256, 60 Am. Rep. 608.

Constitutionality of statutes.

That the act of congress prohibiting the mailing of obscene matter is not an unconstitutional abridgment of the freedom of speech or of the press has been expressly decided in United States v. Harmon, 45 Fed. Rep. 414, and Harman v. United States, 50 Fed. Rep. 921.

The same question in substance was decided in respect to mailing lottery circulars, in Re Jackson, 96 U. S. 727, 24 L. ed. 877.

And although the statute was held to be unconstitutional, the court sustained a conviction under Ill. Crim. Code, § 223, for the mere possession of an obscene and indecent picture. Fuller v. People, 92 Ill. 182.

Propriety of legislation.

The necessity and reasonableness of legislation against obscene publications is very well stated by the court, in United States v. Harmon, 45 Fed. Rep. 414, in the following language: "To the pure all things are pure, is too poetical for the actualities of practical life. There is in the popular conception and heart such a thing as modesty. It was born in the Garden of Eden. After Adam and Eve ate of the fruit of the tree of knowledge they passed from that condition of perfectibility which some people nowadays aspire to, and, their eyes being opened, they discerned that there was both good and evil; and they knew that they were naked; and they sewed fig leaves together, and made themselves aprons." From that day to this civilized man has carried with him the sense of shame,—the feeling that there were some things on which the eye—the mind—should not look; and where men and women become so depraved by the use, or so insensate from perverted education, that they will not veil their eyes, nor hold their tongues, the government should perform the office for them in protection of the social compact and the body politic."

One extreme illustration of nastiness is enough to convince any one who really thinks and who is not altogether corrupt in thought that the words above quoted truly indicate the relation of law to indecency. While overzealous or overnice people may attempt undue interference with publications that are not condemned by people of average sentiment and thus discredit the law in popular estimation, and on the other hand people of coarse mind or impure character may condemn the law as an unwarrantable interference, the "aggregate sense of the community" must determine what is obscene or indecent in the same way that it is in the final event the test of all questions of reasonableness or propriety including the most common of all, that of negligence.

ren, we have concluded that the following views should be expressed concerning the merits of this motion: This is an application made by the receiver of the Worthington Company for instructions concerning the final disposition of certain books which were found among the assets of that company, and which are now in his custody and respecting which it is alleged by certain parties that they are unfit for general circulation and come under the designation of immoral literature, and as such should be excluded from sale. That these books constitute valuable assets of this receivership cannot be doubted, and the question before the court for decision on this motion is, whether or not they are of such a character as should be condemned and their sale prohibited. The books in question consist of Payne's edition of "The Arabian Nights," Fielding's novel "Tom Jones," "The Works of Rabelais," "Ovid's Art of Love," "The Decameron of Boccaccio," "The Heptameron of Queen Margaret of Navarre," "The Confessions of J. J. Rousseau," "Tales from the Arabic," and "Alladin."

Most of the volumes that have been submitted to the inspection of the court are of choice editions, both as to the letter press and the bindings, and are such, both as to their commercial value and subject matter, as to prevent their being generally sold or purchased, except by those who would desire them for their literary merit, or for their worth as specimens of fine book-making. It is very difficult to see upon what theory these world-renowned classics can be regarded as specimens of that pornographic literature which it is the office of the society for the suppression of vice to suppress; or how they can come under any stronger condemnation than that high standard literature which consists of the works of Shakespeare, of Chaucer, of Laurence Sterne, and of other great English writers, without making reference to many parts of the Old Testament Scriptures, which are to be found in almost every household in the land. The very artistic character, the high qualities of style, the absence of those glaring and crude pictures, scenes, and descriptions which affect the common and vulgar mind, make a place for books of the character in question, entirely apart from such gross and obscene writings as it is the duty of the public authorities to suppress. It would be quite as unjustifiable to condemn the writings of Shakespeare, and Chaucer, and Laurence Sterne, the early English novelists, the playwrights of the Restoration, and the dramatic literature which has so much enriched the English language, as to place an interdict upon these volumes which have received the admiration of literary men for so many years. What has become standard literature of the English language,—has been wrought into the very structure of our splendid English literature,—is not to be pronounced at this late day unfit for publication or circulation and stamped with judicial disapprobation as hurtful to the community. The works under consideration are the product of the greatest literary genius. Payne's "Arabian Nights" is a wonderful exhibition of oriental scholarship, and the other volumes have so long held a supreme rank in literature that it would be absurd to call them now foul and unclean. A seeker after the sensual and degrading parts of a narrative may find in all these works, as in those of other great authors, something to satisfy his prurency. But to condemn a standard literary work because of a few of its episodes would compel the exclusion from circulation of a very large proportion of the works of fiction of the most famous writers of the English language. There is no such evil to be feared from the sale of these rare and costly books as the imagination of many even well-disposed people might apprehend. They rank with the higher literature, and would not be bought nor appreciated by the class of people from whom unclean publications ought to be withheld. They are not corrupting in their influence upon the young, for they are not likely to reach them. I am satisfied that it would be a wanton destruction of property to prohibit the sale by the receiver of these works; for if their sale ought to be prohibited, the books should be burned; but I find no reason in law, morals, or expediency, why they should not be sold for the benefit of the creditors of the receivership. The receiver is therefore allowed to sell these volumes.

APPPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court for the City of New York affirming a judgment of a trial term in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount of dividends which it was alleged that defendants had contracted to pay the plaintiff. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James C. Carter, for appellants:

The contract upon which the action was brought clearly contained the condition, although it was unexpressed, that the corporation should continue to exist during the period embraced by it.

Dexter v. Norton, 47 N. Y. 62, 7 Am. Rep. 415; Taylor v. Caldwell, 8 Beat & S. 826.

Wherever there is a contract for the sale of specific personal chattels, the continued existence of the chattel is an unexpressed condition and the destruction of the chattel by an accident, like fire, prior to the time of the performance of the contract puts an end to it.

Messrs. Asa Bird Gardiner and Richard L. Sweeney, for respondent:

The unlawful acts of defendants in the management of the company which furnished cause for and resulted in the intervention of the people and the dissolution of the corporation, were violations by defendants of their contract with plaintiff, as that contract has been construed by the courts, and really the only question in this case is whether plaintiff's acts in laying the facts relating to defendant's unlawful conduct before the proper public authorities and in aiding and assisting the public officers to carry on the suit, was a violation of the contract on his part, so as to prevent a recovery by him.

A person who has destroyed the subject-matter of a contract by his own act, or who has made performance thereof impossible by his own wrong, can found no defense thereupon.

Andrews, Ch. J. delivered the opinion of the court:

The validity of the contract upon which the action is brought was adjudicated in the case reported in 86 N. Y. 384. The divisible character of the obligation of the defendants, and the right of the plaintiff to maintain separate actions for successive payments on the guaranty as they fell due has also been settled, 123 N. Y. 41. The plaintiff in the actions heretofore brought has recovered under the contract dividends, or the equivalent of dividends on his stock, at the rate of seven per cent per annum from July 1, 1874, to July 1, 1879, a period of five years antecedent to the dissolution of the corporation. The present action is to recover such dividends for the two succeeding years, which complete the term of seven years specified in the guaranty.

The effect of the dissolution of the corporation upon the contract of guaranty as to payments subsequently accruing thereon presents the new question involved in the present litigation. Its solution rests primarily upon an interpretation of the contract. The object of the contract, as stated therein, was the consolidation of the interests of the respective parties in the business of water transportation between New York and Philadelphia. They were competitors in the business. The plaintiff owned and ran steamships between these ports by the outside route, and the defendants conducted their business between the same ports by means of tugs and barges running upon the canals and inside water routes. The outside business could be carried on during the whole year. The business by the inside routes was of necessity suspended during the time the canals were closed by frost. The plan of combination was to organize a corporation to which each of the interests would contribute an equal amount of capital in the properties then employed by each in the business of transportation at an agreed valuation, any difference in value to be equalized by payment by the one party to the other. The written contract embodied the scheme. It provided for the organization of a corporation under the law of New York, with a capital of $800,000; designated the vessels to be contributed by each interest and fixed their value; provided for the payment by the Clydes to the plaintiff of $20,000 for equality of interest. Among other provisions is the following: "William P. Clyde & Co. to have the management of said corporation and business, and in consideration thereof to guarantee to Jacob Lorillard a dividend of not less than seven per cent per annum for seven years, and to receive for such management the usual commission of two and one-half per cent in and five per cent out at each end of the freights earned." The corporation was organized; a board of five directors was designated in the certificate of incorporation; one half of the stock, being fifteen hundred shares, was issued to the plaintiff, and the other half to W. P. Clyde & Co., except that three shares of the par value of $100 each were, by the direction of the Clydes, taken from their one half and certificates issued to three clerks, who were named as directors in order to qualify them under the statute. The business of the corporation was carried on under the management of W. P. Clyde & Co. until April, 1879, when a suit was brought in the name of the people by the attorney-general to dissolve the corporation and a temporary receiver appointed. The case was tried and resulted in a judgment dissolving the corporation and the appointing of a permanent receiver. It is unnecessary to enter into greater detail at this time of the facts disclosed by the record. Other facts will be hereafter referred to.

The question whether the obligation of the defendants under their guaranty, continued in force as to the part of the seven years unexpired at the time of the dissolution of the corporation, in the absence of any responsible agency of either party for the causes which led to the dissolution, must be determined by the intention of the parties as ascertained from the language of the contract, and, if ambiguous, from such language and the surrounding circumstances. The contract contains no explicit statement on the subject. It assumed that the corporation would be in existence during the whole period over which the guaranty extended. The guaranty was not for the yearly payment of a sum equal to seven per cent on the capital of the plaintiff in the corporation, or on the nominal amount of his stock. It was, that the dividends of the corporation should annually for seven years equal that sum. The plaintiff would under the contract and by virtue of his right as a stockholder be entitled to dividends declared by the company, whether they should be more or less than seven per cent per annum, and if dividends less than that amount should be made, the liability of the defendants on their guaranty would be limited to a sum sufficient to make up the deficit. In case the dividends equaled or exceeded seven per cent there would be no liability, and in case no dividends were declared then the guaranty would stand in lieu of dividends. The contract provided that "accounts shall be made up and dividends when earned shall be declared and paid quarterly," and it is also provided that during the seven years neither party should be interested "in any competing steam water line between New York and Philadelphia without the consent of the other party in writing." The fact that guaranty was of "dividends" which implies the existence of the corporation during the time specified capable of earning and declaring dividends, and the prohibition against either party becoming interested in competing lines during the same period, inserted for the protection of the corporate business, plainly indicate that the parties were dealing upon the assumption of corporate existence during the period covered by the guaranty. But this becomes much more plain when the nature of the transaction in which the parties were engaged and the consideration upon which the guaranty rested are considered. The real purpose of the parties was to combine their properties and conduct the transportation business between New York and Philadelphia as a joint business, each contributing the same amount of capital and being equally interested in the vessels. The arrangement was substantially a partnership with a corporate organization. The consolidation would prevent competition and presumably benefit both interests. The management of the business was, by the contract, to be vested in W. P. Clyde & Co., and "in consideration thereof," and of their right to receive the usual commissions on inward and outward bound freight which was given them, they agreed to guarantee to the plaintiff dividends at the rate and for the time specified.

It is incontrovertible that the right to manage the business of the corporation and to earn and to receive the commissions on freight were the considerations upon which the guaranty rested. The plaintiff conceded these rights to the Clydes for this equivalent. The defendants could receive the benefits of the contract only in case the corporation should continue in being during the running of the guaranty. The death of the corporation would terminate their management, prevent their earning commissions; the business would end, and the court, in administering the assets, would return to each party his proportion of the capital remaining for distribution. The death or dissolution of the corporation would withdraw all the capital invested, so far as it remained, and take away for the future the whole consideration upon which the guaranty was based. There would thereafter be no corporation earning or capable of earning dividends, and nothing left upon which the obligation to pay them could be predicated. The general doctrine that when a party voluntarily undertakes to do a thing, without qualification, performance is not excused because by inevitable accident or other contingency not foreseen, it becomes impossible for him to do the act or thing which he agreed to do, is well settled. This doctrine protects the integrity of contracts, and one of the reasons assigned in its support in the early case of Paradise v. Jane, Aley, 26, is that as against such contingencies the party could have provided by his contract. See Harmony v. Bingham, 12 N. Y. 99, 63 Am. Dec. 142; Ford v. Cotesworth, L. R. 4 Q. B. 184; Jones v. United States, 96 U. S. 24, 24 L. ed. 644. But it is now well settled that when performance depends on the continued existence of a given person or thing, and such continued existence was assumed as the basis of the agreement, the death of the person or the destruction of the thing puts an end to the obligation. Executory contracts for personal services, for the sale of specific chattels, or for the use of a building, are held to fall within this principle. Dexter v. Norton, 47 N. Y. 62; People v. Globe Mut. L. Ins. Co. 91 N. Y. 174; Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 Best & S. 826.

These cases are not exceptions to the rule that contracts voluntarily made are to be enforced, but the courts, in accordance with the manifest intention, construe the contract as subject to an implied condition that the person or thing shall be in existence when the time of performance arrives. So, if after a contract is made the law interferes and makes subsequent performance impossible, the party is held to be excused. Jones v. Judd, 4 N. Y. 412.

It must be conceded that it is difficult to draw the line and to determine the exact limitations of the principle. When the executory contract relates to specific chattels, and the subject-matter is destroyed without fault of the party, the implied condition arises and excuses performance. But where the contract is based on the assumed existence and continuance of a certain condition, or upon the continuance of a subject-matter which, however, is not the direct object of the contract, is the principle in such cases excluded? The present case illustrates what we have in mind. The contract in question was not with the corporation whose life was extinguished by the judgment of dissolution. But the guaranty assumed that the corporation would continue in existence during the seven years period. The liability which the defendants assumed was in consideration of the benefits which might accrue to them from the management of the transportation business of the corporation during that period. Upon the assumption that the death of the corporation was brought about without their fault, were they thereafter bound? Is the doctrine of implied condition less applicable than it would be if the contract had been between the defendants and the corporation? If in the one case the contract, so far as it was unexecuted, would be terminated, did not the happening of the same event terminate the engagement of these parties, based on the assumed continuance of the corporation in life? There is in the present case, we think, an element which strengthens the conclusion we have reached, that the obligation of the contract terminated prima facie with the dissolution of the corporation. There is something more than an implied and wholly unexpressed condition that the corporation should continue in life during the seven years. It is the fair construction of the language of the contract itself. The contract was not unilateral. It contains mutual stipulations. These mutual stipulations, by their terms, look to the continuance of the corporation, and the mutual obligations into which the parties entered are qualified by this understanding.

The plaintiff, however, seeks to avoid the force of the proposition that, by the true construction of the contract, the obligation of the guaranty as to future payments did not survive the dissolution of the corporation, by the claim that the causes of the dissolution of the corporation were the wrongful acts of the defendants, and that they cannot interpose the judgment of dissolution brought about by their own misconduct as a defense. We think the answer to this claim is that, as between these parties and in this action, the plaintiff himself must be considered as having procured the dissolution of the corporation. The grounds upon which the court in the people's action proceeded in adjudging the dissolution are set forth in the judgment which is an exhibit in this action. The Act of 1852, under which the corporation was organized, is a general law for the incorporation of steam ocean navigation companies. The act offers to any seven or more persons the opportunity to organize a corporation thereunder. It specifies what the certificate to be filed shall contain, and, among other things, that it shall specify "the ports between which the vessels (of the corporation) are intended to be navigated." Sec. 1. The incorporators may insert one or many routes at their pleasure. The act also directs that the corporation shall be managed by not less than five nor more than nine directors, who shall be shareholders and citizens. Sec. 8. The sixth section makes the stockholders severally individually liable for the debts of the corporation to an amount equal to the amount of the stock held by them respectively "until the amount of its capital stock shall have been paid in and a certificate thereof shall have been made and recorded." The seventh section makes it the duty of the president and a majority of the directors, within thirty days after the payment of the last installment of the capital stock, to make and verify a certificate of the fact, "and within said thirty days record the same in the office of the clerk of the county in which is located the principal business office of the corporation." The grounds of forfeiture upon which the judgment in the people's action was based, as near as can be gathered from the record, were (1) that three of the five directors were disqualified, not being stockholders in the company; (2) that no certificate of the payment in full of the capital stock of the corporation had been made and filed as required by the seventh section of the act, although fully paid up in 1874; (8) that annual meetings of the stockholders for the election of directors had not been held; (4) that the corporation had at times diverted some of the seagoing vessels from the route designated in the certificate to other sea routes. In support of the first ground of forfeiture it was shown on the trial of the action that the defendants, after making a transfer on the books of the corporation of one share of stock to each of the three clerks who were named as directors, took back an assignment from each in blank of the share standing in his name and continued to hold the same until the dissolution. As between the plaintiff and defendants this accomplished the purpose which was an essential part of the agreement between them, that each of the parties should hold an equal amount of the stock of the corporation. The fourth ground of forfeiture was based on the fact that ships from time to time belonging to the corporation were employed on other routes than the one mentioned in the certificate of incorporation. The contract between the parties contemplated that during the summer months, when the business could be carried on by the inside route, the outside vessel might be employed on some route other than that specified in the certificate, and the contract provided that "the managers may temporarily divert any of the property of the corporation where it can be more profitably employed." In pursuance of this authority, the plaintiff, during the first year, ran vessels on behalf of the company on other routes than the one designated. Assuming that the several acts and omissions adjudged in the people's action were violations of corporate obligation and duty, which under section 480 of the Code of Procedure in force when the proceedings to annul the charter of the corporation were taken, authorized the state to bring and maintain that action, it is difficult to see how any public interest required a resort to this remedy. The irregularities and omissions, so far as appears, would have been corrected on notice to the corporation, but no such notice was given. The section of the Code referred to makes it the duty of the attorney-general, upon leave granted, to bring an action to annul the charter of a corporation for any of the acts or omissions specified in that section, "in every case of public interest;" but in other cases, only where "satisfactory security shall be given to indemnify the people of this state against the costs and expenses to be incurred thereby." The section discriminates between violations of corporate duty affecting "public interests," or as was said in Thompson v. People, 28 Wend. 588, where a corporation has committed "some misdemeanor in the trust injurious to the public," and technical, incidental, or immaterial violations, which, although strictly involving liability to forfeiture, might not seem to require this drastic procedure. In the one case the attorney-general is bound to act. In the other, only when required to act by the intervention of some other party, and he indemnifies the state and assumes the burden of the litigation. The plaintiff in this action was the active promotor of the people's action. The suit was instituted upon his application; he gave the bond required by the attorney-general and verified the complaint; the suit was carried on and tried by private counsel employed by him. It is safe to say that unless for his active intervention the suit would never have been prosecuted. If you go back of the judgment to inquire for the cause of the dissolution, you come to the plaintiff as the proximate and efficient agency in procuring it. He owed no public duty to the state to bring to the notice of its officers the technical breaches of corporate duty upon which the judgment proceeded. For some of them he seems to have been as much responsible as the defendants, and that in doing what he did he was not actuated by a regard for the public interest, or by a sense of public duty, the record contains ample evidence. We think that the finding that the defendants forfeited their management of the corporation by their own wrongful acts is not sustained by the evidence, in the sense that they were wrongful as to the plaintiff, or that as between these parties they were the cause of the dissolution. Even if the true construction of section 480 is that it is only in cases where the proof of violations of corporate duty is uncertain that the attorney-general is not bound to bring an action, this would not, we think, change the result. The plaintiff procured it to be brought, and he must be regarded as the responsible cause of the dissolution.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of the New York County Court of General Sessions convicting him of manslaughter in the second degree. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Lorenzo Semple, for appellant:

The congress of the United States has declared the act charged against the defendant in the indictment to be an offense against the United States, and provided for the apprehension, trial, and conviction of any person charged with the commission of the said offense.

It is within the constitutional power of congress to confine to the courts of the United NOTE.—For state jurisdiction over lands of the United States within a state, see Barrett v. Palmer (N. Y.) 17 L. R. A. 730, and note.

States exclusive jurisdiction over offenses arising under the laws of the United States.

Claffin v. Houseman, 93 U. S. 130, 23 L. ed. 833; The "Moses Taylor" v. Hammons, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 411, 18 L. ed. 397.

State courts can exercise no jurisdiction whatever over crimes and offenses against the United States unless where in particular cases the laws of the United States otherwise provided.

By the express terms of the Judiciary Act, § 629, Rev. Stat., par. 20, enacted in 1789, the United States circuit court was given exclusive cognizance of all crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States, except where it is or may be otherwise provided by law, and concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of crimes and offenses cognizable therein.

Kent, Com. 12th ed. p. 398.

Under title 70, § 5328, enacted in 1795, the mere fact that a certain act is declared by some section in title 70 to be an offense against the United States shall not take away or impair the jurisdiction of the courts of the several states under the law thereof.

This provision was not a removal of the disability imposed by section 629 upon the state courts to try persons for all crimes and offenses made criminal by title 70.

The jurisdiction vested in the courts of the United States in the case at bar by section 711 of the Revised Statutes of 1878 is exclusive of the courts of the several states.

Section 711. "The jurisdiction vested in the courts of the United States in the cases and proceedings hereinafter mentioned shall be exclusive of the courts of the several states: "First—Of all crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States."

In order to bring the case at bar within the exact scope of this provision only two things are necessary:

First—the act charged must be a crime against the United States.

Second—It must be cognizable under the authority of the United States.

To give any effect to section 5328 taken in conjunction with section 711 it must be construed to mean that the mere fact that a certain act is declared by title 70 to be an offense against the United States shall not of itself alone prevent the state court from punishing a different offense involved in the same act.

The case at bar falls within the well-recognized class of cases in which the state courts and the United States courts exercise concurrent jurisdiction; the same act constituting an offense against the state and also against the federal government.

Section 711 of the Revised Statutes of the United States should not be construed so as to divest the state courts of jurisdiction in the case at bar.

No such effect should be held to result from the insertion of this section at the time of the revision, in reference to a crime which had been declared to be such by the state of New York forty-six years before.

N. Y. Rev. Stat. 1st ed. 1827, 1828.

Killing in hot blood without intent and without dangerous weapon, and killing by culpable negligence, were criminal under the common law, and constituted manslaughter.

Whart. Crim. L. §§ 351-355; Rigmaddon's Case, 1 Lewin, C. C. 181.

Such construction takes away all potency and effect from section 5328, of the title "crimes" which especially preserves the rights of the state courts as to crimes specified in that title, of course meaning crimes primarily against the states.

In Ex parte Geisler, 4 Woods, C. C. 381, the rule is laid down directly contrary to that in Ex parte Houghton, 7 Fed. Rep. 657, and the state courts are held to have jurisdiction by virtue of section 5328 even of counterfeiting cases.

Congress has no power under the constitution to divest the state courts of jurisdiction of such crimes as that in the case at bar.

That the states of the Union did not grant to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over crimes of the nature of the one here under consideration, would seem to have been conceded at the time of the adoption of the Constitution.

Section 5344 of the Revised Statutes of the United States has no application to the case.

If a federal statute undertakes to include in one indiscriminate condemnation classes of acts which congress can constitutionally punish, and classes of acts which congress cannot constitutionally punish, it is unconstitutional and void.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was convicted at the court of general sessions held in and for the city and county of New York of the crime of manslaughter in the second degree, upon an indictment charging him with having, on the 15th of June, 1891, upon the Hudson river, in said city and county, feloniously and wilfully propelled and forced the steam tugboat F. W. DeVoe, upon which he then was, against the yacht Amelia, on which was one Francis Jackson, thereby forcing the said Francis Jackson into the river, and causing his death by drowning. The record contains an agreed statement of the facts found, in substance, that the defendant Welch was duly licensed to act as a second-class pilot on steam vessels by the United States local board of inspectors of steam vessels for the district of New York; that while said license was in full force, and while the defendant was engaged in the actual performance of his duties as pilot under said license, a collision occurred June 15, 1891, on the Hudson river, in the county of New York, between the steam tugboat on which the defendant was employed, and which at the time was under his control and management as pilot, and the sloop yacht Amelia, which collision was caused by the wilful misconduct, negligence, and inattention to his duties on said F. W. DeVoe of the defendant; that said collision so caused resulted in the sinking of the yacht Amelia, and in the destruction of the life of Francis Jackson, who was at the time on board of the yacht, by drowning.

The sole question presented on this appeal is as to the jurisdiction of a state court to entertain jurisdiction of the offense established by the evidence, the claim in behalf of the defendant being that the federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction of the offense of which he was convicted. Section 5344, Rev. Stat. U. S., is as follows: "Every captain, engineer, pilot or other person employed on any steamboat or vessel, by whose misconduct, negligence, or inattention to his duties on such vessel the life of any person is destroyed, and every owner, inspector, or other public officer through whose fraud, connivance, misconduct, or violation of law the life of any person shall be destroyed, shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter, and upon conviction thereof before any circuit court of the United States, shall be sentenced to confinement at hard labor for a period of not more than ten years." It is plain that the circumstances found bring the case within this section. The defendant was a licensed pilot. He was in charge of the steam tugboat as pilot at the time of the collision. The collision, which resulted in the death of Jackson, was caused by the misconduct, negligence, and inattention to his duties of the defendant; and, moreover, his misconduct was, as the jury found, wilful,—an element which does not seem to be necessary to constitute the crime defined in the statutes of the United States. In the consideration of the question of the jurisdiction of the state court there are certain indisputable propositions which it is important to bear in mind. The Hudson river is within the territory of the state of New York, and is subject to its legislative jurisdiction. The criminal laws of the state apply to offenses committed on the waters of the river, whether above or below the ebb and flow of the tide, to the same extent as to like offenses committed upon the land, except in so far as the laws of congress, under the Constitution of the United States, have asserted an exclusive jurisdiction. In United States v. Bevans, 16 U. S. 3 Wheat. 336, 4 L. ed. 404, the defendant had been indicted and convicted of murder in the United States court of Massachusetts, committed on board of a man of war of the United States in Boston harbor, he being at the time a marine on the vessel. The conviction was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States on the ground that the place where the murder was committed was within the territorial limits of Massachusetts, and that, as no law of congress had made a murder within the territorial jurisdiction of a state, on tide water or elsewhere, an offense against the United States, the state court alone had jurisdiction. In Smith v. Maryland, 59 U. S. 18 How. 71, 15 L. ed. 269, Mr. Justice Curtis, referring to the grant of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction in the United States Constitution, said: "We consider it to have been settled by this court in United States v. Bevans that this clause in the constitution did not affect the jurisdiction nor the legislative power of a state over so much of their territory that lies below high-water mark, save that they parted with the power so to legislate as to conflict with the admiralty jurisdiction or the laws of the United States." The rights of a state to exercise jurisdiction over navigable waters within its limits, and to subject persons and property therein to the civil and criminal jurisdiction of its courts, in the absence of any prohibition in the Federal Constitution or laws, has passed unchallenged, and is an undoubted right of sovereignty.

Another proposition equally beyond question is that the crime of which the defendant was convicted is one defined by a statute of the state of New York; and that, independently of any statute, the facts established the crime of manslaughter at common law. The revised statutes, after defining the crime of murder, and what shall constitute the crime of manslaughter in the highest degree, proceeded to declare (2 Rev. Stat. p. 662, § 19): "Every other killing of a human being by the act, procurement, or culpable negligence of another, where such killing is not justifiable or excusable, or is not declared in the act to be murder or manslaughter of some other degree shall be deemed manslaughter in the fourth degree." It is scarcely necessary to cite authorities to show that the statute above quoted was simply declaratory of the rule of common law that a killing of a human being by culpable negligence is manslaughter. Whart. Crim. L. §§ 861-865, and cases cited.

The courts of this state, on the adoption of the State Constitution of 1777, became vested with the jurisdiction over offenses cognizable at common law, and this jurisdiction is unimpaired and in full force, except in so far as it has been modified by state legislation, or was surrendered to the United States by the Federal Constitution, or has been taken away by act of congress lawfully enacted in execution of the power conferred by that instrument. It is an accepted canon in the construction of powers granted to the general government by the Federal Constitution that state authority existing when the constitution was adopted is not excluded by the mere grant of similar powers to congress. The powers granted by the Federal Constitution are not exclusive unless made so in terms, or prohibited to the states, or are incompatible with the exercise of a concurrent jurisdiction. But the principle has been grafted upon the subject that, although powers conferred by the constitution upon congress are not in terms or in their nature exclusive of the power of the states, they may be made so by national legislation excluding the jurisdiction of the states in the particular matter, although within their original and antecedent authority. In Martin v. Hunter, 14 U. S. 1 Wheat. 304, 4 L. ed. 97, Judge Story, referring to the judicial power of the United States, said: "It is manifest that the judicial power of the United States is unavoidably, in some cases, exclusive of all state authority, and in all others may be made so at the election of congress." The Judiciary Act of 1789 (1 Stat. at L. chap. 20) was framed upon this construction of the power of congress, and the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States was in some cases made exclusive; and in others, the jurisdiction of the state courts, not being in terms excluded, was left unaffected, and was concurrent with the courts of the Union as to matters over which the state courts could, by their own powers and constitution, exercise jurisdiction. A distinction has been suggested as to the power of congress to make the jurisdiction of the United States courts exclusive between cases in which the state courts had jurisdiction antecedent to the adoption of the constitution, and where the right involved or the liability incurred arises exclusively under a law of congress, and without which it would have had no existence. See Curtis, Const. § 141. But the recent cases of The Moses Taylor, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 411, 18 L. ed. 397; and Clafin v. Houseman, 98 U. S. 180, 28 L. ed. 838, seem to be adverse to the distinction suggested, and to hold that it is competent for congress to exclude the jurisdiction of the state courts in respect of all subjects upon which congress may legislate. In The Moses Taylor it seemed to be conceded that the proceeding there under review was a matter as to which the original states through their courts could have exercised jurisdiction antecedent to the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and the decision was placed on the ground that the jurisdiction was excluded by force of the ninth section of the Judiciary Act of 1789, and vested exclusively in the district courts of the United States. See 1 Kent, Com. 400. But it is obvious that, to exclude the jurisdiction of the state courts over matters within their ordinary jurisdiction, the intention of congress to exercise this power should be distinctly manifested, and that the legislation relied upon to deprive the state courts of jurisdiction should be clear and unambiguous. There can be no presumption that state authority is excluded from the mere fact that congress has legislated. There must be express words of exclusion, or a manifest repugnancy in the exercise of state authority over the subject. See Curtis, Const. § 121.

It must, we think, be conceded that section 5344 of the Revised Statutes of the United States was in its general purpose and enactment within the power of congress, under the constitutional grant of power to "regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states" (art. 1, § 8), and the grant of judicial power in case of "admiralty and maritime jurisdiction" (art. 3, § 2), and the authority vested in Congress "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the powers vested in congress by the constitution (art. 1, § 8, subd. 18). The Hudson river is within the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States. The Genesee Chief, 59 U. S. 12 How. 443, 13 L. ed. 1058. The power to regulate commerce extends to the persons who conduct navigation as well as to the instruments used, and the United States courts may be invested by congress with jurisdiction over offenses committed upon waters within the admiralty jurisdiction. Cooley v. Philadelphia Port Wardens, 53 U. S. 12 How. 299, 13 L. ed. 996; United States v. Combs, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 72, 9 L. ed. 1004; Curtis, Const. § 47. The legislation of which section 5344 is the culmination had its origin in the Act of Congress of July 7, 1838 (5 Stat. at L. 304), entitled "An Act to Provide for the Better Security of the Lives of Passengers on Board of Vessels Propelled in Whole or in Part by Steam." It was extended by the Act of February 28, 1871 (16 Stat. at L. 456, § 57), and the provision in its present form was enacted in the Revision of 1873, and forms section 5344 of title 70 of the United States Revised Statutes, entitled "Crimes." The power of congress to enact rules for the government of vessels on waters within the admiralty jurisdiction, to prescribe the qualifications and duties of captains, pilots, and other persons employed thereon, to supervise the construction of steam vessels with a view to secure the safety of passengers and others, to require licenses to be obtained by those engaged in navigation, and the inspection of steam boilers at recurring intervals, has been exercised without challenge, and a large body of rules covering these and cognate subjects have been enacted by congress, or under its authority, and are to be found in the Revised Statutes of the United States. The power to enact rules on a specified subject carries the power to enforce penalties for their violation. The primary purpose of section 5844 was to secure by criminal sanctions the observance by owners, officers, employes of vessels, inspectors, and other public officers, of the duties imposed upon them in connection with the business of navigation for the security of human life. Whether the section has, as is claimed, a broader application than is justified by the power of congress, we deem it unnecessary to consider. We have no doubt that, as applied to licensed officers or pilots, the enactment does not transcend its power.

It remains to consider whether the offense defined in the section is exclusively punishable in the courts of the United States. The states do not enforce the criminal laws of the United States. United States v. Lathrop, 17 Johns. 4. The state, in punishing the defendant, is not enforcing a statute of the United States. It is enforcing its own laws, which had an existence coeval with the formation of the state constitution. The crime of which the defendant was convicted was primarily a crime against the peace and good order of the state. It was only a crime against the United States because congress, in the interest of navigation, had seen fit to enact a law making one species of homicide, when committed by an officer, pilot, etc., manslaughter punishable in the courts of the United States. There is nothing in the enactment itself which makes the jurisdiction exclusive. There is no repugnancy in the existence of concurrent jurisdiction in the state courts to punish under its laws this grade of homicide. The jurisdiction of the United States courts is not exclusive unless there are found elsewhere in the legislation of congress provisions, of clear and unmistakable import, taking away the jurisdiction of the courts of the state. The principle that congress may lawfully exclude the jurisdiction of the state courts of offenses punishable under federal statutes was first applied by section 11 of the Judiciary Act of 1789, which declared that the circuit courts of the United States shall have "exclusive cognizance of all crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States, except where this act otherwise provides or the laws of the United States shall otherwise direct." The jurisdiction of the state courts to punish under state laws offenses which are cognizable by the circuit courts of the United States was made by this section to depend upon affirmative legislation by congress, giving the state courts concurrent jurisdiction. Subsequent to the Act of 1789 laws were passed by congress punishing the counterfeiting of the current coin of the United States and the uttering of the same. Laws 1806, chap. 49; Laws 1807, chap. 20; Laws 1816, chap. 44; Laws 1825, chap. 65. These acts contain the following provision:

"And be it further enacted that nothing in this act contained shall be construed to deprive the courts of the individual states of jurisdiction under the laws of the several states, over offenses made punishable by this act." In 1847 the question whether the courts of Ohio could entertain jurisdiction under the laws of that state of the offense of passing counterfeit current coin of the United States came before the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Fox v. Ohio, 46 U. S. 5 How. 410, 12 L. ed. 213, upon writ of error, after the conviction of the defendant in the state court of that offense. It was urged that the proviso in the federal statutes above referred to did not affect the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States courts under section 11 of the Judiciary Act of 1789. The supreme court sustained the jurisdiction of the state court, and the decision necessarily adjudged that the proviso in these statutes was a law of the United States, excepting cases of passing counterfeit coin from the clause in the Act of 1789, giving exclusive jurisdiction to the United States courts of offenses cognizable under the laws of the United States. Mr. Justice Washington, in Houston v. Moore, 18 U. S. 5 Wheat. 26, 5 L. ed. 25, gave the same construction to the proviso in the acts referred to. The case of United States v. Marigold, 50 U. S. 9 How. 560, 18 L. ed. 257, brought into question the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States to punish the crime of passing counterfeit coin, under the federal statute, and in this case also the jurisdiction was affirmed. The two cases of Fox v. Ohio and United States v. Marigold established the proposition that the same act may be an offense both against the state and the United States, and punishable in each jurisdiction under its laws. The same principle has been declared in other cases. Moore v. Illinois, 55 U. S. 14 How. 18, 14 L. ed. 306; Chief Justice Taney, United States v. Amy (July, 1859), 4 Quart. L. J. 163; Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371, 25 L. ed. 717. Section 5828 of the United States Revised Statutes, which is one of the general provisions of title 70, entitled "Crimes", declares: "Sec. 5828. Nothing in this title shall be held to take away or impair the jurisdiction of the courts of the several states under the laws thereof." Later on in this title is section 5844, making the misconduct, negligence, or inattention to his duties of a captain, pilot, etc., manslaughter. The provision as to exclusive jurisdiction contained in section 11 of the Judiciary Act of 1789 is incorporated in substance into the United States Revised Statutes in the twentieth subdivision of section 629, which declares that the circuit courts of the United States shall have "exclusive cognizance of all crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States, except where it may be otherwise provided by law."

If the question of the jurisdiction of the state courts in the present case depends solely upon the construction of the clause in section 629, just quoted, and of section 5828 of the United States Revised Statutes, there could be little ground, under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, construing

ing the proviso in the counterfeiting acts, for denying such jurisdiction. Section 5328 is, in legal effect, a re-enactment of the proviso in those acts applicable to the crime, mentioned in title 70 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The proviso in the counterfeiting acts was held to withdraw the crimes therein mentioned from the operation of the eleventh section of the Judiciary Act of 1789, and to create an exception to the general rule declared in that section, excluding the jurisdiction of the state courts of offenses cognizable in the courts of the United States. The same construction, applied to section 5328, would make the jurisdiction of the state courts of the offense now in question concurrent. But the confusion and uncertainty attending the subject is produced by another section of the Revised Statutes of the United States, first enacted at the time of the revision, being section 711. That section declares: "The jurisdiction vested in the courts of the United States in the case hereinafter mentioned, shall be exclusive of the courts of the several states: First, of all crimes and offenses cognizable under the laws of the United States." Construing this section upon its language alone, and without reference to the other sections mentioned, it would exclude the jurisdiction of the state courts over the offense of manslaughter committed by a pilot or other person employed on vessels, under the circumstances mentioned in section 5344. If such construction is imperatively required, it would result in the apparent anomaly of leaving to the state courts jurisdiction of the crime of murder committed on board of a vessel on navigable waters within the territory of the state, whether by an officer, pilot, or other person, and depriving them of jurisdiction of the crimes of manslaughter, defined in section 5344. If the defendant had murdered Jackson, the state court would have had undoubted jurisdiction of the crime. Manslaughter is one of the grades of criminal homicide. Can it be reasonably supposed that congress, by an act which was primarily intended to enforce the observance by persons engaged in navigation, of the rules it had established for the security of life and property, intended further to oust the jurisdiction of the state courts over one grade of the offense of manslaughter, of which they before had undoubted jurisdiction, and where the offense, whether committed by a pilot or any other person, was primarily an offense against the state? It was made an offense against the United States also, by reason of the relation in which the offender stood to the United States, under its rules and regulations, which he was bound to observe. We think section 5328 must be construed as exempting from the operation of section 711 the cases specified in title 70, which were also offenses punishable under the laws of the several states. Under section 711, the states could not enforce the criminal statutes of the United States, as was attempted, in substance, under the law of Pennsylvania involved in Houston v. Moore, 18 U. S. 5 Wheat. 7, 5 L. ed. 20. Nor, under section

711, could a state make an act criminal and punishable in its courts, which in its nature was an offense only, because made so by a law of congress. Section 5328 may perhaps be construed as confining the concurrent jurisdiction of the state courts, of offenses specified in title 70, to such offenses as were such under the laws of the states existing when that section was enacted, leaving the section to operate to prevent future legislation by the states concerning the crimes mentioned in that title, not before cognizable under state laws. But, whatever may be the true construction of that section, to give it the broad application claimed would, we think, ignore the true scope or meaning of section 5328, interpreted in the light of the previous decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. We are not satisfied with the view taken in some of the circuit and district courts of the United States, that section 5328 was intended merely to permit a state court to punish a different offense involved in the same act. Such a distinction is very difficult to apply, and it grafts on the section a qualification of its general language. Many of the crimes specified in title 70 are, in their nature exclusively offenses against the United States. Such offenses are withdrawn from state jurisdiction, because they are not, and cannot be, offenses against the state. We have seen that where the exercise of state authority is incompatible with the exercise of federal authority granted by the Constitution of the United States, the state authority is superseded without express words. This principle applies as well to judicial as to legislative powers. Federalist, No. 82, by Hamilton. It was upon this principle, as we understand, that it was held by the Supreme Court of the United States (Re Loney, 134 U. S. 372, 33 L. ed. 949) that a state court had no jurisdiction to punish perjury committed in a contested election case, of a member of the house of representatives, under a proceeding regulated by a law of the United States. The learned justice who delivered the opinion in that case, after stating that the power of punishing a witness for perjury in a judicial proceeding belongs peculiarly to the government in whose tribunals the proceeding was had, said: "It is essential to the impartial and efficient administration of justice in the tribunals of the nation that witnesses should be able to testify freely before them, unrestrained by legislation of the state, or by fear of punishment in the state courts. The administration of justice in the national tribunals would be greatly embarrassed and impeded," etc. The cases of People v. Fonda, 62 Mich. 401, and Com. v. Felton, 101 Mass. 204, held that the state courts have no jurisdiction of the crime of embezzlement by an officer of a national bank of the funds of such bank. It is sufficient to say that the offense of embezzlement, under the national bank acts, was subject to the provisions of section 11 of the Judiciary Act, and is not one of the crimes exempted from its operation by section 5328 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The contention that section 711 excludes the state courts from jurisdiction of all crimes enumerated in title 70, if sustained, takes from the state courts the power to punish the passing of counterfeit money of the United States,—a concurrent jurisdiction, which they have exercised from the commencement, and which, as was assumed by Mr. Justice Gray in the case Re Loney, still exists. Upon the whole case we are of opinion that the state court had jurisdiction to punish the defendant for the crime proved. Its jurisdiction has not, we think, been taken away by the legislation of congress. It would be a more satisfactory state of this law than now exists if it could be held that the court first acquiring jurisdiction should retain it, and that the judgment of one court in such a case as this could be pleaded in bar of a further prosecution for substantially the same offense in the courts of the other jurisdiction.

James W. WHITNEY et al., Appts.

1. An agreement between brothers and sisters to whom lands descend in common to own the same as joint tenants and that upon the death of either the land shall pass by devise or descent to the survivors with a subsequent agreement at a family meeting, reaffirming the prior agreement and providing that upon the death of the last survivor the land shall by devise or descent pass to the child of the only married one of such brothers and sisters who is then in being, is not void as creating a perpetuity under 1 N. Y. Rev. Stat., 723, §§ 14, 15, declaring void every future estate which shall suspend the absolute power of alienation for a longer period than during the continuance of not more than two lives in being and declaring that such power is suspended when there are no persons in being by whom an absolute fee in possession can be conveyed, since all the brothers and sisters uniting with such child can at any time convey a perfect, indefeasible title to the land.

2. An agreement between brothers and sisters to whom land has descended in common that the same shall be held by them as joint tenants and pass to the survivors by devise or descent and at the death of the last survivor shall pass by devise or descent to the child of the only married one of them, is sufficiently performed to be taken out of the operation of the statute of frauds by its substantial keeping by all the parties thereto until the land has become vested in the survivor who has received all the fruits thereof which are to come to her and to make it enforceable by such child.

3. A contract by brothers and sisters to whom land has descended in common to hold the same as joint tenants and that it shall pass to the survivor by descent or devise and at the death of the last survivor shall pass to the child of one of such brothers by descent or devise, is not rendered unenforceable by such child by the fact that the last survivor has conveyed all the property, where the grantees had knowledge of the rights of such child; especially where he obtained the property by fraud without paying any consideration therefor.

4. An action to establish an agreement by brothers and sisters to whom land has descended in common to hold the same as joint tenants and that it shall pass by descent or devise to the survivor and from the latter to a child of one of the brothers, and to set aside conveyances of the land by the survivor, is not prematurely brought by such child on the ground that the survivor is not yet dead and that his child is not entitled to possession, since if the agreement is valid, he has a vested remainder in the property and the right to protect the estate so that he may receive the same when it should come to him by the terms of the agreement.

5. An agreement by brothers and sisters to whom land has descended in common to hold the same as joint tenants and that it shall pass to the survivor and from the latter by descent or devise to a child of one of the brothers, is enforceable by such child, although he was not a party thereto.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fifth Department, affirming a judgment of the Special Term for Genesee County overruling a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to establish and enforce an alleged family agreement as to the disposal of certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Quincy Van Voorhis, for appellants:

The arrangement, understanding, or agreement was and is void, because it contemplated and required an unlawful suspension of the power of alienation of the land in question.

1 Rev. Stat. 723, §§ 14, 15; 3 Birdseye, Stat. p. 2527.

By the terms of the agreement the four Murphy sisters, and the survivors of them, were required to retain the title of the farm until the death of the last survivor, so that it would then pass by inheritance to the plaintiff.

It was not in their power even with the co-operation of the plaintiff, to transfer the title, because the agreement required the title to remain in the Murphy family, so long, at least, as any of the four sisters should be living.

NOTE.—The transformation by a parol agreement of a tenancy in common into a joint tenancy with a further limitation on the last survivor's death to a child of one of the tenants is not only a remarkable transaction but presents interesting questions concerning perpetuities and the statute of frauds.

As to what constitutes an unlawful suspension of alienation, see Miffin's App. (Pa.) 1 L. R. A. 453, and note; Cruikshank v. Home for the Friendless (N. Y.) 4 L. R. A. 140, and note; Armstrong v. Doug-

With last named case see note as to effect upon prior takers of the failure of a gift for violation of the rule against perpetuities.

The agreement is void because not in writing.

See 2 Rev. Stat. 184, §§ 6, 8; 2 Birdseye Stat. pp. 1233, 1234.

A contract to convey land stands upon a very different footing from a contract made for the purpose of suspending the power to convey land.

No authority can be found which will justify the courts in lending their aid for the enforcement of an agreement which the statute forbids because it is against public policy.

Pratt v. Adams, 7 Paige, 615, 4 L. ed. 800; Devitt v. Brisbane, 16 N. Y. 508; Fowler v. Scully, 72 Pa. 456, 18 Am. Rep. 699; Fry, Spec. Perf. 222, § 456; Pom. Cont. 360; Perry, Tr. 181; Tracy v. Talmage, 14 N. Y. 171, 67 Am. Dec. 182.

Even if the court has the power to enforce such a contract as this under any circumstances it should not be exercised in a case where, like this, the parties have entered into an agreement with the express and sole purpose and design, fully understood by them, of accomplishing the very thing which the statute condemns as being contrary to public policy, and unreservedly forbids.

Pratt v. Adams, supra.

Plaintiff cannot maintain the action as the beneficiary of a trust.

The statute does not authorize a trust for any such purpose as that contemplated by this agreement.

1 Rev. Stat. 727, § 55; 3 Birdseye Stat. 3178; Greene v. Greene, 125 N. Y. 506.

The statute to the effect that the beneficiary may enforce the performance of the trust in equity, does not help the plaintiff, because it expressly relates only to such trusts as are valid in their creation. The trust which the plaintiff claims was void in its creation because contrary to the statute.

Greene v. Greene, supra; Marx v. McGlynn, 88 N. Y. 357; Ascho v. Ascho, 118 N. Y. 232; Bennett v. Garlock, 79 N. Y. 302; Haynes v. Sherman, 117 N. Y. 433; Garcey v. McDevitt, 72 N. Y. 556; Noyes v. Blakeman, 6 N. Y. 567.

The plaintiff has no such interest as will authorize this action.

Mary Murphy is still living and there is no certainty that the plaintiff will outlive her, or ever acquire any vested interest.

Collon v. Fox, 67 N. Y. 349; Leonard v. Burr, 18 N. Y. 96; Radley v. Kuhn, 97 N. Y. 26; Fowler v. Ingersoll, 127 N. Y. 472; Fry, Spec. Perf. 677; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. p. 352, § 1040.

As far as plaintiff is concerned, the agreement was voluntary and without consideration, and the owners of the property could revoke or cancel it without his consent.

Mr. Myron H. Peck, Jr., for respondent:

allowing his portion of the property to remain for the use and benefit of the defendant Mary Murphy, and by supplying large sums of money to protect and to keep intact the body of the estate. It appears from a fair inference from the statements in the complaint that he had conveyed his interest in the home property to his sisters for that express purpose and having fulfilled on his part he would be in a condition to insist upon a performance by the other parties of the agreement alleged in the complaint.

Brennan v. Brennan, 21 N. Y. Supp. 195; Kenyon v. Youlen, 53 Hun, 591; Willard, Eq. Jur. point 4.

The taking under such circumstances must be deemed to be for the benefit of the plaintiff.

Fairchild v. Fairchild, 64 N. Y. 471; Fulton v. Whitney, 66 N. Y. 548; Ryan v. Dox, 34 N. Y. 307, 90 Am. Dec. 696; Mitchell v. Reed, 61 N. Y. 123, 19 Am. Rep. 252; Baldwin v. Humphrey, 44 N. Y. 609; Bennett v. Austin, 81 N. Y. 308; Wood v. Rabe, 96 N. Y. 414, 48 Am. Rep. 640.

The payment by the father of the plaintiff of large sums of money in reliance upon the agreement that the property should eventually descend and belong to the plaintiff, is not unlike the advancement of money on an agreement to give security therefor, which a court of equity will enforce according to the terms of the agreement.

Smith v. Smith, 125 N. Y. 224.

The agreement between the heirs constituted a valid trust which a court of equity will enforce under the circumstances of this case.

If the defendant, Mary Murphy, had died without a will, the plaintiff would have the right, as the heir to the estate, to maintain an action to set aside the transfers set forth in the complaint.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants' demurrer to the complaint, on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, having been overruled in the courts below, they have appealed to this court. The complaint is very verbose and lengthy, occupying more than fifty pages of the printed record. We will not attempt to make a precise or comprehensive abstract of it. It is sufficiently accurate for the present purpose, and for the exposition of the principles of law applicable to this case.

to state that it alleges, in substance, the following facts: That Hugh Murphy died in the town of Le Roy, in this state, in 1826, leaving three sons and four daughters, of whom the defendant Mary Murphy, now about 95 years old, is the last survivor; that none of these brothers and sisters was ever married except the father of the plaintiff, who was married in 1837, and died in 1861, leaving the plaintiff, his only child and heir-at-law; that plaintiff was born in 1839; that, at and after the death of Hugh Murphy, his seven children became and were tenants of a farm situated in the village of Le Roy; that they all lived together upon the farm, until the marriage of the plaintiff's father, and he, sometime after his marriage, moved to the state of Michigan; that prior to that time, they had made valuable improvements upon the farm, and had mutually agreed to own the same together as joint tenants, and that upon the death of either, the farm should pass by devise or descent to the survivors; that after the birth of the plaintiff, and in or about the year 1857, at a family meeting of all the brothers and sisters, there was a mutual agreement entered into by parol, as we may assume, by which the prior agreement was reaffirmed, and it was then mutually again agreed that the farm should be owned together, and that, as fast as either of them died, it should by devise or descent pass to the survivor, and, upon the death of the last survivor, it should by devise or descent pass to the plaintiff, and belong to him; that this agreement was kept and performed by brothers and sisters until, by the successive deaths, the title became vested in the defendant Mary, the last survivor of them; that the defendants, Whitney and Moore came to live in the Murphy family many years before the commencement of this action, and, several years before, they commenced by fraud, falsehood, undue influence, and coercion to obtain from the defendant Mary conveyances of portions of the real estate to themselves and to others; that the defendant Mary is feeble in body and mind, and incompetent to manage her affairs, and that, by fraud, artifice, undue influence and coercion, they have procured her to convey away all of the real estate, and that they are appropriating the proceeds thereof to themselves; that during all this time they were well aware of the family arrangement and agreement which had been made for the benefit of the plaintiff in reference to the Murphy farm; and that their fraudulent acts were intended and designed to entirely deprive the plaintiff of the benefit of that agreement; and the plaintiff asked for relief, among other things, that the conveyances of the real estate made to the defendants Whitney and Moore be set aside and vacated, and that they be required to account for the proceeds of the real estate sold, and that a receiver be appointed, and for other relief.

We think it cannot be said that the complaint, although imperfectly and unartificially drawn, failed to allege a cause of action. It is claimed on the part of the defendants that the agreement alleged in the complaint as to the holding and transmission of the real estate was against public policy, as contravening the statutes against perpetuities. 1 Rev. Stat. p.

723, §§ 14, 15. Section 14 is as follows: "Every future estate shall be void in its creation, which shall suspend the absolute power of alienation for a longer period than is prescribed in this article. Such power of alienation is suspended when there are no persons in being by whom an absolute fee in possession can be conveyed." And section 15 is as follows: "The absolute power of alienation shall not be suspended by any limitation or condition whatever for a longer period than during the continuance of not more than two lives in being at the creation of the estate, except in the single instance mentioned in the next section."

This agreement, assuming it to be valid and binding upon the parties, does not violate either of these sections. The absolute power of alienation is not suspended, because there were at all times persons in being who could convey an absolute fee in possession. All the brothers and sisters, uniting with the plaintiff, could at any time have conveyed a perfect indefeasible title to the real estate. Estates can be rendered inalienable by vesting them in trustees upon some one of the valid trusts mentioned in section 55 of the article upon "Trusts;" so that they become inalienable, under section 65, for a period of more than two lives in being at the creation of the trust, or by the creation of future, contingent, or expectant estates, so that there are no persons in being during the two lives who can convey a perfect title. Smith v. Edwards, 38 N. Y. 104. Here none of these conditions existed. The agreement did not contemplate that the persons interested were bound to keep and hold the land. It was an agreement for the benefit of all the brothers and sisters and the plaintiff, and no other persons were interested therein; and if they should all at any time unite in a sale and conveyance of the land, a perfect title would pass, and no rights under the agreement would be violated.

It is further claimed on the part of the defendants that the agreement was void, under the statute of frauds, because not in writing. But here there was part performance sufficient to take the agreement out of the statute of frauds. The agreement alleged in the complaint had been substantially kept by all the parties thereto until the land became vested in the defendant Mary, and she had thus been largely benefited by the agreement, and had received all the fruits thereof which were to come to her. She could not, therefore, urge against this agreement that it was void, under the statute of frauds, because not in writing.

It is no answer to this action, assuming that the plaintiff is able to establish the agreement which he alleges, that the real estate has all been conveyed, and that the title to the farm has thus passed out of the defendant Mary. As the agreement related to land, the plaintiff is bound in this action to show that the facts are such that he would have been entitled to maintain the action if the defendant Mary had still retained the land; and, having established such a state of facts, he can pursue the land in the possession of those who have taken it with knowledge of the agreement; and, where the land has been converted into money, he has the same right to pursue the proceeds thereof. This is not a case where the plaintiff was bound to pay anything more for the land, or to perform any further act on his part. The defendant Mary, before she made the conveyances of the land, had received the whole consideration which upholds the plaintiff's rights, and whoever takes and withholds the land or its proceeds from him with knowledge of his rights is, in equity, just as liable to him as the defendant Mary herself can be; and this is certainly so as against the defendants Whitney and Moore, who are alleged to have obtained the property by fraud, and to have paid no consideration therefor.

It is no defense to this action that the time has not yet come when the plaintiff could come into possession of the property, under the terms of the agreement. The time had come when, assuming the validity of the agreement, he had a vested remainder in the property, and the right that the defendant Mary had to the real estate or its proceeds was a life estate,—the right to the income thereof during her life. As a remainderman, he had the right to protect the estate, so that he might receive the same when it ought to come to him by the terms of the agreement. If the defendant Mary still held the land, and there was danger, in consequence of her age and feeble mind, and the undue influence, artifice, and fraud of the other defendants, that she might convey it to a bona fide purchaser, ignorant of the agreements, he could come into a court of equity, and restrain the conveyance thereof; and, so far as the land has been converted into money and the defendants Whitney and Moore are appropriating the same to their own use, and there is danger that it may be dissipated and diverted from the plaintiff, so that he may not be able to get it at the death of Mary, it would be a reproach to equity if its jurisdiction were not sufficient to give him some relief, so that the proceeds of the real estate may be preserved, not only to Mary during her life, but for his benefit at her death.

Although the plaintiff was not a party to the agreement alleged in the complaint, it was made ultimately for his benefit, as finally the whole Murphy estate, under the agreement, was to reach him. The defendant Mary having received the full consideration of the agreement made for his benefit, it cannot be questioned, under many authorities, that he has a standing to enforce it on his own behalf. Garnsey v. Rogers, 47 N. Y. 233, 7 Am. Rep. 440; Vrooman v. Turner, 69 N. Y. 280, 25 Am. Rep. 195. We do not now determine what relief the plaintiff shall have, nor the extent, nature, or measure thereof. The defendants must answer the complaint, and if the plaintiff, under the principles of law hereinafter announced, shall be able to establish a cause of action upon the trial, the relief to which he may be entitled will depend upon the case he will be able to make. All we determine now is that, upon the facts alleged, he is entitled to some relief. The judgment should therefore be affirmed, but with leave to the defendants to withdraw their demurrer, and answer within twenty days, upon payment of all the costs of the action subsequent to the interposition of the demurrer.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of South Carolina

v.

Wash WELDON et al., Appts.

(.....S. O.....)

1. A note found on burglarized premises the morning after the burglary in which the addressee is invited to join in the burglary is not competent evidence against him in the absence of any testimony tending to connect him with it.

2. Evidence of former burglaries upon the same premises committed by one under indictment for burglary is competent against him when he is shown to have declared that he did not intend to work and that if he did not make his support out of the prosecuting witness he would make it out of some one else.

3. An untutored deaf mute may be per-

NOTE.—Deaf and dumb persons as witnesses.

Deaf and dumb persons were, in the olden times, looked upon and considered as presumed, in law, idiots. Hale, P. C. 84.

In 1 Blackstone's Commentaries, page 804, it is stated that a man who is born deaf and dumb and blind is looked upon by the law as in the same state with an idiot; he being supposed incapable of any understanding, as wanting all those senses which furnish the human mind with ideas. Co. Litt. 42.

In 1 Hale, P. C. 84, it is stated: "A man that is surdus et mutus a nativitate is in presumption of law an idiot, and the rather, because he hath no possibility to understand what is forbidden by law to be done, or under what penalties, but if it can appear that he hath the use of understanding, which many of that condition discover by signs to a very great measure, then he may be tried, and suffer judgment and execution, though great caution is to be used therein. See also Steel's Case, 1 Leach, C. C. 452, et infra."

The above principles were followed by the court in Rex v. Jones, 1 Leach, C. C. 102, where the prisoner, who was arraigned for a capital offense, could be intelligently communicated with by signs.

But these ancient doctrines have been relaxed, and it has been held, and the principle is established, that deaf and dumb persons are competent witnesses, and may communicate and give evidence through the means of one capable of reading their signs and correctly interpreting them to the court, such party being sworn.

So, if such persons can read and write, their evidence may be taken by way of written questions and answers.

And such examination by signs has been held preferable to an examination in writing. State v. De Wolf, 8 Conn. 98, 20 Am. Dec. 90, et infra.

He will be examined as to the nature of an oath, and if of sufficient discretion, and a proper sense of the sanctity of an oath be shown, his evidence mitted to testify by signs through an interpreter who is not an expert, if it is satisfactorily shown that the latter can correctly interpret the communications which the witness attempts to make.

Mr. John S. Wilson for the State.

McIver, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case the defendants were indicted and tried jointly for housebreaking and larceny, alleged to have been committed on the 20th December, 1892, by breaking open the window of the prosecutor's store, and stealing by way of signs will be received. Snyder v. Nations, 5 Blackf. 295.

Such a party is competent, if possessed of sufficient reason to have intelligence conveyed to him, even though not able to write. People v. McGee, 1 Denio, 19.

If, however, he has no knowledge, except such as is inferential, and there is no exact mode of communication between the parties, and the mute has no knowledge of the sanctity of an oath, and is incapable of having the same made known to him, and knows nothing of the nature of a falsehood, his evidence is not admissible. Territory v. Duran, 3 N. M. 124.

Where the supposed victim of the outrage of the prisoner who was deaf and dumb was sworn and testified by a sworn interpreter and instructor in the deaf and dumb asylum, through signs adopted as a medium of communication by that class of persons, it was objected by the prisoner's counsel, that as it appeared by the testimony of the interpreter that the witness could read and write and communicate her ideas imperfectly by writing, and understood the language of signs, and was capable of relating facts correctly in that manner, she ought to testify in her own words in writing. The court, however, overruled the objection, and held that the mode adopted by the court (examination by signs) was the next best mode to an oral examination, which was preferable in that case, owing to infirmity, to an examination in writing. State v. De Wolf, 8 Conn. 93, 20 Am. Dec. 90.

In a prosecution for assault and battery and false imprisonment, a deaf and dumb person was produced as a witness, and objected to, the court through a sworn interpreter examining him by signs, touching the extent of his knowledge of the nature of an oath, which it appeared he understood and that perjury was punishable at law, but had no conception of the religious obligation of an oath. The court held that the fact of a witness being deaf and dumb formed no objection to his admissibility, as such a person could communicate by signs, and was a competent witness at common law, if he had sufficient discretion and a proper sense of the sanctity of an oath. Snyder v. Nations, 5 Blackf. 295.

In Com. v. Hill, 14 Mass. 207, the defendant was indicted for larceny, and it appearing that he was deaf and dumb, but of sufficient capacity to be a proper subject for a criminal prosecution, the court allowed an acquaintance to be sworn and to interpret the indictment to him, and the trial proceeded as on a plea of not guilty, the indictment being explained by signs.

In People v. McGee, 1 Denio, 19, the prosecutor upon whom the offense was committed, was of weak understanding, being deaf and dumb, but it appeared that she could make signs and had understanding enough to take care of herself, and to communicate her wants and observe things that occurred about her, informing witness of them by signs which he was able to comprehend, and had no difficulty in carrying on ordinary conversation. The court held there was no objection to her competency as a witness, to give evidence through the medium of a witness as an interpreter by signs, she having sufficient reason to have intelligence conveyed to her by the witness and to communicate facts to the understanding of the witness, although she was not able to talk or write, she could be sworn and testify through signs.

In the above case it appeared that the witness who acted as interpreter, had a previous knowledge of the understanding and capacity of the person whose evidence was sought to be obtained through his aid.

So where the principal witness offered for the prosecution upon an indictment for murder was a deaf and dumb child, less than nine years old at the time of the commission of the offense, but a little over that age at the time he gave evidence, and was the only eye witness offered, and his evidence was objected to on the ground of physical infirmities, and of his being wholly uneducated in the deaf and dumb language, the mother of the child testifying to such want of education, but stating that she could make herself understood to the child by signs, and that generally she could understand the child, the court held, it appearing from the testimony given by the mother that the only knowledge of what the child said was inferential, based upon a familiarity with the signs and gestures, no exact mode of conversation existing between them, and that the child had no intelligent idea of the sanctity of an oath, and that its nature could not be explained to him, or the consequences of telling a falsehood made known to him, that his evidence ought not to have been taken in the court below, as he was not a competent witness in a capital charge. Territory v. Duran, 3 N. M. 124.

In the above case, however, Bristol, J., dissented, holding that if he could not be considered competent as an ordinary witness because he could not be communicated with and made to understand the legal and technical obligation of an therefrom sundry articles mentioned in the indictment, of a value exceeding $20. The jury having found both defendants guilty, they appeal upon the following grounds: "(1) Because his honor erred in admitting the note purporting to have been written by Wash. Weldon to Henry Prescott, without any proof that it had been written by Wash. Weldon or received by Henry Prescott. (2) Because his honor erred in admitting testimony of a separate and distinct offense, said to have been committed by the defendant Wash. Weldon some time before the offense charged in the indictment. (3) Because his honor erred in admitting the testimony of an uninstructed deaf mute without expert testimony as to his competency."

As to the first ground of appeal, the facts, as gathered from the "case," appear to be as follows: On the morning after the store had been broken into, the prosecutor, D. A. Outlaw, picked up from the floor of the store a piece of paper, purporting to be a note written by the defendant Weldon to his codefendant, Prescott, dated on the 20th December, 1892 (the day on which the testimony showed the store to have been robbed,) in which the former proposed to the latter to join him in robbing the store. When this note was first offered in evidence the circuit judge declined to receive it; suggesting to the solicitor that he had better offer some evidence of the handwriting, but saying that he would not then make any ruling upon the point, but would wait until further testimony was adduced. Subsequently a fellow prisoner with defendants testified that he heard a conversation in the jail between the two defendants, in which Weldon said to Prescott "that if he had come when he got that note, they could have gotten away with the goods before being caught. Then answered Mr. Henry Prescott that he did not have anything to do with the goods." The witness further stated that the note referred to "was a note that Wash. Weldon said that he wrote to Henry Prescott for him to oath, yet it ought to be received as circumstantial evidence, proven by his mother who understood his signs, in precisely the same manner as tracks for a trail leading to identification of the murderers, might be proven.

The English cases follow the same doctrine.

In Bartholomew v. George, decided by Lord Campbell at the Kent spring assizes, 1861, Ms., cited in note to Best on Evidence, vol. 1, page 226, Morgan's edition, the prosecutor was deaf and dumb, but was able to write, and letters written by her were allowed in evidence, her examination in court being carried on by signs when understood, and by writing when not understood.

So in Martin's Case, Allison's Pr. Crim. Law of Scotland, 488, a deaf and dumb person, who understood the nature and obligation of an oath, and the duty of speaking the truth, was allowed to testify by means of signs, in the science of which she had been instructed.

And in Ruston's Case, 1 Leach, C. C. 408, where a person deaf and dumb from his birth was offered as a witness for the prosecution, on an information for grand larceny, and his sister was examined on the voir dire, she and her brother understanding each other by means of signs and motions, which time and necessity had invented between them, although such signs and motions were not significant of letters, syllables, words, or sentences but were expressive of general propositions and entire conception of the mind, the subject of conversation between them being generally about domestic concerns and familiar occurrences in life, the witness believing that the brother had a perfect knowledge of the tenets of Christianity, and that she could communicate true notions of the moral and religious nature of an oath, and of the temporal danger of perjury,—the court allowed such witness to be sworn and to give evidence in the cause, the witness being sworn to depose the truth and his sister "well and truly to interpret" the questions and demands of the court and his answers.

In Steel's Case, 1 Leach, C. C. 452, the prisoner was mute by the visitation of God, and it was held that such fact was not an absolute bar to her being tried for felony; a person surdus et mutus a natiuitate, was, in contemplation of law, incapable of guilt upon the presumption of idiotism, yet that such presumption might be repelled by evidence of capacity to understand by signs and tokens.

Where the party was deaf and dumb, but, except the mind was in that sense dull, perhaps more so than the minds of persons who were afflicted with such calamities generally are, but not in any degree unsound, it was stated to be clearly the law that the presumption was always in favor of sanity, and that there was no exception to the rule in the case of a deaf and dumb person, the onus of proving such unsoundness resting on those disputing such sanity, and that there was nothing to lead to the conclusion that deaf and dumb persons were generally of unsound mind, the numerous asylums in which such persons find a refuge furnishing abundant instances to the contrary. Harrod v. Harrod, 1 Kay & J. 8.

So, in Morrison v. Lennard, 3 Carr. & P. 127, the mode of examining a witness, deaf and dumb, by means of signs made with the fingers, was held to be receivable, even in capital cases, but the court inclined to the opinion that where such a witness could write, it would be better for him to communicate his answer to the question in that manner.

In Rex v. Pritchard, 7 Carr. & P. 308, where the prisoner was tried on a capital felony, the court instructed the jury that if they thought that there was no certain mode of communicating the details of the trial to the prisoner, so that he could understand them and be able to make a proper defense to the charge, they ought to find that he was not of sound mind, and that it was not known that he had a general capacity of communicating on ordinary matters.

In Dyson's Case, 1 Lewin, C. C. 64, the prisoner, a deaf and dumb girl, was indicted for murder, and the court instructed the jury that they were impaneled to try whether the prisoner was sane, not whether she was at that moment laboring under lunacy, but whether she had at that time sufficient reason to understand the nature of the proceedings, so as to be able to conduct her defense with discretion.

In Thompson's Case, 3 Leach, C. C. 137, the prisoner was indicted for horse stealing, and upon an arraignment stood mute. The jury were sworn to try whether he was mute by malice, or by the visitation of God. It appearing to the court that he was able to read, the indictment was handed to him, when he wrote down not guilty upon a piece of paper, and also wrote down, in answer to questions, that he had no objection to the jury, the judge's note of the evidence being handed to him after the examination of each witness, and he was asked in writing whether he had any questions to put to the evidence.

come and assist him carry off some goods." After this and other testimony, not relating to the note in question, had been adduced, the solicitor again offered the note in evidence, saying that he could not prove the handwriting, and upon objection the court ruled as follows: "I will allow it to be read. I will allow it read as a circumstance. It will be read as a paper found in the store the morning after the robbery." The note was then read, of which the following is a literal copy, preserving the misspelling and want of any punctuation marks: "Mister henry prescut I dos want u to meett me att old Outlaw store hee is gone to belo Sumter ann wee wold hav itt oll our wa henry Span will go into wid uss I woud had u wid uss befour but I dint no u wuod like it now u meett mee dar shour and we will had it all rite dount lett no body see dis. I will be dar sure—Wash Weldon. too mister henry prescut. December 20, 1892." While we think there was enough in the testimony to justify the admission of the note as evidence against the defendant Weldon, who was shown by the testimony to have written such a note as that offered in evidence, we are unable to discover any testimony which in any way connects the defendant Prescott with the note. On the contrary, he seems to have denied any connection with the matter when he was upbraided by the other defendant in the conversation in jail. It seems to us that it would be a dangerous doctrine to hold that, simply because a note purporting to be addressed to a third person was picked up in a store on the morning after such store was robbed, it would constitute even a circumstance tending to show that the person to whom the note purported to be addressed was implicated in the robbery, for such a doctrine would put it in the power of a malignant person to implicate the most innocent individual in a crime. It seems to us, therefore, that, while the note was properly received as evidence against Weldon, it was incompetent evidence as against Prescott, in the absence of any testimony tending to connect him with the note. For this reason we think the defendant Prescott is entitled to a new trial.

Coming, then, to the second ground of appeal, it appears from the "case" that the prosecutor, when on the stand, testified that, owing to the fact that his store had been previously broken into, he had taken special precautions to fasten up his store securely, as he supposed, on the day before the robbery was committed for which these defendants were indicted, but he then said nothing as to who had committed the previous robberies. Subsequently, however, he was permitted to testify, against the objection of counsel for the defendants, that the defendant Weldon admitted to the prosecutor that he had previously robbed the store while he was in the employment of the prosecutor, for which he was discharged. While it is quite true that the general rule is that, where a person is on trial for one offense, it is not competent to receive evidence tending to show that he had previously committed other offenses, even of the same character, yet there are exceptions to this rule; and, where the evidence tends to show that the series of offenses are so connected together as practically to constitute a continuous transaction, then it is competent to receive evidence of such continuous offenses. See Whart. Crim. Ev. § 81 et seq.; Reg. v. Cobden, 3 Fost. & F. 838; Reg. v. Rearden, 4 Fost. & F. 76. See also State v. Robinson, 35 S. C. 340.

Now, in view of the fact that Weldon had been discharged from the service of the prosecutor, Outlaw, on account of these previous robberies, and especially in view of the fact that he had declared "that he did not intend to work and that if he did not make his support out of old Outlaw, he would make it out of somebody else," we are not prepared to say that the evidence objected to was incompetent as against Weldon.

The third ground of appeal cannot be sustained. In Wharton, Criminal Evidence, § 875, it is said: "Deaf and dumb persons were formerly regarded as idiots, and, therefore, incompetent to testify; but the modern doctrine is that if they are of sufficient understanding, and know the nature of an oath, they may give evidence, either by signs, or through an interpreter, or in writing. A deaf mute may be permitted to express himself in writing, if this be the mode in which he can be better understood, or through a sworn interpreter, by whom his signs can be interpreted. Such interpretation is not hearsay, nor is it excluded by the fact that the witness can write." See also 5 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 121, where the rule is thus stated: "Deaf and dumb persons may be witnesses if any person can be found who can interpret their signs to the court and jury upon oath, or if they can write and read writing, so that the questions and answers may be conveyed in writing." These authors seem to be well sustained by the cases which they cite. See especially Ruston's Case, 1 Leach, O. C. 408, where a deaf mute was examined as a witness in a case of larceny through his sister, as interpreter, who had acquired the facility of communicating with the witness by signs. None of the cases, so far as we have examined, require what is called expert testimony, but all of them recognize the doctrine that any person who is able to communicate with the deaf mute by signs may be sworn as an interpreter. In this case two witnesses were sworn as interpreters,—one the prosecutor, and the other a disinterested third person,—both of whom testified that they at different times had had the deaf mute in their employment, that he was very intelligent, and that they had but little difficulty in communicating with him by signs. It seems to us clear, therefore, that there was no error in receiving the testimony of the deaf mute through the medium of an interpreter.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court as against the defendant Wash. Weldon be affirmed, but as against the defendant Henry Prescott that it be reversed, and that the case be remanded to the Circuit Court for a new trial so far as said Henry Prescott is concerned.

*1. The establishment of a uniform rule by the commissioners acting under the act of congress for the collection of direct taxes that they would receive such taxes from no one but the owner of the land in person, avoids a sale by said commissioners under such proceedings, and a tender of the taxes was made unnecessary by such a rule.

2. The possession necessary to confer title under an adverse holding must be actual, continuous, and adverse to the legal title for the statutory period to bar the suit, and the adverse possessor must not yield or surrender his possession under the pressure of any legal procedure instituted to oust him, which he can successfully resist, and if he does so, and an entry adverse to him is made, the continuity of his possession will be broken. Contra, as to adverse possession interrupted by force or violence and promptly regained by legal methods. *Townsend v. 3. At common law the death of a sole plaintiff in real actions before judgment abated the suit, and such actions can only be revived in the name of the heir-at-law in whose favor a new cause of action arises upon the death of the ancestor, by legislative authority.

4. The Act of November, 1888 ( § 77, p. 330, McClal. APPPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for St. Johns County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Reversed.

Statement by MABRY, J.:

A suit of ejectment was instituted on the 3d day of January, 1876, in the circuit court for St. Johns county by James M. Gould, for the use of Jacob Vanderpool, against Henry and Wiley Jenkins to recover possession of a certain described lot of land situated in the city of St. Augustine in said county.

The plea of not guilty, and also a further plea that neither the plaintiff, his ancestor, predecessor, nor grantor had been seised or possessed of the premises in question within seven years before the commencement of the suit, were filed by the named defendants on the rule-day in March, 1876, and no further proceedings were had in the case till February, 1889. Notice was served on counsel for defendants on the 16th day of February, 1889, that application would be made to the circuit judge on the 25th day of that month for an order making Geo. B. Vanderpool administrator of the estate of Jacob Vanderpool, deceased, and Rutledge Gould, Edward Gould, James Gould, Hester Flynt, Sarah Gould, and Lydia Gould heirs-at-law of James M. Gould, deceased, plaintiffs in said suit upon the suggestion of the deaths of the original plaintiffs. An order was made on the 26th of the same month reciting that the deaths of James M. Gould and Jacob Vanderpool had been suggested, and that certified copy of the letters of administration granted to Geo. B. Vanderpool on the estate of Jacob Vanderpool, deceased, had been filed, and directing that the said heirs-at-law of James M. Gould, deceased, be made parties-plaintiffs in the suit in place of the said deceased Gould, and that Geo. B. Vanderpool, administrator, be made party plaintiff in place of Jacob Vanderpool, deceased.

Subsequently the cause was referred to John C. Cooper, Esq., an attorney at law, as referee for trial, and the following agreement in writing signed by counsel for plaintiffs and defendants was filed in the case with the referee, viz.:

"In Circuit Court—St. John's County.

"Rutledge Gould et al., for use of Geo. B. Vanderpool, Admr., etc.

Stipulation of parties.

vs.
Henry Jenkins, Wiley Jenkins,
Henry Emmerly and John T.
Carr, Executors, etc., of the estate of Delphi Emmerly.

"It is hereby stipulated and agreed by the parties to the above action as follows, to wit:

"First. That the lands and premises in controversy in said action were sold in December, A. D. 1863, for taxes under the direct tax laws of the United States of America then in force; that at said sale James W. Allen became the purchaser, to whom a certificate of purchase was issued by the tax commissioners under said laws, and that on or about January 4, 1864, the said James W. Allen, for value received, assigned and transferred such certificate to one Edmund Hill, who was at once admitted to the possession of the said lands and premises by the said Allen. This admission shall not prejudice the plaintiffs from making proof of any fact or facts that will impeach the validity of such sale.

"Second. That Edmund Hill on or about the sixteenth of April, A. D. 1881, being then in full possession, executed and delivered to Delphi Emmerly, his daughter, a deed of conveyance of the said lands and premises whereby all the right, title, interest, and estate of said writ was based is reversed and the premises restored subsequently, seems to be one of first impression.

Hill in said lands were conveyed to said Emmerly; that under such conveyance the said Emmerly was let into the possession of said lands and premises and held the possession thereof until she died, to wit: 16th day of February, 1886.

"Third. That on the 22d day of December, 1885, Delphi Emmerly duly executed her last will and testament, whereby she devised the said lands and premises to her two children, Edward M. Thomas and E. M. Emmerly; that by said will the defendants, Henry M. Emmerly and John T. Carr, were duly appointed executors thereof, and that they duly qualified as such executors on the — day of —, A. D. 1886, and thereupon entered upon the discharge of their duties as such executors; that said will was duly admitted to probate in the proper office and was properly executed.

"Fourth. That Edmund Hill died before the death of the said Delphi Emmerly.

"Sixth. That the plaintiffs who sue for the use of Geo. B. Vanderpool, as administrator of Jacob Vanderpool, are the lawful heirs-at-law of James M. Gould, and that on and prior to December 21st, 1863, the said James M. Gould was lawfully in possession of the said land and premises under a valid claim of title as sole heir of Elias B. Gould, deceased.

"Seventh. That James M. Gould and Jacob Vanderpool are dead, and that Geo. B. Vanderpool is the duly constituted administrator of the estate of the said Jacob Vanderpool, deceased.

"Eighth. That on or about the 18th day of March, A. D. 1870, the said James M. Gould executed and delivered to Jacob Vanderpool a deed of conveyance of said lands and premises, and that at the time of the execution and delivery of said deed Edmund Hill was in the possession of the said lands and premises, claiming adversely and in hostility to the title of the said James M. Gould, conveyed all his right, title, and interest in the lands to said Vanderpool.

"Ninth. That John T. Carr and Henry M. Emmerly, as executors, etc., shall duly appear and be made parties defendants to said action before the trial thereof."

In compliance with the stipulation, Henry M. Emmerly and John T. Carr, as executors of the will of Delphi Emmerly, deceased, appeared and filed a plea of not guilty.

The second plea of the defendants, Henry and Wiley Jenkins, setting up the statute of limitations, was stricken out by the referee on motion of plaintiffs, on the ground that such defense could be proven under the general issue, and upon final hearing judgment was rendered in favor of defendants. Plaintiffs appealed to this court.

The other facts necessary to be stated will appear in the opinion of the court.*

*The following is the report and finding of the referee from the decree in accordance with which the appeal was taken:

This is an action of ejectment for a lot of land in the city of St. Augustine, Florida. The facts as to the title to the property are as follows:

Up to December, 1863, James M. Gould was seized and possessed in fee of said property. In December, 1863, an attempted sale was had of said property for the non-payment of United States direct taxes to one James W. Allen, and the said Allen, 24 L. R. A.

Messrs. B. C. Rude and W. W. Dewhurst, for appellants:

The Statute of February 27, 1872, was only intended to bar those who, being entitled to maintain an action, neglect to bring it.

Branch v. Cole, 18 Fla. 877; Spencer v. McBride, 14 Fla. 408; Wade v. Doyle, 17 Fla. 522.

Since Gould was not entitled to maintain an action against Hill, or any one in privity with him when the Act of February 27, 1872, was passed, the bar of that statute does not affect him or his heirs.

Angell, Limitations, § 370; Thompson v. Proche, 44 Cal. 508; Hari v. Bostwick, 14 Fla. 176; School District No. 3 of Thompson v. Lynch, 88 Conn. 334; Jackson v. Schoonmaker, 4 Johns. 390.

There must be a continuous possession for seven years.

Wood, Lim. Act. p. 575, and note 5, p. 571, and note 1; Sedg. & W. Trial of Title to Lands, §§ 787-748; Bishop v. Truitt, 85 Ala. 376; Ross v. Goodwin, 88 Ala. 390; Seymour v. Crenwell, 18 Fla. 29.

The plaintiffs in this suit are and were the owners in fee of the lands in question by a strictly legal title. Therefore they are conclusively presumed to have been in the possession thereof at all times when no actual adverse and hostile possession is shown in some one else.

McClell. Dig. p. 781, § 4; Levy v. Cox, 28 Fla. 546; Doe v. Butler, 3 Wend. 149.

Even if in any way Hill and Vanderpool could be considered as together occupying the lands from 1871 to 1875, yet the presumption in favor of the legal title of Gould whose deed Vanderpool held, would carry the exclusive possession and seizure to Vanderpool.

Wood, Lim. Act. § 261, note 2.

It necessarily follows that to make good the defense of the statute of limitations, the defendants must show affirmatively a continuous, open, unequivocal, notorious, and hostile possession for seven years.

Wood, Lim. Act. § 258, note 1, § 269 and note 3, p. 578, and cases there cited; Thomp. Trials, § 1410; Ross v. Goodwin, 88 Ala. 390; Holliday v. Oromwell, 87 Tex. 487; Stephens v. Leach, 19 Pa. 265; Doyle v. Wade, 23 Fla. 90; Caro v. Pensacola City Co. 19 Fla. 766; Sedg. & W. Trial of Title to Lands, §§ 738, 757, and cases cited; San Francisco v. Fulde, 87 Cal. 858, 99 Am. Dec. 278; Armstrong v. Morrill, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 146, 20 L. ed. 772.

In this case not only was Hill shown out of possession from 1871 to 1875, but Jacob Vanderpool was shown in possession. This fact alone would break the continuity of Hill's possession for James M. Gould, the ancestor of the present plaintiffs being shown the then legal owner of the legal title, Vanderpool's possession is presumed to have been in subordination to Gould's title.

January 5, 1864, conveyed the said lot to one Edmund Hill who together with his wife and his daughter Delphi (afterwards married to an Emmerly), and known on the record as Delphi Emmerly, went into immediate possession of the said property; that on the 18th of March, 1870, James M. Gould executed a deed of all his interest in said lot to Jacob Vanderpool, while Hill and Delphi Emmerly were in adverse possession of the property. That about the 7th day of December, 1870, Jacob Vanderpool commenced an action of eject-

Add to this that it expressly appears that Hill was by legal process dispossessed by Vanderpool by virtue of a hostile and paramount title, held or claimed by Vanderpool, and the possibility that Vanderpool held under Hill, is absolutely excluded.

Bishop v. Truitt, 85 Ala. 376; Walt, Act. & Def. Supp., pp. 505, 506; Sedgw. & W. Trial of Title to Lands, §§ 737-743, 745.

Every presumption being in favor of the legal title, when that is shown in Gould, every presumption is against Hill.

Even if Hill had held the legal title and Vanderpool had by fraud, deceit, force, or other illegal means, obtained the actual possession of said lands, hostile to Hill, it would be an adverse possession to Hill and could not be construed for Hill.

How much more clear is it that the possession against Edmund Hill by filing a complaint, but service perfected by publication for six weeks thereafter to recover possession of said property, and on the 25th of October, 1871, obtained judgment in said suit, and on the 30th of October, 1871, was put in possession of said property, upon a writ of possession upon said judgment. That on May 5, 1875, at the term of the supreme court of the state of Florida, the said judgment in favor of said Vanderpool was reversed and set aside, and on the 9th day of June, 1875, said Hill and said Delphi Emmerly and her mother were restored to the possession of said lot; that on the 23d day of September, 1875, the plaintiff in the suit of Jacob Vanderpool v. Edmund Hill took a nonsuit. That on the 3d day of January, 1876, the suit of James M. Gould for the use of Jacob Vanderpool against Henry Jenkins and Wiley Jenkins, tenants of the said lot, was commenced, service being had on Henry Jenkins January 8, 1876, and Wiley Jenkins January 26, 1876. That on the 16th of April, 1881, Edmund Hill executed to Delphi Emmerly, his daughter, a deed of said lot, and she continued in possession of said property up to her death, on the 16th of February, 1889, and the defendants Henry Emmerly and John T. Carr are the duly qualified executors of the last will of said Delphi Emmerly, deceased. That on the 28th day of February, 1889, an order was made by the judge of the circuit court, St. Johns county, Fla., substituting the present plaintiffs the heirs of James M. Gould for the use of George B. Vanderpool as administrator of estate of Jacob Vanderpool, deceased, as plaintiff in this cause for the original plaintiff James M. Gould for the use of Jacob Vanderpool, against Henry Jenkins et al. That the defendant Henry Emmerly and John T. Carr as executors of Delphi Emmerly by their attorney came in and were made parties defendant as the landlords of said Henry Jenkins and Wiley Jenkins claiming the said Jenkins to have been tenants of Delphi Emmerly.

James M. Gould died on the 4th of February, 1876, and Jacob Vanderpool died before February, 1889, and Geo. B. Vanderpool is his administrator. Edmund Hill died previous to the death of Delphi Emmerly, but after the execution of the said deed from him to Delphi Emmerly to this lot. This statement of facts enables us now to consider the question of title and possession of the property.

The legal title was in James M. Gould in December, 1863, and I find that as a matter of law it was not divested by the attempted sale for non-payment of United States direct taxes, upon the ground that a tender was made of the taxes and refused, and that the United States direct tax commissioners established a rule contrary to law that they would not receive the taxes except from the owner, which rule under the circumstances relieved the owner from making any tender of the taxes.

I also find that the title of Gould was transferred to Jacob Vanderpool. In reference to the possession and right of possession of the property the main question to be decided is as to the effect of the possession of Jacob Vanderpool from the 30th of October, 1871, to 9th day of June, 1875, upon the continuity of possession of Edmund Hill and Delphi Emmerly, defendants' testatrix.

The evidence establishes that Edmund Hill and those claiming under him were in possession of this property from January, 1864, up to the 30th of October, 1871, when they were put out of possession under a writ on the case of Jacob Vanderpool v. Edmund Hill and after the reversal of the judgment in this case possession was restored to them on or about the 9th of June, 1875.

The reversal of the judgment in this cause in effect decided that the judgment and writ under which Hill was ejected was illegal, and that he ought never to have been put out of possession, and, therefore, in my opinion the continuity of his possession was not broken, in the eye of the law, by this illegal action.

The statute of limitations of the state has been held to have been suspended from 1861 up to the passage of the Act approved February 23, 1872, Fla. Laws, chap. 1899. That under section 19 of that act all actions which would be barred in sixty days after the passage thereof, became affected by the limitation of that act, and barred within six months after the date of the approval of the act. There can be no doubt that, but for the illegal dispossession of Hill by Vanderpool, any action brought by Gould against Hill must have been brought within six months from the date of the Act of February 27, 1872, because Hill's possession commenced January, 1864, and at the time of the passage of the act of February 27, 1872, Hill and those claiming under him had been in adverse possession more than seven years.

Under this state of facts the judgment in favor of Vanderpool and against Hill having been reversed, Hill and those claiming under him ought not to be prejudiced or lose any of their rights on account of this illegal judgment, or of Vanderpool's possession.

Therefore, the suit of James M. Gould for the use of Jacob Vanderpool ought to have been brought against Hill or those claiming under him within six months from the passage of the act of February 27, 1872, and in my opinion it makes no difference that at the time Vanderpool was in possession of the property.

Certainly after Hill and those claiming under him were put back in possession of the property on the 9th day of June, 1875, the suit of Gould, commenced thereafter, should have been commenced within six months after the change of possession, which was not done.

The suit of Gould for use of Vanderpool v. Jenkins et al. was not commenced until the 3d of January, 1876, more than six months from date of Hill's being put back into possession.

Gould died on the 4th day of February, 1878, and no attempt was made to revive the suit or substitute parties plaintiff until the 26th day of February, 1889. We have here then a case in which the parties defendant and those claiming under them have been in adverse possession of this property since January, 1864, up to the time of this trial, with the exception of the time Vanderpool was on the premises, under an improper and illegal proceeding, and to my mind it would be destroying the salutary effects of the statute of limitations to allow the plaintiffs in this case to recover by brushing aside all of this adverse possession, for the supposed technical reasons suggested by the plaintiffs, which reasons do not seem to me of substance or true in law.

It is unnecessary to go into the question of the time and manner of substituting parties plaintiff in this suit. I hold that Gould and those claiming under him were barred of their right of recovery before the present parties plaintiff were substituted and I therefore find for the defendants.

It is considered and adjudged the plaintiff takes nothing by his said suit and that defendants go hence without day and recover of plaintiffs their costs in this suit to be taxed by the clerk of this court, including costs before the referee a statement of which is hereto appended, and that the clerk of said court enter formal judgment to the same effect.

sion of Vanderpool, acquired even illegally, but under the legal title, cannot be construed for Hill, but is adverse to him and breaks the continuity of the possession.

To make the possession of several successive occupants a continuous adverse possession a privity of estate must be shown between such occupants. In this case not a privity, but a direct hostility was shown.

During these six years Hill had a remedy as effectual as would be ejectment or forcible entry proceedings in an ordinary case. As soon as Vanderpool got judgment against Hill, Hill could have stayed the execution of the judgment and kept possession of the place, by giving the usual supersedeas bond. He did not see fit to do so.

His failure to take the remedy provided by law to keep his possessions was his own fault.

An entry under a writ of possession issued on a judgment in ejectment does give an adverse possession—adverse to the defendant in such judgment.

Hill should not be permitted to escape the consequences of his neglect of the proper remedy by counting Vanderpool's possession of his own, and thus robbing us of three years to assert our rights which, during that three years we were unable to assert, on account of that very omission.

Hill's possession being without any title, should not be helped out by construction.

Farmer v. Balava, 11 Ala. 1028; Townsend v. Edwards, 25 Fla. 582.

A judgment of reversal was within one year from time when suit by J. M. Gould was brought; second suit was brought within time under sections 16 or 21 of Act of February 27, 1872. First suit was by Vanderpool; he took a nonsuit at second trial. Second suit brought by Gould neither of sections applies.

Doyle v. Wade, 23 Fla. 90.

Vanderpool must abide by his erroneous view of law.

Angell, Limitations, § 328, note, p. 346.

Neither section 16 nor section 21 applies, except when reversal is on such grounds that he cannot proceed to another trial in that suit, but must institute a new one.

Angell, Limitations, § 328, note, p. 344.

Gould should have brought his suit within six months after Hill was restored to possession.

The heirs of Gould (the appellant) were made the sole plaintiffs (not co-plaintiffs) by order of judge, February 26, 1889.

Such order did not operate to revive the suit but was in effect a new suit.

Macker v. Thomas, 20 U. S. 7 Wheat. 530, 5 L. ed. 515; Green v. Watkins, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 260, 5 L. ed. 256.

On death of sole plaintiff suit abates and can only be revived in the mode pointed out by statute and rules of court, that is by his administrator who is his legal representative.

McClel. Dig. 830, § 77, p. 629, § 74, Rules No. 35; Brett v. Ming, 1 Fla. 495.

Rules 87, 94, 95, have no application, for the reason that it is the death of a sole plaintiff, and Rule 35 provides for such a case. In such a case suit cannot be revived against an heir, much less by an heir, and if the heir is made a party without objection, and judgment rendered against him, he may reverse it for that error, although the point is not made in court below.

Macker v. Thomas, supra.

Suit having abated a new suit against the heirs was necessary.

Heirs have no title or cause of action until death of ancestor and then a new cause of action springs up.

S. 6 Pet. 124, 8 L. ed. 342, declaration amended by adding new counts making heirs of ancestor through whom plaintiff claimed defendant's lessor (a fictitious pleading), and it was held as to this amendment it was a new suit and statute ran in favor of defendant to date of amendment.

Under an amendment making new parties the statute runs to date of such amendment. Miller v. McIntyre, 81 U. S. 6 Pet. 61, 8 L. ed. 320; Alexander v. Pendleton, 12 U. S. 8 Cranch, 462, 8 L. ed. 624.

Mabry, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears from the admitted facts and the testimony in this case that James M. Gould, as sole heir of Elias Gould, deceased, was rightful owner and in possession of the lot of land in question on the 21st day of December, 1868, and that the lot was sold in that month under the direct tax laws of the United States to James W. Allen, who received a certificate of purchase from the tax commissioners, and in January, 1864, conveyed the lot to Edmund Hill. Hill immediately took possession of the lot under his purchase from Allen and remained in possession until the 80th day of October, 1871, when he was dispossessed by the sheriff of St. Johns county by virtue of a writ of possession based upon a judgment in ejectment for the possession of said lot, rendered on the 25th day of that month in favor of Jacob Vanderpool, and against Hill. Vanderpool's action of ejectment was based upon a deed of conveyance of the lot to him from James M. Gould, bearing date March 18, 1870, but it is conceded that at the time of Gould's conveyance to Vanderpool, Hill was in the actual adverse and hostile possession of the lot. After Vanderpool had been put into possession, which, it appears was five days after the rendition of the judgment in ejectment, Hill prosecuted an appeal to this court and succeeded in having the judgment reversed and a new trial awarded. Hill v. Vanderpool, 15 Fla. 128. After the reversal of the judgment Hill was restored to the possession of the lot on the 9th day of June, 1875, by virtue of a writ of restitution issued by the circuit judge to the sheriff and Hill, and those claiming under him and his title have been in possession ever since.

On September 22d, 1875, Jacob Vanderpool entered a nonsuit in his ejectment action against Hill, and on the 3d day of January, 1876, suit of ejectment was commenced for the possession of the lot in the name of James M. Gould for the use of Jacob Vanderpool, against Henry and Wiley Jenkins, and out of this suit has grown the proceedings now before us. Pleas were filed for Henry and Wiley Jenkins in March, 1876. James M. Gould died on the 4th day of February, 1878. Jacob Vanderpool died some time between 1876 and April, 1888, and the proceedings to revive the suit in the names of the heirs-at-law of Gould and the administrator of Vanderpool, as shown by the statement herewith filed, were had in February, 1889.

Hill conveyed the lot in 1881 to Delphi, his only child, who first married Thomas, and after his death, H. M. Emmerly, and she died in February, 1886, leaving a will in which John T. Carr and H. H. Emmerly are named executors. Hill died between 1881 and 1885, and during the lifetime of his daughter Delphi.

The tax sale to Allen in 1868, under the direct tax proceedings, was void. If it cannot be affirmed on the testimony before us that a tender of the taxes assessed on the lot of land and for which it was sold, had been made before sale, it is clearly shown, we think, that the tax commissioners, or a majority of them, before the sale was made, established a uniform rule that they would receive the taxes assessed on property in the city of St. Augustine from no one but the owner in person, and that where such owner was in the confederate lines he was required to appear in person and pay his own taxes. Under the decision of United States v. Lee, 106 U. S. 196, 27 L. ed. 171, and authorities there cited, the tax sale in question was void. This point is not much insisted on by counsel for appellees, but the main reliance for an affirmance of the judgment is placed upon adverse possession of the lot by Hill and those claiming under him for the statutory period to bar the suit.

The principal contentions for appellee are, first, that Hill's possession was not interrupted in consequence of his dispossession from October, 1871, to June, 1875, by virtue of the writ issued on the Jacob Vanderpool judgment subsequently reversed; and, second, should this not be correct, the proceedings in the names of the heirs of James M. Gould, deceased, cannot be regarded as a revivor of the suit commenced by said decedent, but must be considered as a new suit by the heirs from the time they were made parties plaintiffs, and that the statute of limitations will run against them from the death of their ancestor up to the commencement of their suit. An examination of the testimony has satisfied us that the possession of Hill from January, 1864, up to the time he was dispossessed in 1871 was adverse and that his possession after his restoration in 1875, as well as the possession of those claiming under him since, has been adverse and hostile to both Gould and Vanderpool and all others, and will sustain a claim of title by adverse possession if the limitations of the statute as to time have been fully met. If Hill's possession was not broken by his dispossession in 1871, and he and those claiming under him must be considered as still in possession from that time on, it is clear that the action commenced by Gould in January, 1876, was barred. The statute of limitations of 1872 went into effect on the 27th day of February of that year, and the action against Hill, if we consider him as remaining in possession, would have been barred in six months from the approval of the act. Spencer v. McBride, 14 Fla. 408; Wade v. Doyle, 17 Fla. 522. If Hill's dispossession operated to break his adverse holding, then it commenced anew from the time he was restored to possession in 1875. Suit was not brought by Gould within six months from the approval of the act, and hence the necessity of deciding the effect of Hill's dislodgment under the ejectment suit instituted by Vanderpool. The deed from Gould to Vanderpool in 1870 was void as to Hill for the reason that the latter was then in adverse possession of the lot. Levy v. Coc, 22 Fla. 546; Edwards v. Parkhurst, 21 Vt. 473; Hamilton v. Wright, 37 N. Y. 502; Betsey v. Torrance, 84 Miss. 132. The case was not reversed in this court on this account, but the facts stated are admitted, and Vanderpool realizing his situation, entered a nonsuit. The character of adverse possession essential to give title to land has been several times considered by this court, but the facts of the cases considered did not necessitate a decision of the point now presented. Wade v. Doyle, supra;

Seymour v. Crenwell, 18 Fla. 29; Townsend v. Edwards, 25 Fla. 582, and Watrous v. Morrison, 33 Fla. 261.

It is said in Townsend v. Edwards, in speaking of adverse possession: "If interrupted, even by fraud or force, and the possession be recovered by a peaceable or forcible entry, or by process of law, the continuity is broken, and the statute begins to run only from the time of the re-entry." This, however, was said in argument, as will be seen by an examination of the case, its facts not calling for a decision of the point. In Missouri it has been decided that a forcible entry by the owner upon an actual adverse possession of another does not interrupt such possession, if an action for the forcible entry is commenced within a reasonable time and prosecuted to a successful termination. Ferguson v. Bartholomew, 67 Mo. 212; Carr v. Edmonds, 71 Mo. 523. In a case in Ohio it appeared that the adverse claimant improved a part of the tract and continuously occupied it by tenants from the spring of the year 1845 to the winter of 1863-64, when the house on the place was torn down by neighbors on account of objectionable tenants placed on the land, and the material of the building was moved away by the tenants early in 1864. About the same time most of the fencing was stolen, and the greater part of the cleared land was common. It also appeared that from the time the house was pulled down to the spring of 1865 no tenant actually resided on the land, but during that time the claimant, through his agent, continued to pay taxes and to exercise all other acts of ownership and control that was possible under the circumstances. No intention of abandoning the property was entertained, nor was any adverse entry or claim made. It was said by the court that no principle of law or equity would make such acts of lawlessness inure to the advantage of the plaintiffs. Clark v. Potter, 82 Ohio St. 49. Decisions in Alabama affirm that the forcible interruption by a naked trespasser redressed by legal remedies will not, as to him, avail to break the continuity of an adverse possession. Ladd v. Dubroca, 61 Ala. 25; Beard v. Ryan, 78 Ala. 87. In harmony with the views expressed in the decisions referred to is an able opinion of Judge Dillon in the case of Pella v. Schotte, 24 Iowa, 283, 95 Am. Dec. 729. No one, it would seem, should be allowed to avail himself of the advantage of the law which he has gained by its violation. But Vanderpool did not oust Hill by force. He was turned out by virtue of a writ of possession based upon a judgment in ejectment, subsequently reversed, it is true, and afterwards the suit discontinued. It is insisted that before such ouster can be considered as a break of Hill's possession it must be shown that the suit was successfully prosecuted and resulted finally in a change of possession. There is authority for the position that a judgment in ejectment establishes simply the right of plaintiff to the possession of the land sued for, and unless it is followed by entry into possession, either by writ of possession, or without it with the 24 L. R. A.

consent, surrender, or abandonment of defendant, such judgment can have no effect on defendant's continued and uninterrupted adverse possession for the prescriptive period. Doe v. Stevens, 1 Houst. (Del.) 240; Jackson v. Haviland, 13 Johns. 229; Carpenter v. Natoma Water & Min. Co. 68 Cal. 616; Smith v. Trabue, 1 McLean, 87; Doe v. Reynolds, 27 Ala. 864. There are decisions to the contrary. There was no ultimate recovery by Vanderpool in his suit, and the possession which he gained on the judgment in the trial court was restored to Hill, but there was an actual possession by Vanderpool from October, 1871, to June, 1875. Counsel have not cited, nor have we been able to find, a direct adjudication as to the effect of such a possession on the adverse claim of an occupant. The statute declares that in actions of the character of this one, the person establishing a legal title to the premises shall be presumed to have been possessed thereof within the time prescribed by law, and the occupation of such premises by any other person shall be deemed to have been under and in subordination to the legal title, unless it appear that such premises have been held and possessed adversely to such legal title for seven years before the commencement of such action. There is here a clear requirement of a continuity of possession on the part of the adverse claimant. It is said in Groff v. Weakland, 84 Pa. 304, that if there be one element more distinctly material than another in conferring title where all requisites are so, it is the existence of a continuous adverse possession for the statutory period. The adverse claimant must "keep his flag flying, and present a hostile front to adverse pretensions." Stephens v. Leach, 19 Pa. 262. The rule is stated in Cors v. Faupel, 24 W. Va. 238, as follows, viz.: "Upon every discontinuance of the possession of the wrongdoer, the possession of the rightful owner is, by operation of law, restored, and nothing short of an actual adverse and continuous possession for the statutory period can destroy his right or vest title in the wrongdoer. . . . He must show that such adverse possession has been continued, consecutive, and unbroken for the statutory period. It is something done by him, not merely that which is left undone by the owner, that is to be considered. There can be no constructive adverse possession against the owner, when there is no actual possession which he could treat as a trespass and bring an action for; unless the adverse claimant is so in possession of the land that he may at any time be sued as trespasser, the statute will not run in his favor; and although he may have taken actual possession, if he does not continue there so that he may be sued at any time as a trespasser during the prescriptive bar, he cannot rely on the statute of limitations." To the same effect is the decision in Malloy v. Bruden, 86 N. C. 251. The Supreme Court of the United States held in Armstrong v. Morrill, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 120, 20 L. ed. 765, that where lands owned by one individual but in the adverse possession of another, were forfeited to the state, and subsequently redeemed by the owner by virtue of a private act of the legislature, the continuity of the adverse possession was broken in point of law, and that such possession, though it might have been in fact continuous was neither restored upon the redemption so far as to be continuous in law, nor was it so affected as that the person holding adversely could tack the adverse possession prior to the forfeiture to the possession subsequent to the redemption, and so make out a term of adverse possession. The necessity of the continuity of the adverse possession is emphasized in this case. An adverse claimant who was driven from the premises by Indians, and resumed possession as soon as it was safe to do so, was not permitted to compute the period of his absence under a plea of the statute of limitations. Atch v. Boyer, 51 Tex. 386. A possession vacated in obedience to a military order compelling all citizens who adhered to the Mexican cause to leave the country, was thereby interrupted. Holliday v. Cromwell, 87 Tex. 437. The correct rule, we think, to be deduced from the law on the subject is that the adverse possessor, the inception of whose title is founded in wrongdoing, must not yield or surrender his possession under the pressure of any legal methods used to oust him, if he can legally prevent it, and if he does, and an entry adverse to him is made, the continuity of his possession will be broken. Vanderpool's judgment against Hill was rendered on the 25th day of October, 1871, and it appears that two notices of appeal were served, one on the 1st day of November, 1871, and the other on the 21st day of March, 1873, and the judgment was reversed in this court at the January term, 1875. The presumption is that the appeal under the first notice was abandoned, and prosecuted under the second. No supersedeas was obtained, and no effort made to avoid or resist the writ of possession issued to put Vanderpool in possession, yet there were legal remedies provided to prevent such a result. So far as we know Hill took no steps to avoid the serious consequence to him of leaving possession, except of prosecuting the appeal, and we think he should have been prompt to use all legal means to retain the possession of the premises. Furthermore it will be observed that the statute requires that the premises shall be held adversely to the legal title, and if we were to hold that as between Vanderpool and Hill, the latter must be regarded as continuing in possession from October, 1871, in analogy to the doctrine already referred to of not allowing a party to take advantage of a wrong done by himself, still the legal title to the lot, so far as concerned Hill, was in Gould. The view expressed in the West Virginia case referred to is that the adverse claimant must so continue in possession during the statutory period, that the owner may sue him for the recovery of the land. The consequences to the owner would be serious if an occupant who had been ousted by a stranger, but afterwards restored to possession, could claim the bar of the statute, when as a matter of fact he was not in possession and could not be sued. The statute cannot admit of such a construction. It may be said that while Gould's deed to Vanderpool was void as to Hill, and as between Gould and Hill the title was in the former, still it was held beneficially for Vanderpool. If Hill had remained in possession the opportunity of Gould to sue existed, notwithstanding Vanderpool's suit, and by relinquishing possession this opportunity was taken away. Vanderpool may have discovered his mistake in suing, and have urged a suit on the part of Gould if Hill had remained in possession.

The next objection is that the suit could not be revived in the name of the heirs of James M. Gould. Suit was commenced by Gould in January, 1876, against Henry and Wiley Jenkins, and about two years after pleas filed the plaintiff died. In February, 1889, notice was given of an application to revive the suit in the names of the heirs of Gould, and an order was made by the circuit judge reviving the suit in their names as plaintiffs. No objection was made to such proceedings, but by consent the executors of Delphi Emmerly appeared, and the case was tried upon the issues presented by the pleas of not guilty filed by Henry and Wiley Jenkins and said executors. As no objection was made in the trial court to the proceedings to revive the suit in the names of Gould's heirs, so long a time after his death, we cannot review such action of the court, provided such revivor could be made. On the record presented the only question is whether the suit could legally be so revived. Our conclusion is that it could. At common law the death of a sole plaintiff in real actions before judgment, abated the suit. Green v. Watkins, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 260, 5 L. ed. 256; Macker v. Thomas, 20 U. S. 7 Wheat. 530, 5 L. ed. 515; Cutts v. Haskins, 11 Mass. 56; 2 Tidd, Pr. *1117; 1 Comyns' Dig. 120 (H. 32).

Upon the death of the ancestor the legal title under the common-law rule descends to the heir-at-law, and thereupon a new cause of action arises in his favor to recover real estate withheld from him. If the suit of an ancestor can be revived upon his death in the name of the heir, it must be done under legislative authority. The provision in the Act of February, 1861, section 74, page 829, McClellan's Digest, that "in case of the death of a sole plaintiff, the legal representative of such plaintiff may, by leave of the court or a judge, enter a suggestion of the death, and that he is such legal representative, the action shall thereupon proceed," may contemplate a revivor in the name of an executor or administrator alone as contended for by counsel (Price v. Strange, 6 Hadd. 159), and the 35th rule of practice for circuit courts, framed under the statute mentioned, seems to add force to such contention. If this be true it does not follow that the revivor in the names of the heirs-at-law of Gould was not properly made. The Act of November 28d, 1828, while it declares what actions shall die with the person, and what shall survive, provides that those that do survive may be maintained in the names of the representatives of the deceased. McClellan's Dig. § 77, p. 830. The action here is one that does not die with the plaintiff. Rule 94 provides that "in all cases where the rules as to making parties in other actions cannot be made applicable to actions in ejectment, and there is no rule in ejectment, or statute controlling the subject, then the persons may be made parties upon motion and notice, in such manner and upon such terms as the judge may direct." The 95th rule reads as follows: "If in any case there should be a person in interest or possession, other than the executor or administrator of the deceased plaintiff or defendant, who should be made a party plaintiff or defendant to the suit, he may be made a party, after such notice and such manner, and upon such terms as to pleading as the court or judge may direct. Such order may be made in vacation as well as in term."

These rules were made by the court under the statute specially for actions of ejectment, which are real actions, and as such actions do not die with the plaintiff, but may be maintained in the name of the representative, and as the heir is the real representative of the ancestor, it is contemplated by the rule that such heir, being a person in interest, may be made a party and maintain the suit. The action to be maintained, as contemplated by the rule, is the one commenced by or against the deceased plaintiff or defendant. This being the case, it will be seen that the action before us was commenced about six months after Hill was restored to the possession of the land in 1875, the date when his adverse possession began after its former interruption. He cannot tack his last adverse possession to his former holding, and this left him without the requisite statutory bar. The fact that the heir may not be entitled to recover mesne profits for the time the land was held in the lifetime of the ancestor, if such be the case, is no reason why the land itself may not be recovered. The suit was commenced against Henry and Wiley Jenkins in January, A. D. 1876. Pending the suit against them, who were in possession under Hill, the latter conveyed the lot in 1881 to his daughter, whose executors voluntarily appeared and defended the suit in 1889. The commencement of the suit under such circumstances must of course date from the time of the institution of the action against Henry and Wiley Jenkins.

For the reasons given the judgment must be reversed and a new trial awarded, and it will be so ordered.

NOTE.—As to use of ne exeat, see Moore v. Valda (Mass.) 7 L. R. A. 390.

As to domicile of wife for purpose of divorce, see Loker v. Gerald (Mass.) 16 L. R. A. 497, and note, 24 L. R. A.

1485, Rev. Stat., upon the ground of the existence in favor of the wife of some one or more of the legal causes for divorce, then the applicant must allege and prove that she has legally been a bona fide resident and citizen of this state for two years continuously next prior to the filing of her application. The prerequisite two years' residence here is jurisdictional, and no "cause for divorce," such as our courts could recognize, can properly be said to exist in this state in favor of any application until she has bona fide resided here the requisite period of two years.

2. Where the application for alimony without seeking divorce is predicated under the provisions of section 1485, Rev. Stat., upon the ability of the husband to maintain the wife and his failure so to do, then it is not necessary for the wife to allege or prove that she has resided here for two years; but in such case, in so far as the question of the jurisdiction of the court to entertain the cause is concerned, it is only necessary for her to show that either she or her husband has, in a proper and legitimate manner, become, at the time of the application, a bona fide resident and citizen of this state. It is immaterial in the latter cases how long such residence and citizenship shall have continued here prior to the application. But it is not within the spirit or intent of either of these provisions of the statute to confer upon our courts the power to interfere in any respect with the marital status of citizens of other states who may be here only on a temporary visit, either to pass upon such status or to enforce any of the rights and duties that depend thereon.

3. Where an issue is raised by the pleadings, in a proceeding for alimony without divorce, as to the jurisdiction of the court, on the ground that neither the applicant wife nor the defendant husband is a resident or citizen of this state, such jurisdictional question is no bar to the granting of temporary alimony and suit money pendente lite, but in such case it is within the sound judicial discretion of the court to award temporary alimony, pendente lite, until such jurisdictional issue, with others material to the proper determination of the controversy between the parties, can be finally heard and disposed of upon the proofs.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Circuit Court for Volusia County directing the defendant to pay alimony to the plaintiff and forbidding him to leave the state pending proceedings. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Taylor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, Jennie Miller, filed her bill in the circuit court of Volusia county on the 18th day of December, 1893, against her husband, Isaac Miller, the appellant, praying therein, not for divorce, but for alimony, and the custody of their infant son of the age of twelve years, and for an allowance for the maintenance of said child; and for a writ ne exeat to prevent the defendant from departing the state and to furnish security for his compliance with the order for alimony.

The bill alleges, in substance, that the complainant, Jennie Miller, is a resident and citizen of the state of Florida. That she and the defendant, Isaac Miller, are husband and wife. That they were married in the state of New York in 1879, and that afterwards they removed to the town of Franklyn, in the state of New Jersey, at which place they resided until July, 1892, when the defendant kissed her and bade her good-bye, promising to return in three weeks time, telling her that the object of his trip was to establish a syndicate of some kind somewhere in Texas. That the defendant continued to write to her until some time in November, 1892, when he ceased his letters, and she has never heard directly from him since. That defendant left her without a cause and has from the said July, 1892, willfully, obstinately, and continuously deserted her, leaving her in the meantime entirely unprovided for and without means of support other than what she was able to earn by her own labor and industry. That she has borne one child for the defendant, a boy now about the age of twelve years, named Isaac Harry Miller, who is now with her, and who has been supported and maintained by her since the desertion of her by the defendant. That she has been informed and believes, and upon such information and belief charges, that the defendant has avowed his purpose and intention to procure possession of this child, even at the cost of blood if necessary. That since his desertion of her the defendant has resided in the state of Texas. That she has inherited, by the death of a sister, Elizabeth C. Bodine, late of Volusia county, Florida, who died intestate in said county in 1893, the one-fifth interest in certain real and personal property belonging to her said deceased sister's estate. That by the consent and at the request of three of the heirs of the said estate she has applied for and obtained a grant of letters of administration upon said estate, and that Charles Delamater, a son of a deceased sister of the said Elizabeth C. Bodine, deceased, has been appointed as her co-administrator upon said estate. That the defendant, having ascertained that she has inherited, in the manner aforesaid, the one-fifth interest in the estate aforesaid, and desiring and intending to harass and wrong her, by attempting to exercise the right of a husband over the estate of his wife given to the husband by the laws of Florida, has left his home and business in Texas and has come to Florida recently, with the purpose and intention of taking possession of her property and of the said child Harry Miller, with the intent to carry beyond the limits of the state of Florida all of her personal property that he can lay his hands upon, and also to take from her and carry out of the state of Florida her said child. That she is advised she has good cause of divorce against her said husband upon the ground of his willful, obstinate, and continued desertion of her for one year, and that she has the legal right, under the laws of Florida, to obtain alimony without seeking a divorce. That the defendant has ample means and is fully able to maintain and contribute to her maintenance and that of his said child, and has without any fault of hers, and wholly without excuse of any kind, utterly failed to do so. That the said estate in which she has a one-fifth interest aforesaid is still unsettled, the debts have not yet all been paid, nor has the said estate as yet been divided, and she is, therefore, still dependent upon her own industry for the means of maintenance for herself and her said child. That the defendant will very soon, and may at any time, remove himself beyond the limits of the state of Florida and beyond the reach of process of this court.

Personal service of the subpoena in chancery was made upon the defendant in Volusia county, Florida.

The defendant interposed a demurrer to the bill upon the grounds: That there was no equity in the bill; that it was not legally sworn to in order to obtain an injunction; that it was multifarious in seeking relief of several kinds; and that the court of chancery was without jurisdiction to adjudicate the subject-matter of said bill. This demurrer the court overruled, and such ruling is claimed to be error. The defendant then answered the bill, in substance, as follows: He admits his marriage to the complainant as alleged. He admits that he left Franklyn, New Jersey, about the 20th of July, 1892, but says that complainant knew where he was going, and the business upon which he was going; that the matter had been talked over between them before leaving for Texas, she having examined all his correspondence. He admits that he remained in Texas, but says that it was for the purpose of saving and securing a large sum of money, to wit: about $105,000. That he kept up a correspondence with the complainant and sent her money as often as she needed it until November following, when she suddenly and without any cause known to him stopped answering his letters, and for reasons hereafter stated, to wit: that previous to his going to Texas the said Jennie Miller received from him about $1,700, with the request from him to deposit the same in bank to her own credit, she thereafter took a portion of that money and went to California without his consent or any knowledge on his part where she was going, and remained away for a long time; that she came back and acknowledged her error and begged forgiveness. That previous to his going to Texas she had left her home where every comfort was provided for her and went away leaving him without any cause or excuse whatever, and came back and her crime was condoned by him. That when she stopped writing to him he naturally supposed that she had left her home and refused to correspond with him. That failing to hear from her, he did not write to her, but tried to ascertain from others where she and his child had gone, but failed to find out for a long time, and when he did ascertain where she was he found that she was in Albion, Michigan, where she now lives. That she took and carried with her to Michigan all the furniture belonging to him of about $7,000 in value which is still in her possession, and used by her, as he is informed and believes, in keeping a boarding house. He emphatically denies that he has ever failed or refused to provide for, support, and maintain her in a comfortable manner, having plenty of means himself. That he has now and always had a good and comfortable home for her as long as she remains with him and still has so long as she behaves herself as a wife should do towards her husband. That it is no fault of his that she did not come to him at his present temporary home in Texas, but of her own will she has remained away. He admits her inheritance of property in Florida from her sister and her administration on her sister's estate, but which administration was without his knowledge or consent, and which, he is advised, is illegal and void, and to which he will not give his consent. He emphatically denies that he came to Florida for the purpose of obtaining possession of the property that she inherits from her said sister's estate, but that he came here to collect a bill due him by said estate, and which he proposes to collect. He denies that he came to Florida to take possession of his child, Isaac Harry Miller, but to see him and to provide for him as a parent would for a child; and says that he does propose to take said child whenever he is large enough to go to a proper school. He emphatically denies that he ever deserted her, or left her to her own resources, except when produced by her own acts, she always having a home whenever she thought proper to remain there, which she has failed and refused to do. That he is informed and believes that she went to California and remained there with objectionable persons as long as she saw proper, and returned to him, and that for the sake of her peace and happiness he condoned and forgave her bad conduct.

Upon the filing of the defendant's answer the court made an order for an injunction to restrain the defendant from interfering with the property inherited by the complainant, and for the issuance of a writ ne exeat against the defendant, the defendant to be released from custody thereunder upon his giving a bond with surety to be approved by the sheriff in the sum of one thousand dollars. The order for and issuance of this writ is also assigned as error.

Under the writ ne exeat the defendant was arrested and gave the required bond.

The complainant then presented her petition for alimony pendente lite, and for attorneys' fees, and for suit money. Upon which the court made an order requiring the defendant to pay to the complainant until the further order of the court the sum of twenty-five dollars per week, the first payment to be made on the 3d day of January, 1894, and weekly thereafter, and also the sum of one hundred dollars, solicitors' fees and suit money, to be paid on January 8d, 1894. From this order the defendant appeals.

It is contended for the appellant here that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the cause because neither of the parties were residents or citizens of Florida, but were here only temporarily. Our statute (Rev. Stat. §§ 1485, 1486), provides that "if any of the causes of divorce set forth in section 1480 (except in the ninth paragraph) shall exist in favor of the wife, and she be living apart from her husband, she may obtain alimony without seeking a divorce, upon bill filed and suit prosecuted as in other chancery causes; and the court shall have power to grant such temporary and permanent alimony and suit money as the circumstances of the parties may render just; but no alimony shall be granted to an adulterous wife." Section 1486 provides: "If any husband having ability to maintain or to contribute to the maintenance of his wife or minor children, shall fail to do so, the wife, living with them, or living apart from him through his fault, may obtain such maintenance or contribution upon bill filed and suit prosecuted as in other chancery causes, and the court shall make such orders as may be necessary to secure to her such maintenance or contribution." Section 1487 provides that "a decree of alimony granted under sections 1484 and 1485 shall release the wife from the control of her husband, and she may use her alimony, and acquire, use, and dispose of other property, uncontrolled by her husband, and when the husband is about to remove himself or his property out of the state, or fraudulently convey or conceal it, the court may award a ne exeat or injunction against him or his property, and make such order or decree as will secure the wife's alimony to her." While we do not think that it is within the spirit and intent of these statutes to confer upon our courts the power to interfere in any respect with the marital status of citizens of other states who may be here only on a temporary visit, either to pass upon such status or to enforce any of the rights and duties that depend thereon, yet where either of the parties, in a proper and legitimate manner, becomes a bona fide resident and citizen of this state, then our courts become clothed with power to enforce and protect all of the rights of such citizen, and to compel, to the extent of their jurisdictional powers, the performance of all duties due to or from such citizen, including those that grow out of the marital status; except, that when a total dissolution or severance of such status, by divorce, is sought, then our statute requires that the residence here must have continued for two years before the application therefor can be made. Where one of the parties, however, is actually, legally and bona fide domiciled in this state, as a citizen thereof, then, we think, that under section 1486 of this statute our chancery courts have jurisdiction to enforce the duty of maintenance and support due from the husband to the wife by awarding alimony, particularly where personal service is made upon the husband within this jurisdiction as has been done here. Keeri v. Keeri, 34 Md. 21. It is contended for the appellant that the provision of our divorce statute requiring two years residence in the state before an application for divorce can be entertained, applies to the granting of alimony under all of the provisions of the statutes quoted. Where the application for alimony is predicated solely and entirely upon "the existence of a cause for divorce," as provided for in section 1485, first quoted above, then we think that the bill therefor should allege, and it should also be proved, that the complainant wife has in fact resided in this state continuously for two years next prior to the exhibition of her bill, because under our statute, requiring two years' residence on the part of the applicant for divorce before the doors of our courts are open to his or her complaint, no "cause for divorce" can properly be said to exist in this state in favor of such applicant, at least none such as our courts could recognize, until he or she shall have completed the requisite two years' residence here. The reason for the requirement of the two years' residence before a divorce can be applied for is to prevent citizens of other states from committing a fraud upon the law by taking up a temporary residence here solely for the purpose of obtaining divorces that they could not secure in the jurisdiction to which they belong. But where the application for alimony, as in the case before us, can be rested upon the provisions of section 1486 above, that is a general provision of law to enforce the marital duty due from the husband, having the ability so to do, of maintaining and supporting his wife, regardless of the existence of any cause for divorce, then the reason for the requisite two years' residence does not apply, and in such case it becomes necessary, in so far as the jurisdiction of the court to entertain the cause is concerned, only to show that the applicant wife or the defendant husband is in fact properly and bona fide domiciled here as a citizen of this state. Because of the fact that the bill can be rested upon the provisions of the latter section of the statute, we think it was within the power and discretion of the court to grant alimony thereon. The bill alleges expressly that the complainant wife here is a resident and citizen of Volusia county, Florida. The answer denies this to be true, and asserts that she is a resident and citizen of Michigan, and that she is here only temporarily for the purpose of securing an interest inherited by her in the estate of a deceased sister. Whether she is in truth a bona fide resident and citizen of Florida, or of the state of Michigan, then, is one of the material questions at issue between the parties to be ultimately settled from the proofs to be furnished at the final hearing. The order appealed from grants temporary alimony only until all of the material issues between the parties can be finally determined by further orders and decrees of the court. And even though the answer raises the issue as to the jurisdiction of the court on the ground that both parties are residents and citizens of other states, still it is within the sound judicial discretion of the court below to award temporary alimony to the wife until that issue with others material to the proper determination of the controversy between the parties can be finally heard and determined. 2 Bishop, Mar. & Div.

§ 984; Bradstreet v. Bradstreet, 6 Mackey, 502. Indeed it may be said to be well settled that where the fact of marriage, the wife's necessities and the husband's faculties are shown by adequate pleadings, temporary alimony will be allowed, in accordance with the facts of each case, within the sound discretion of the court. Methvin v. Methvin, 15 Ga. 97, 60 Am. Rep. 664; 2 Bishop, Mar. & Div. § 929 et seq., and authorities cited. We do not see that the discretion of the court below has been abused either in ordering the payment of temporary alimony and suit money here, or in the amount required to be paid, in view of the admission from the defendant husband of the possession of abundant means.

It is also urged here as error that the granting of the writ no ceseat was improper. As there is no appeal from this order we cannot consider same.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

CHICAGO, BURLINGTON & QUINCY R. CO., Appt.,

v.

Charles L. JONES.

1. A statute prohibiting more than fair and reasonable rates by a railroad corporation, being merely declaratory of a common-law rule, although penal, does not deprive the company of its property without due process of law, because the statute does not fix any limit of the rates,—especially where a provision is made in the same statute for the fixing of rates by commissioners.
2. There is no unconstitutional delegation of power to railroad commissioners by a statute authorizing them to fix reasonable maximum rates of charges for freight and passenger traffic, where their schedule is not final but is made merely prima facie evidence of the reasonableness of the rates established.
3. Making a schedule compiled by commissioners prima facie evidence that the rates therein fixed are reasonable maximum rates of charges for railroad carriage does not infringe upon the right of trial by jury.
4. Provisions in a statute as to unlawful discrimination in rates will, even if unconstitutional, not make invalid other provisions as to reasonableness of rates.
5. Only transportation within the state, and that which is not a part of any continuous transportation without the state, is within the provisions of sections 1, 7, 8, and 11 of the Act of May 2, 1873, and these do not therefore affect interstate commerce.
6. The power of railroad commissioners to make a schedule of reasonable maximum rates does not impair the obligation of the contract of a railroad company, under the Act of 1852, which authorized its board of directors to establish rates of toll from time to time, but also provides that the company's by-laws shall not be repugnant to the constitution and laws of the state.

7. A schedule of rates cannot be excluded from evidence under the Illinois statutes when accompanied by a regular certificate of the commissioners as to its publication on the ground that it never took effect because never published as required by statute, since the statutes make the schedule and accompanying certificate prima facie evidence that the schedule offered is a schedule of the commissioners.

8. A statute changing a rule of evidence is applicable to a pending action.

9. An amendment to a declaration charging a common-law liability or implied contract obligation to repay money obtained by wrongful overcharges, states a new cause of action within the rule as to the statute of limitations, where the original counts sought to recover treble damages as a statutory penalty.

pellant's road in this state to the Union Stock Yards, Chicago. The suit was brought in the circuit court of Knox county on October 17, 1882. On May 25, 1883, appellee filed a declaration consisting of two special counts. The first count alleged that the railroad and warehouse commissioners made and published prior to October 2, 1873, as required by law, a schedule of reasonable maximum rates for appellant; that appellee shipped over appellant's road, subsequent to that date, certain cars of livestock from certain points on its road to Chicago; that appellant charged and received from appellee certain rates of freight, which were in excess of the rates fixed in the commissioners' schedule, whereby, by force of the statute, an action accrued to appellee, to recover three times the amount of the overcharge, and a reasonable attorney's fee. The second count was the same in form, except that it alleged a second schedule made and published by the commissioners prior to December 2, 1881, and certain shipments made, and freights charged and received, in excess of the commissioners' rates, subsequent to that date. On June 9, 1883, appellant filed four pleas to the declaration. The first two pleas set out at length the corporate organization of appellant, and the several special charters of the different companies forming it, by consolidation; that, by these charters, appellant was given power by the legislature to fix its own rates of freight and fare; and that the statute under which the suit was brought was in violation of the obligation of the contract between it and the state. The third plea was nil debet; and the fourth, that the cause of action did not accrue within two years. On June 11, 1883, the cause was removed to the circuit court of the United States, but on September 8, 1890, was remanded, and redocketed in the state court. In February, 1891, appellee filed an amended declaration, which consisted of 191 special counts. All of these counts, except the last, declared on single shipments on different dates, and were the same in form. Each of the first 124 counts averred the making and publication by the railroad and warehouse commissioners of a schedule of reasonable maximum rates for appellant prior to October 2, 1873,—the rate fixed by the schedule,—the rate charged, and the excess, and that thereby, by force of the statute, a cause of action accrued to the plaintiff for three times the alleged overcharge, and an attorney's fee. The remaining counts, except the last, were the same in form, except that they averred the making of a second schedule prior to December 2, 1881, and shipments subsequent to that date. The last count did not count on the statute, but averred certain shipments, and that the rates charged and received were unreasonable, and that thereby the defendant became indebted to appellee for the alleged overcharge above a reasonable rate. To this declaration, appellant filed seven pleas. The first and second, to all the counts except the last, set up appellant's charters, and the right claimed by it to fix its own rates, and that the statute sued on was a violation of the obligation of its contract with the state, substantially as in the first and second pleas to the original declaration. The third plea was nil debet. The fourth and seventh pleas, to all the counts except the last, averred that the causes of action alleged did not accrue within two years before the commencement of the suit. The sixth plea averred that the cause of action set out in the last count did not accrue to the appellee within five years before the filing, or obtaining leave to file, that count. Appellee joined issue on the third, fourth, and seventh pleas, and filed a demurrer to the first, second, and sixth pleas, the fifth having been withdrawn. The demurrer raised two questions: (1) Whether appellant's first and second pleas, setting up its charter provisions, constituted a defense; and (2) whether the cause of action set up by the last additional count was a different cause of action from that declared on in the original declaration. The court sustained appellee's demurrer to the first and second pleas, and overruled his demurrer to the sixth. Issues were subsequently joined, and a trial was had by a jury. On the trial, appellee gave evidence showing the various shipments made by him for two years prior to the commencement of the suit, and the amount of freight paid on each, and to establish that the rate charged was more than a reasonable rate, and the alleged overcharges, and gave in evidence (1) a schedule of maximum rates, purporting to have been made by the railroad and warehouse commissioners for appellant, dated September 1, 1873, consisting of a classification of freight, and a tabulation of rates referring to this classification, with a certificate of the railroad and warehouse commissioners attached, as to the dates of publication; (2) a like schedule of reasonable maximum rates, purporting to have been made by the railroad and warehouse commissioners for appellant, dated December 1, 1881, and also having a certificate of the railroad and warehouse commissioners attached, as to the dates of publication. To the admission of these schedules in evidence, appellant objected, on the grounds, among others, (1) that the statute on which the suit was brought was unconstitutional and void; (2) that the provision of the statute making the commissioners' schedule prima facie evidence of reasonable maximum rates was unconstitutional and void; (3) that the schedule was not published as required by the statute, and therefore never went into effect as a schedule. Among the instructions asked by appellant, and refused by the court, were (1) an instruction that, under the pleadings and evidence, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover; (2) an instruction that in arriving at their verdict the jury should disregard the schedule of September, 1873; (3) an instruction that in arriving at their verdict the jury should disregard the schedule of December, 1881. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of appellee for $2868.60, and the court subsequently assessed appellee's attorney's fee at $1200. A motion for a new trial was entered, and overruled, and judgment was rendered in favor of appellee for the amount of the verdict and costs. From this judgment, appellant has appealed to this court.

Magruder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions presented by this record concern the validity of the system under which for twenty years or more, the rates of railroad charges for the transportation of passengers and freight have been controlled and regulated by this state, through the medium of a board of railroad and warehouse commissioners. The principal points raised by the demurrers to the pleas, by the objections to the introduction of evidence, and by the refusal of instructions, relate to the constitutionality of the act of the legislature of this state, approved May 2, 1873, in force July 1, 1873, entitled "An Act to prevent extortion and unjust discrimination in the rates charged for the transportation of passengers and freights on railroads in this state, and to punish the same, and prescribe a mode of procedure and rules of evidence in relation thereto, and to repeal an act entitled 'An Act to prevent unjust discriminations and extortions in the rates to be charged by the different railroads in this state for the transportation of freights on said roads,' approved April 7, A. D. 1871." 2 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. p. 1961; Rev. Stat. 1885, chap. 114, p. 951, §§ 124-138. Section 1 provides: "If any railroad corporation," etc., "shall charge, collect, demand, or receive more than a fair and reasonable rate of toll or compensation for the transportation of passengers or freight, . . . the same shall be deemed guilty of extortion, and upon conviction thereof shall be dealt with as hereinafter provided." Section 6 provides: "If any railroad corporation shall, in violation of any of the provisions of this act, ask, demand, charge, or receive of any person or corporation any extortionate charge or charges for the transportation of any passengers, goods, merchandise, or property, . . . the person or corporation so offended against may, for each offense, recover from such railroad corporation, in any form of action, three times the amount of the damages sustained by the party aggrieved, together with costs of suit and a reasonable attorney's fee, to be fixed by the court," etc. Section 8 is as follows: "The railroad and warehouse commissioners are hereby directed to make, for each of the railroad corporations doing business in this state, as soon as practicable, a schedule of reasonable maximum rates of the charges for the transportation of passengers and freights, and cars on each of said railroads; and such schedule shall, in all suits brought against such railroad corporations wherein is in any way involved the charges of any such railroad corporation for the transportation of any passengers or freight or cars, or unjust discrimination in relation thereto, to be deemed and taken in all courts of this state as prima facie evidence that the rates therein fixed are reasonable maximum rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freight, and cars upon the railroads for which said schedules may have been respectively prepared. Said commissioners shall, from time to time, and as often as circumstances may require, change and revise said schedules. When any schedule shall have been made or revised as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of said commissioners to cause publication thereof to be made for three successive weeks in some public newspaper published in the city of Springfield in this state. All such schedules heretofore or hereafter made purported to be printed or published as aforesaid, shall be received and held in all such suits as prima facie evidence of the schedules of said commissioners, without further proof than the production of the schedules desired to be used as evidence, with a certificate of the railroad and warehouse commissioners that the same is a true copy of a schedule prepared by them for the railroad company or corporation therein named, and that the same has been published as required by law, stating the name of the paper in which the same was published, together with the date of such publication."

1. The first ground upon which counsel for appellant attack the act is that it is void for uncertainty, in not defining the offenses for which the penalties provided for are imposed. The basis of this attack is found in the words: "If any railroad corporation," etc., "shall charge," etc., "more than a fair and reasonable rate," etc. It is said that it is uncertain what a fair and reasonable rate is as the determination of that question will depend upon a variety of considerations, such, for instance, as the character of the freight, the necessity of dispatch, the cost of cleaning and unloading cars, the risk of liability, as affected by the value of the article as carried, the volume of business, the amount of car room required, the difficulty of the service, the special attention demanded, etc.; that the offense of charging more than a fair and reasonable rate can only be defined when the jury, in each particular case, shall decide from the evidence before them what is a fair and reasonable rate; that the statute, being penal in its character, should describe the offense in terms which are free from ambiguity; and that the enforcement of a statute whose meaning is thus doubtful violates that provision in the Federal and state constitutions which declares that no person shall be deprived "of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." The difficulties which stand in the way of determining what are reasonable rates also stand in the way of embodying in a legal enactment such an exact definition as is insisted upon. If the legislature, in the act passed by it, fixes particular rates or charges, strict compliance therewith may work hardship, in view of the impossibility of always providing in advance for the effect of varying circumstances and conditions. The first section of the statute is merely declaratory of a well-known principle of the common law. At common law the common carrier was obliged to receive and carry all goods offered for transportation, upon receiving a reasonable hire (Messenger v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 36 N. J. L. 407, 18 Am. Rep. 457; New England Exp. Co. v. Maine Cent. R. Co.

§7 Me. 188, 2 Am. Rep. 81); and the court was to judge of the reasonableness of the freight charges. Gard v. Callard, 6 Maule & S. 70; Louden v. Hierons, 2 Moore, 102; Bazendale v. Great Western R. Co. 5 O. B. N. S. 330. As common carriers must carry all freight offered to them and can only make a reasonable charge for so doing, it follows that the statute is only an expression of what was the law without the statute. Undoubtedly, the legislature has the power to declare what is a reasonable compensation, or to fix the reasonable maximum rates of charges. Dow v. Beidelman, 135 U. S. 630, 81 L. ed. 841. But in the absence of statutory regulation upon the subject, the courts must decide what is reasonable. Dow v. Beidelman, supra; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Iowa, 99 U. S. 155, 24 L. ed. 94; Budd v. New York, 143 U. S. 517, 36 L. ed. 247, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 45. This being so, we are unable to see how the statute here deprives the appellant of its property without due process of law. If the legislature has failed to fix a reasonable rate, then the courts must decide for the railroad companies, when controversies arise, what is a reasonable rate. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Iowa, supra.

But we held in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. People, 77 Ill. 448, that the first section of this statute should be construed in connection with the eighth, and that the latter section, by providing for the making, by the railroad and warehouse commissioners, of a schedule of reasonable maximum rates for each of the railroad corporations in the state, furnished a uniform rule for the guidance of the railroad companies. In that case we said: "When that is done there will be a standard of what is fair and reasonable, and the statute can be conformed to and obeyed. . . . It is true that the taking of higher rates than those fixed by the commissioners' schedule of rates is not the exact form of statutory offense, and the taking of such higher rates might not subject to the penalties of the statute, upon the making of proof that they were fair and reasonable. Still, as we view it, to constitute the offense really designed and intended by the statute, regarding it in its whole scope and purpose, the rates taken must have been in excess of the schedule rates." This construction of the two sections, as related to each other, is not forbidden by the character of the act as a penal statute. Although penal laws are to be construed strictly, yet "the object in construing penal as well as other statutes is to ascertain the legislative intent." United States v. Hartwell, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 395, 18 L. ed. 832. The statutory counts of the declaration in the case at bar contain an averment that a schedule of rates had been established by the board of commissioners, and that the defendant had received compensation in excess of those rates. It thus avoids the defect for which the declaration in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. People, supra, was condemned. Upon this branch of the case, counsel for appellant rely upon the case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Railroad Commission of Tennessee, 19 Fed. Rep. 679, decided by the circuit court 24 L. R. A.

of the United States, sitting in Tennessee; but a comparison of the statute of Tennessee which was under consideration in that case with the Illinois statute under which the present suit is brought will show that they differ from each other in many respects. In Stone v. Farmers Loan & T. Co. 116 U. S. 307, 29 L. ed. 636, the Supreme Court of the United States passed upon the validity of a statute of Mississippi passed in 1884, and entitled "An Act to provide for the regulation of freight and passenger rates in this [that] state, and to create a commission to supervise the same and for other purposes," which is similar, in many of the essential features, to the Illinois Act of 1873. It was objected to the Mississippi act that it was void for want of sufficient certainty, and the case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Railroad Commission of Tennessee, supra, was referred to in support of the objection. But Chief Justice Waite, in delivering the opinion of the court in the Stone Case, says of the Mississippi statute: "It is difficult to understand precisely on what ground we are expected to decide that this statute is so inconsistent and uncertain as to render it absolutely void on its face. . . . We find nothing in it to show that the statute, as it now stands, is altogether void and inoperative." See also Stone v. Yacoo & M. V. R. Co. 63 Miss. 607, 52 Am. Rep. 193. We are not convinced that it is our duty to hold said Act of 1873 void for uncertainty in defining the offense for the commission of which it imposes the penalties therein mentioned.

2. It is claimed that the provision contained in said section 8 which authorizes the commissioners to fix for each of the railroads in the state a schedule of reasonable maximum rates is unconstitutional, as being an attempted delegation of legislative power. The constitutional provisions on this subject are as follows: "And the general assembly shall, from time to time, pass laws establishing reasonable maximum rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freight on the different railroads in this state." Const. art. 11, § 12, 1 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. p. 168. "The general assembly shall pass laws to correct abuses and prevent unjust discrimination and extortion in the rates of freight and passenger tariffs on the different railroads in this state, and enforce such laws by adequate penalties to the extent, if necessary for that purpose, of forfeiture of their property and franchises." Const. art. 11, § 15, 1 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. p. 164. The power to regulate and control the charges of railroad companies, or other agencies engaged in public employments, is legislative, and not judicial. Independently of such constitutional provisions as are above quoted, it is now the settled doctrine in this country that the legislatures of the states have the power to regulate and settle the freight and passenger charges of railroad companies; and the charges for services of other employments which are public in their character, subject only to such restraints as are imposed by charter contracts, and by the authority of Congress to regulate foreign and interstate commerce. Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Iowa, 94 U. S. 155, 24 L. ed. 94; Budd v. New York, 143 U. S. 517, 36 L. ed. 247, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 45. This doctrine is not here controverted. It is admitted that if, in the Act of 1873, the legislature had prescribed, in definite and specific figures, reasonable maximum rates of charges, the law would have been valid. By an Act approved April 15, 1871, the legislature of Illinois classified the railroads in the state into four classes, and provided that those in the first class should be limited to 2½ cents per mile, those in the second class to 3 cents per mile, those in the third to 4 cents per mile, and those in the fourth class to 5½ cents per mile, as compensation for the transportation of any person with a certain amount of ordinary baggage. Ill. Laws 1871, p. 640. We held this law to be valid. Ruggles v. People, 91 Ill. 256. The Supreme Court of the United States affirmed the decision. Ruggles v. Illinois, 108 U. S. 526, 27 L. ed. 812.

The objection made to the Act of 1873 is that it is not such an act as was the Act of 1871, which was repealed on March 31, 1874. 3 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. p. 2368. The Act of 1873 is said to be invalid because, instead of establishing reasonable maximum rates of charges, it is supposed to delegate the power to establish such rates to the railroad and warehouse commissioners. It has been held, in a number of cases, that statutes which create boards of commissioners, and authorize them to make schedules of rates for railroad companies, are not invalid for the reason here urged. The doctrine of these cases is that the functions of such boards are administrative, rather than legislative; that the authority conferred upon them relates merely to the execution of the law; that a grant of legislative power to do a certain thing carries with it the power to use all proper and necessary means to accomplish the end; and that, as the reasonableness of rates changes with circumstances, and legislatures cannot be continuously in session, the requirement that the statute itself shall fix the charges might preclude the legislature from the use of the agencies necessary to perform the duty imposed upon it by the constitution; in short, that the legislature may authorize others to do things which it might properly, but cannot conveniently or advantageously, do itself. State v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 38 Minn. 281; Georgia R. Co. v. Smith, 70 Ga. 694; Tilley v. Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. 5 Fed. Rep. 641; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Dey, 35 Fed. Rep. 866; State v. Fremont & E. M. Valley R. Co. 23 Neb. 313, 23 Neb. 117; People v. Harper, 91 Ill. 857; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 911.

In State v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. supra, the eighth section of the Minnesota statute, which was there held to be constitutional, provided that the railroad and warehouse commissioners should have the power, in case the tariffs of rates, fares, charges, or classifications filed and published by the railroad companies should be unreasonable, to change them, and make them reasonable, and compel the carriers to adopt them as thus changed, and, upon refusal, to enforce compliance by mandamus; and said section also declared that it should be unlawful for any common carrier to charge a higher or lower rate than that fixed and published by the commission. In that case the supreme court of Minnesota interpreted the eighth section to mean that the rates recommended and published by the commission in the manner required by the act, were not simply advisory, nor merely prima facie equal and reasonable, but final and conclusive as to what were lawful or equal and reasonable rates, and that, in proceedings to compel compliance, no issue could be made, or inquiry had, as to the equality and reasonableness of the rates in fact. It was there conceded by counsel that the legislature could declare the schedule of rates fixed by the commission to be prima facie evidence of what was equal and reasonable, but the court held that the legislature had the power to create a commission whose judgment or determination as to what was reasonable should be final and conclusive. The Minnesota case was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the judgment therein rendered was reversed upon the ground that the Minnesota statute, as construed by the supreme court of that state, conflicted with the constitutional provision forbidding the states to deprive persons of their property without due process of law. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 184 U. S. 418, 33 L. ed. 970. In the latter case, Mr. Justice Blatchford, in delivering the opinion of the court, said of the statute: "It deprives the company of its right to a judicial investigation, by due process of law, under the forms and with the machinery provided by the wisdom of successive ages for the investigation judicially of the truth of a matter in controversy, and substitutes therefor, as an absolute finality, the action of a railroad commission, which, in view of the powers conceded to it by the state court, cannot be regarded as clothed with judicial functions, or possessing the machinery of a court of justice." From this decision, Justices Bradley, Gray, and Lamar dissented, and held, in their dissenting opinion, that there was no good reason why the legislature might not delegate the duty of regulating and fixing the charges, so as to make them equal and reasonable, to such a board of commissioners as was provided for in the Minnesota statute.

Subsequently, in the case of Budd v. New York, 143 U. S. 517, 36 L. ed. 247, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 45, the case of Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, supra, was reviewed and explained. The doctrine of Munn v. Illinois, supra, and of the other cases known as the "Granger Cases," in 94 U. S. 155-181, 24 L. ed. 94, 102, was adhered to; and it was held that the Minnesota law had been declared invalid because it had been construed by the supreme court of that state "as providing that the rates of charges for the transportation of property by railroads, recommended and published by the commission, should be final and conclusive as to what were equal and reasonable charges, and that there could be no judicial inquiry as to the reasonableness of such rates."

We understand the doctrine of Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, supra, and of Budd v. New York, supra, to be as follows: The legislature has the power to directly fix the rates of charges. It has the right to declare what is reasonable. When it does so, its declaration is conclusive as to the reasonableness of the rates, and a charge beyond the maximum fixed by it must be regarded as unreasonable. But, where the legislature creates a commission to regulate the rates of charges, such commission has no power to make a schedule of rates which shall be final and conclusive evidence as to the reasonableness of the charges because judicial inquiry is thereby cut off. We do not, however, understand the Federal cases to hold that an act of a state legislature may not be valid, if, while omitting to itself fix the maximum rates, it creates a commission with authority to make schedules which shall be prima facie evidence of the reasonableness of the rates. Where the schedule is only made prima facie evidence, the court, in a suit against the carrier, can inquire and determine what is a reasonable rate; and the defect which was found to exist in the Minnesota law is thus obviated. Such is the character of the Illinois Act of 1873, which provides, in section 8, that the schedule made, published, and certified by the commissioners shall, in all suits brought against the railroad corporations, involving their freight and passenger charges, etc., be "deemed and taken, in all courts of this state, as prima facie evidence that the rates therein fixed are reasonable maximum rates of charges," etc. One of the criticisms made upon the construction given by the supreme court of Minnesota to the statute in that state is expressed in Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, supra, in the following words: "The supreme court authoritatively declares that it is the expressed intention of the legislature of Minnesota, by the statute, that the rates recommended and published by the commission, if it proceeds in the manner pointed out by the act, are not simply advisory, nor merely prima facie equal and reasonable." The Mississippi statute, which was held to be a valid law in Stone v. Farmers Loan & T. Co. supra, contained a provision that the determination of the commissioners should be received in the courts as prima facie evidence that such determination was right and proper. So, also, the Iowa statute, which was held not to be unconstitutional as a delegation of legislative power in Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Dey, supra, provided that the schedule made by the commissioners should be prima facie evidence of the reasonableness of the rates therein charged. In all suits brought against the railroad corporations.

Under the constitutional provisions above quoted, the legislature of this state has the right, and it is its prerogative, if it chooses to exercise it, to pass a law establishing or fixing reasonable maximum rates of charges. When it passed the Act of 1873, it did not choose to exercise the power thus conferred upon it. That act does not establish reasonable maximum rates, nor does it delegate to the board of railroad and warehouse commissioners the power to establish such rates. When a board is authorized to make a schedule of rates, and their schedule is merely given the force and effect of prima facie evidence as to the reasonableness of the rates in a suit involving the question of such reasonableness, there is no delegation to the board of the legislative power to establish rates. The legislature thereby merely refrains from the exercise of its constitutional power, and, by leaving the question as to the reasonableness of the rates open, makes room for the exercise by the courts of their jurisdiction upon the subject. The final tribunal of arbitrament is not the judiciary, but the legislature. But "when the legislature declares that the charges shall be reasonable, or, which is the same thing, allows the common law rule to that effect to prevail, and leaves the matter there, then resort may be had to the courts, to inquire judicially whether the charges are reasonable." Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 462, 33 L. ed. 983. The decision in Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, supra, does not base the invalidity of the Minnesota statute upon the ground that the provision making the schedule of the commission final and conclusive as to the reasonableness of the rates was a delegation of legislative power to the commission. Nor do we deem it necessary to decide whether such a provision would amount to a delegation of legislative power, or not. But, if it be conceded that making the schedule of the commission final and conclusive as to the rates is a delegation of legislative power, it is sufficient to say, in the present case, that the Act of 1873 does not give to the schedule any such final and conclusive effect. We are therefore of the opinion that the act is not unconstitutional for the second reason urged upon our attention by counsel.

3. It is argued that the provision of the statute making the schedule of the commissioners prima facie evidence that the rates therein fixed are reasonable maximum rates of charges is unconstitutional and void, not only as depriving the carriers of their property without due process of law, but as infringing upon the right of trial by jury. We do not think that this objection should be sustained. In the first place, the act does not deprive the railroad corporations of the right to have a judicial determination of the reasonableness of the rates, if they are not satisfied with the schedule made by the commission. The courts are open to them for a review of the acts of the commissioners in fixing the rates of charges. In the next place, the provision is an exercise by the legislature of its undoubted power to prescribe the rules of evidence. 2 Rice, Ev. pp. 806, 807; Com. v. Williams, 6 Gray, 1; State v. Hurley, 54 Me. 562. Such provisions are not unusual. Cases have arisen in this state under a statute making the fact of injury caused by sparks from a locomotive passing along the road prima facie evidence of negligence, and no question has ever been raised as to the validity of the statute. Pittsburg, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Campbell, 86 Ill. 443; St. Louis F. & T. H. R. Co. v. Funk, 85 Ill. 460;

Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Larmen, 67 Ill. 68; Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. Co. v. Rogers, 63 Ill. 846; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Clamplit, 63 Ill. 95; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Quaintance, 58 Ill. 889. Acts making tax deeds prima facie evidence of the regularity of the proceedings antecedent to the deed have been held to be valid. 2 Rice, Ev. p. 607; Hand v. Ballou, 12 N. Y. 541; Delaplains v. Cook, 7 Wis. 54; Allen v. Armstrong, 18 Iowa, 508; Wright v. Dunham, 18 Mich. 414; Gage v. Caraher, 125 Ill. 451. See also Williams v. German Mut. F. Ins. Co. 68 Ill. 887. Cases referred to by counsel, which involve the validity of acts providing for references to auditors or referees, and making the findings of facts by them in their reports prima facie evidence of the facts in trials before juries, will be found to be clearly distinguishable from the case at bar. The supreme court of Iowa has decided that a provision making the schedule of the commission prima facie evidence of the reasonableness of the rates of charges, as contained in a statute of that state similar to the said Act of 1878, was not obnoxious to the objections here urged against it, saying: "The provision of the statute that the rates fixed by the commissioners shall be regarded as prima facie reasonable is not of an unusual character, and was enacted in the exercise of the undoubted power of the state to prescribe rules of evidence in all proceedings under the laws of the state. The law presumes the acts of officers of the state to be rightfully done, and gives them faith accordingly. This rule is not unlike the provision of the statute complained of by the plaintiff." Burlington, O. R. & N. R. Co. v. Day, 83 Iowa, 312, 12 L. R. A. 486. See also Chicago & A. R. Co. v. People, 67 Ill. 11, 16 Am. Rep. 599.

4. It is contended that the statute has been held to be unconstitutional as to interstate shipments, and that, therefore, it is void as a whole. This contention is based upon the decisions of this court in People v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 104 Ill. 476, and Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. People, 105 Ill. 236, and of the Supreme Court of the United States in Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Illinois, 118 U. S. 557, 80 L. ed. 244. In the Illinois cases the action was to recover for unjust discrimination in carrying the same class of freight from Peoria to New York city for a less sum of money than similar freight was carried from Gilman to New York city; Peoria being a greater distance from New York than Gilman, and being 86 miles further west in Illinois upon the defendant company's road from a station near the eastern boundary of Illinois, than Gilman. The judgments in the Illinois cases were reversed by the United States Supreme Court in the Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. case, supra, because of the interpretation placed by this court upon those sections of the Act of 1878 which relate to unjust discrimination, and not because the United States Supreme Court considered the Act of 1878 invalid, as amounting to an attempted regulation of commerce. The latter court, in the Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. case, supra, said: "It might admit of question whether the statute of Illinois now under consideration was designed by its framers to affect any other class of transportation than that which begins and ends within the limits of the state." The question whether the Illinois statute was or was not so designed by its framers was not as carefully considered in the above cases as it would have been, had it not been for the construction therein placed upon the previous decisions of the Federal Supreme Court. The latter decisions were then understood as holding that a state law prohibiting unjust discrimination in the rates of charges for the transportation of property between points wholly within the state, whether it was a part of a continuous carriage to a point out of the state, or not, was not invalid, in the absence of congressional action upon the subject, and when construed as the Act of 1878 was construed in the Illinois cases. With such understanding of the Federal rulings, this court held that, while the provisions of the Act of 1878 relating to unjust discrimination were inoperative upon that part of the contract of shipment which had reference to the transportation outside of the state, they were binding and effectual as to so much of the transportation as was within the limits of the state. In the opinion of the majority of the court (Chief Justice Waite and Justices Bradley and Gray dissenting) in Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Illinois, supra, Mr. Justice Miller said: "It cannot be denied that the general language of the court in these cases, upon the power of Congress to regulate commerce, may be susceptible of the meaning which the Illinois court places upon it." In the same opinion the same learned justice, in speaking for the majority, while stating that they were bound by the construction given by this court to the Illinois statute, and that this court had so construed the statute as to make it apply to commerce among the states, also said: "If the Illinois statute could be construed to apply exclusively to contracts for a carriage which begins and ends within the state, disconnected from a continuous transportation through or into other states, there does not seem to be any difficulty in holding it to be valid." Looking, however, at the provisions of the Act of 1878 which have reference to unjust discrimination, in the light of the construction given to them in the Illinois cases above referred to, the Federal Supreme Court held those decisions invalid, as applied to unjust discrimination in the rates of charges for the transportation of property within the state, when such transportation was part of a continuous carriage from a point within to a point without the state, upon the ground that such construction made the provisions conflict with the constitutional grant to Congress of power to regulate interstate commerce. This court might be inclined to consider the question whether the construction announced in said cases and accepted by the United States Supreme Court, may not have been incorrect, and unauthorized by the language of the act, if the present suit had arisen under those sections of the act which have reference to unjust discrimination. But the case at bar arises under the provisions which prohibit the charge of more than fair and reasonable rates. This action is brought for damages growing out of alleged charges of unreasonable rates for the transportation of property between points lying wholly within the state, and not being part of a continuous transportation to any point outside of the state. It is within the power of the legislature to so amend the act as clearly to limit the provisions concerning unjust discrimination to commerce carried on within the state.

Counsel claim that the provisions relating to interstate commerce are so intimately connected with those relating to commerce carried on wholly within the limits of the state as not to be separable, the one from the other, and that, as the act has been declared invalid when applied to interstate commerce, it must also be invalid as applied to state commerce. Upon this point, reference is made to cases holding that words of limitation cannot be introduced into a penal statute, so as to make it specific, when, as expressed, it is general only. United States v. Reese, 92 U. S. 214, 23 L. ed. 568; Trade-Mark Cases, 100 U. S. 82, 25 L. ed. 550; Baldwin v. Franks, 120 U. S. 678, 30 L. ed. 766. If the doctrine of these cases is applicable to the case at bar, it is only applicable to the sections of the Act of 1873 relating to unjust discrimination; and the effect of its application would be to hold those sections void, as affecting transportation within the state, because they had been held void as affecting interstate transportation, but the effect would not be to invalidate the act, so far as it relates to charges of fair and reasonable rates alone. Where a part of a statute is unconstitutional, the remainder will not be declared unconstitutional also, if the two are distinct and separable, so that the latter may stand, though the former becomes of no effect. The constitutional and unconstitutional provisions may sometimes be contained in the same section, but do not necessarily fall together, unless they "are essentially and inseparably connected in substance. If, when the unconstitutional portion is stricken out, that which remains is complete in itself, and capable of being executed in accordance with the apparent legislative intent, wholly independent of that which was rejected, it must be sustained. . . . If a statute attempts to accomplish two or more objects, and is void as to one, it may still be, in every respect, complete and valid as to the other. . . . A legislative act may be entirely valid as to some classes of cases, and clearly void as to others." Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. pp. 211, 213; Dupees v. Swigert, 127 Ill. 494. An examination of the Act of 1873 in the light of these principles of construction will show that parts of the act relate to the prevention of unjust discrimination between persons and places in the rates of charges for transportation, while other parts relate to the prevention of charges that exceed fair and reasonable rates. Sections 2 and 8 of the Act relate more particularly to unjust discrimination, and their aim is "against favoritism,—against charging one shipper more than another for the like service under like conditions." Indianapolis, D. & S. R. Co. v. Ervin, 118 Ill. 250; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. People, 121 Ill. 804. Section 1, in connection with sections 7 and 8, concerns the question whether the rate charged a passenger or shipper is reasonable or not, irrespective of the charge that may be made against another passenger or shipper, or at another point. It is easy to see that there is a difference between extortion and discrimination. Hence, we think that the provisions of the act upon the two subjects can be separated and disconnected from each other so that those portions relating to reasonable charges may stand, even if those portions relating to unjust discrimination fall. Whether the latter do or must fall, or not, we do not decide. It is to be noted, however, that in Indianapolis, D. & S. R. Co. v. Ervin, and Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. People, supra, this court treated the whole of the Act of 1873 as valid, as applied to commerce wholly within the state. The Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. cases, 104 Ill. 476, 105 Ill. 236, arose under the sections relating to unjust discrimination; and it was those sections which were therein construed as being "broad enough to include unjust discrimination in the rates of charges for the transportation of property from a point within to a point without the state." The provisions of the act relating to fair and reasonable rates were not construed as being broad enough to prohibit charges of more than reasonable rates for transportation outside of the state, or within it, as part of a carriage beyond the state. Therefore, the question whether these provisions were intended to apply only to transportation between points lying wholly within the state, and disconnected from a continuous carriage to a point outside of the state, is not a question which is settled in the decisions of the Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. cases. After a careful study of the terms of the act, we are of the opinion that the first section, read in connection with the title, and sections 7, 8, and 11, applies only to charges of reasonable rates for such transportation within the state as is not a part of a continuous transportation without the state, and therefore does not infringe upon the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce. The title of the act is "An act to prevent extortion . . . in the rates charged for the transportation of passengers and freights on railroads in this state," and not on railroads outside of this state. The railroad corporations forbidden by section 1 to charge more than reasonable rates are thus therein described: "Any railroad corporation organized or doing business in this state under any act of incorporation, or general law of this state, now in force, or which may hereafter be enacted, or any railroad corporation organized, or which may hereafter be organized under the laws of any other state, and doing business in this state." Section 11 provides that the term "railroad corporation," contained in the act, shall be taken to mean all corporations, etc., now or hereafter owning or operating "any railroad, in whole or in part, in this state," and to apply to all persons, whether incorporated or not, "that shall do business as common carriers upon any of the lines of railway in this state," etc. Section 1 forbids the charging of more than reasonable rate for the transportation of passengers or freight or cars "upon any railroad within the state." Section 8 directs the railroad and warehouse commissioners to make "for each of the railroad corporations doing business in this state" a schedule of reasonable maximum rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freight and cars "on each of said railroads." It is quite manifest that the schedule thus required to be made is of more importance in determining what are reasonable rates of charges than in determining whether there has been unjust discrimination. In section 8 the discriminating rates, charges, etc., therein referred to, are made prima facie evidence of unjust discrimination, without mention of the schedule. If the greater distance (from Peoria to New York) and the shorter distance (from Gilman to New York) are given, and the fact is ascertained that the charge for transportation over such greater distance is less than the charge therefor over such shorter distance, a discrimination is at once established, whether the whole of the distances be regarded, or the proportional parts thereof in this state. Given the facts of the distances, whether without or within the state, and of the actual charges, and the question of discrimination is determined, though reference to the schedule may be made as to the injustice of the discrimination to the individual. But it could not have been the intention of the legislature that this schedule should be prima facie evidence of what were reasonable maximum rates of charges for transportation outside of the state, or for such transportation within it as might be a part of a continuous transportation from within to without. Other states would have their own laws and commissioners, and methods of ascertaining rates. The railroad and warehouse commissioners named in schedule 8 are Illinois officials, appointed by the governor, with jurisdiction limited to this state, and without power or opportunity to gather the data for fixing reasonable rates of transportation outside of the state, or within the state, as connected with a continuous carriage to a point beyond its limits. The act establishing the board of railroad and warehouse commissioners provides that only railroads incorporated or doing business in this state shall make sworn statements of their affairs to said commissioners. 2 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. pp. 1956-1958. Section 7 of the Act of 1873 requires the commissioners to ascertain whether the provisions of the act have been violated by "any railroad corporation in this state," and for that purpose "to visit the various stations upon the line of each railroad." We construe these features of the act to indicate that, so far as the provisions relating to the charges of reasonable rates are concerned, it was not the intention of the legislature to make them apply to any other kind of transportation than that which should occur wholly within the boundaries of this state, or to any other kind of contracts than those for a carriage which begins and ends within the state, disconnected from a continuous transportation through or into other states. Consequently, we hold the provisions relating to charges of reasonable rates to be valid.

5. The statute granting power to the railroad commissioners to make a schedule of reasonable maximum rates for appellant is alleged to be a violation of appellant's charter, so as to impair the obligation of its contract with the state, and therefore the act is said to be void as to appellant. This point is settled adversely to appellant by the cases of Ruggles v. People, 91 Ill. 256, and Ruggles v. Illinois, 108 U. S. 526, 27 L. ed. 812. In the former case, one of the questions submitted by the stipulation was whether a law establishing a reasonable maximum rate of charges for the transportation of passengers on railroads in this state was such a constitutional law as appellant "was bound to obey, . . . notwithstanding the provisions of its charter;" and it was there held that the law was valid, and that the legislature has the power to fix a maximum rate of charges for corporations exercising a business public in its character, and that such regulation does not impair the obligation of the contract in their charters. In Ruggles v. Illinois, supra, the provisions of appellant's charter are fully set out. It is not denied that, by consolidation and statutory provisions, appellant acquired the powers and franchises granted to the Central Military Tract Company by an act to incorporate the latter company passed on February 15, 1851, and by an act to amend said act passed on June 19, 1852. By section 3 of said Act of 1851, said company was thereby "created and incorporated for the purpose of organizing under an act entitled 'An Act to Provide for a General System of Railroad Incorporations,' in force November 5, 1849," and was "entitled to have and exercise the powers and privileges, and be subject to the liabilities therein enumerated." The General Law of 1849, in clause 10 of section 21 thereof, conferred upon railroad companies organized thereunder the right "to regulate the time and manner in which passengers and property shall be transported, and the tolls and compensation to be paid therefor; but such compensation for any passenger and his ordinary baggage shall not exceed three cents a mile, unless by special act of the legislature, and shall be subject to alteration as hereinafter provided." It also provides, in section 32, that "the legislature may, when any such railroad shall be opened, for use, from time to time, alter or reduce the rates of toll, fare, freight, or other profits upon such roads; but the same shall not, without the consent of the corporation, be so reduced as to produce with said profits less than fifteen per cent per annum on the capital actually paid in; nor unless on an examination of the amounts received and expended, to be made by the secretary of state, he shall ascertain that the net income derived by the company from all sources from the year then last past shall have exceeded an annual income of fifteen per cent upon the capital of the corporation actually paid in." The sixth section of the Act of 1852 is as follows: "The said company shall have power to make, ordain, and establish all such by-laws, rules, and regulations as may be deemed expedient and necessary to fulfill the purposes and carry into effect the provisions of this act, and for the well ordering, regulating, and securing the affairs, business, and interest of the company: provided, that the same be not repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States or of this state, or repugnant to this act. The board of directors shall have power to establish such rates of toll for the conveyance of persons or property upon the same, as they shall from time to time, by their by-laws determine, and to levy and collect the same for the use of the said company. The transportation of persons and property, the width of track, and all other matters and things respecting the use of said road, shall be in conformity to such rules and regulations as the said board of directors shall from time to time determine." It is now claimed by the appellant that it still has the right, under its original charter of 1851, of fixing rates, subject only to a limit of three cents a mile on passengers, and that the state has no power to interfere, except to keep the annual profits down to 15 per cent per annum on the paid up capital, and that the Act of 1878, giving the commissioners power to make a schedule of maximum reasonable rates for appellant, ignores these limitations upon the power of the state to regulate its charges. Although the Act of 1852 is entitled "An Act to Amend the Charter of 1851," it is a complete charter in itself. It contains provisions not found in the General Railroad Law of 1849. The plea alleges that it was accepted by appellant, and it was evidently intended and accepted as a substitute for the charter of 1851. In Ruggles v. Illinois, supra, it was contended by appellant that the Act of 1852 repealed sections 21 and 32 of the old charter, with the limitations therein contained as above set forth, and that under section 6 of the Amending Act of 1852, as above set forth, appellant could establish its own rates of fare and freight, free from legislative interference. In that case the Supreme Court of the United States declined to decide whether section 6 of the Amending Act repealed clause 10 of section 21 and section 32 of the original charter or not. But they held that, under said section 6, no by-law could be established by the directors that did not conform to the laws of the state, whether such laws were in force when the amended charter was granted, or came into operation afterwards; that the power of the company for the regulation of its own affairs was, in express terms, subjected to the legislative control of the state; that the by-laws fixed the rates, and no by-law could be made that was at all repugnant to the laws of the state; that only such charges could be collected by appellant as were allowed by the laws of the state; that, in the absence of legislation, the power of the directors over the rates is subject only to the common law limitation of reasonableness, but that the state may establish a maximum of rates to be charged by railroad companies for the transportation of persons and property; that when a maximum is so established the rates fixed by the directors must conform to its requirements,—otherwise, the by-laws would be repugnant to the laws. Adopting the views thus expressed by the Federal Supreme Court, we are of the opinion that there is nothing in appellant's charter which relieves it from the obligation to submit to the provisions of the Act of 1878 upon the subject of reasonable rates, and that the act does not impair the obligation of any contract alleged to be contained in appellant's charter.

6. It is claimed that the schedule of 1878, which was admitted in evidence, was not published as required by statute, and that for that reason it did not go into effect. The copy of the schedule of September 1, 1878, introduced by the plaintiff, was accompanied by the following certificate, which was attached to it: "Office of the Railroad and Warehouse Commission, Springfield, Illinois. State of Illinois, Sangamon County—ss.: We, the undersigned, railroad and warehouse commissioners in and for the state of Illinois, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of 'A Schedule of Reasonable Maximum Rates of Charges for the Transportation of Passengers and Freight and Cars,' together with a classification of freight, explanatory, and forming a part, of said schedule, revised and prepared by the railroad and warehouse commission for the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Company; that said 'Classification of Freight' and schedule has been published as required by law in the Illinois State Journal, a weekly newspaper published in the city of Springfield, in said state, in the issues of said paper dated, respectively, September 3, 10, 17, and 24, and October 1, A. D. 1878, as revised, and was in force from and after September 1, A. D. 1878, and remained in force until December 1, A. D. 1881. Witness our hands this 7th day of February, A. D. 1891. John R. Wheeler, Isaac N. Phillips, W. R. Crim, Railroad and Warehouse Commissioners. Attest: J. H. Paddock, Secretary."

This certificate shows that publication of both the classification and the schedule was made, not only for three successive weeks, but for five successive weeks, and that, consequently, the provision in section 8 as to publication was fully complied with. The trial court was authorized to admit it, and, when admitted, it was "prima facie evidence of the schedules of said commissioners." At the close of plaintiff's evidence the defendant introduced another certificate of the commissioners, dated December 1, 1891, and other evidence, for the purpose of showing that the classification of freights, which recited on its face that it formed a part of each schedule, was published on September 3, 10, and 17, and that the schedule for appellant, which refers to the classification as forming a part of it, was published on September 17 and 24, and October 1. The classification was published three successive weeks, and the schedule was published three successive weeks; but the point is made that, as the schedule referred to the classification, the latter was a part of the former, and that when the schedule was published, on September 17, 24, and October 1, the classification should have been published, as a part of it, and in the same issues of the newspaper with it. As the classification was for all the railroads, and a schedule was made for each, it is a question whether it was necessary to republish the classification with each schedule, it having already been published for the time required by law. The classification was on file in the office of the commissioners, and the schedules referred to it, and the roads could have access to it. The certificate, however, as above set forth, was merely prima facie evidence that the schedule introduced was that of the commissioners. Other evidence might be introduced to show that it was their schedule. This evidence was furnished by the defendant itself. Its own proof showed that the copy introduced was a copy of the schedule prepared and adopted for it by the commissioners. It is not contended that the defendant did not have notice of the schedule of September, 1878, irrespective of any publication of it.

But even if it be true that the schedule could not go into effect until it was published in the manner required by the law, and that the separate publication of the classification and the schedule was not in compliance with section 8, we still think that the certificate above set forth was sufficient. The case below was not tried until November 80, 1891. By act approved June 30, 1885, the legislature amended said section 8, and in the amended section provided as follows: "All such schedules heretofore or hereafter made shall be received and held in all such suits as prima facie the schedules of said commissioners without further proof than the production of the schedule desired to be used as evidence, with a certificate of the railroad and warehouse commissioners, that the same is a true copy of a schedule prepared by them for the railroad company or corporation therein named." 8 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. p. 1029. The certificate of February 7, 1891, conforms to the requirement of section 8, as thus amended. No man or corporation has a vested right in the rules of evidence. They pertain to the remedies provided by the state for its citizens, and do not constitute a part of any contract. They are subject to control and modification by the legislature, whether affecting proof of existing rights, or rights subsequently acquired. Changes in them may be made applicable to existing causes of action. Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 451; Gage v. Caraher, 125 Ill. 447.

7. Appellee assigns as a cross-error the overruling of his demurrer to the sixth plea of the defendant. This plea was to the last additional count of the amended declaration, and averred that the causes of action therein set out did not accrue to the plaintiff within five years next before the filing, or the obtaining of leave to file, said last additional count, or the substitute therefor. The question is whether the amendment, or the last count of the amended declaration, sets up a new cause of action. If it does, the demurrer to the plea was properly overruled. If it does not, the amendment takes effect from the commencement of the suit. Where an amendment sets up no new matter or claim, but merely restates in a different form the cause of action set out in the original declaration, it relates to the commencement of the suits, and the statute of limitations is arrested, at that point; but, where the amendment introduces a new or different cause of action, it is treated as a fresh suit, begun at the time when such amendment is filed, and the statute is arrested at the latter date. Baker v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 34 Mo. App. 98. In this case the two counts of the original declaration, and all the additional counts of the amended declaration, except the last, sought to recover the treble damages allowed by the statute for a violation of its provisions; and to these counts the two years statute of limitations was properly pleaded, as, in this state, actions for a statutory penalty must be brought within two years next after the cause of action accrued. The last amended count, filed more than seven years after the filing of the original declaration, sought to recover damages for the violation of defendant's common law liability as a carrier for charging more than reasonable rates. To this count the five years statute of limitations was applicable. It is conceded by appellee that he cannot recover treble damages for unreasonable charges, except for those paid by him during the two years prior to the beginning of the suit, and that the object of the amended count is to recover single damages for the three years immediately preceding the two years for which treble damages are claimed. We think that the amended count introduced a new cause of action. The original declaration declares specially on the statute for the recovery of a statutory penalty; alleges, on the ground of action, the charge of rates in excess of those fixed by the schedule of the commissioner; and concludes: "Whereby, and by force of the statute, . . . an action hath accrued . . . to demand and recover of the defendant three times the amount of said sum of money," etc., "with reasonable attorney's fee, in a sum to be fixed by the court." The amended count is based on an alleged common law liability, or on an implied contract to repay money obtained by wrongful overcharges. Before it was filed the cause of action set forth in it had been barred by the five years statute of limitations. If a new suit had been begun for the same cause of action at the time of the amendment, it could not have been maintained, and there is no more reason why the cause of action should be enforced when embodied in an amended declaration than when forming the subject-matter of a new suit. Although an amendment may properly be allowed, it does not necessarily, when allowed, have the effect of relating back to the date of bringing the suit, for the purpose of determining questions of limitation. An amendment which introduces a cause of action barred by limitation is ineffectual to avoid the statutory bar. Gibbons v. The Steamboat "Fanny Barker." 40 Mo. 258; Baker v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. supra; People v. Judge of Newaygo Circuit Ct. 27 Mich. 138; Melvin v. Smith, 19 N. H. 462; Illinois & St. L. R. & Coal Co. v. People, 19 Ill. App. 141. Where the original declaration sets up overcharges upon certain shipments, and the amended declaration sets up overcharges on other and different shipments, the causes of action are not the same. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Cobb, 64 Ill. 140; Phelps v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 94 Ill. 548; North Chicago Rolling Mill Co. v. Monka, 107 Ill. 840. Here the original declaration seeks to recover penalties for overcharges on shipments made subsequent to November 2, 1880, while the last additional count of the amended declaration declares for damages on account of overcharges on shipments made prior to October 17, 1880. We are of the opinion that there was no error in overruling the demurrer to the sixth plea.

One or two other minor objections are urged, but, after a careful consideration of them, we are satisfied that they are not well taken.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

George BURDICK, Plff. in Err.,

v.

PEOPLE of the State of Illinois.

(149 Ill. 600.)

1. A statute making it unlawful for any person to sell a railroad or steamboat ticket, or any part thereof, without a certificate from the carrier, except in case of the sale of part of a ticket by a person who has bought it with the bona fide intention of traveling upon it, does not violate the constitutional provision against deprivation of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.
2. The obligation of contracts is not impaired as to tickets thereafter issued by a statute restricting the sale thereof without a certificate of authority from the carrier.
3. The regulation of the sale of tickets on railroads and steamboats, which makes such sale unlawful without a certificate of authority from the carrier, is not a regulation of commerce beyond the power of a state legislature, but is a mere police regulation of a public employment.

4. The privileges or immunities of citizens under the Federal Constitution or under the constitution of Illinois, which provides that the general assembly shall not pass special laws granting any special or exclusive privilege, immunity, or franchise, are not infringed by a statute prohibiting the sale of railroad or steamboat tickets without a certificate of authority from the carrier, except when one who has bought a ticket from such agent with the bona fide intention of traveling upon it makes the sale.

(April 2, 1894.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Jackson County to review a judgment convicting defendant upon an indictment for selling railroad tickets contrary to the provisions of the statute. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hill & Martin, for plaintiff in error:

If it is true that railroad companies may legally sell to any person any number of tickets or other certificates entitling any holder to travel over their roads, then certainly unless these tickets are limited to the use of the purchaser, he, the purchaser, owns said tickets—they are his property. And it will not do to say that they are only evidence of the holder's right to travel, and not the right itself, for the same may be said of a promissory note, it is only evidence of indebtedness, and yet all the courts have held that the legal holder of such promissory note has a property therein. Why should the legal holder of a railroad ticket occupy a different position?

If a railroad ticket is property, then the general assembly has no authority under the constitution or the common law to pass an act depriving the holder of such property from selling it to whom he pleases.

Every citizen shall hold his property and immunities under the general rules which

NOTE—Statutes against ticket brokerage or "scalping."

While it was held in State v. Ray (N. C.) 14 L. R. A. 529, that the sale of a single ticket by the owner because he was unable to use it did not constitute an offense under statute making it unlawful for any person "to sell or deal in tickets," the language of the Illinois statute construed in the above case is too plain to permit its construction so as to exempt the sale of a single ticket therefrom.

An Indiana statute similar to that of Illinois, considered in the main case of BURDICK v. PEOPLE, was assailed in Fry v. State, 63 Ind. 552, 30 Am. Rep. 238. This was, we believe, the first statute of the kind. It provided that none but authorized agents should sell tickets and that no purchaser should sell an unused ticket or portion of it to any one except a bona fide traveler. Also that the carrier must redeem such unused tickets. The statute was attacked as unconstitutional as a denial of equal privileges and immunities and also as a restriction of commerce an impairment of the obligation of contracts, but the court held it constitutional at least as to subsequent contracts against all these objections and declared it to be an exercise of police power.

upheld against similar objections in State v. Corbett (Minn.) post, p. 498.

That tickets sold by brokers at rates lower than those charged at regular offices of the carrier constitute an unlawful discrimination under the interstate commerce act of congress was decided by the interstate commerce commission in Re Passenger Tariffs and Rate War, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 340, and the opinion therein by Judge Cooley reviews at length and vigorously the evils of the scalping system.

A recommendation of the commission for legislation to prevent those evils may be found in the annual report of the interstate commerce commission, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 360, and is also recited in Ray on Passenger Carriers, pp. 491-496.

As to the constitutional privileges and immunities of citizens which is one of the grounds of attack on these statutes, see note to Louisville Safety Vault & T. Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Ky.) 14 L. R. A. 579.

The assignability of railroad tickets is considered in Nichols v. Southern Pac. Co. (Or.) 18 L. R. A. 55, and in the note to that case, but the effect of a statute like that of Illinois was not considered nor involved in the cases there presented. B. A. R.

govern society. Everything which may pass under the form of an enactment is not the law of the land.

The terms "the law of the land" and "due process," as used in the constitution, do not mean a statute passed for the purpose of interfering with property. That construction would, in effect, say to the legislative body, you cannot deprive a man of his property unless you pass a statute for that purpose. In other words, you shall not violate the constitution and deprive a man of his property, unless you choose to do it.

Taylor v. Porter, 4 Hill, 140, 40 Am. Dec. 274; Ervin's App. 16 Pa. 256, 55 Am. Dec. 499; Arrowsmith v. Burlingame, 4 McLean, 489; Lane v. Dorman, 4 Ill. 2-8, 36 Am. Dec. 543; Hoke v. Henderson, 15 N.C. 15, 25 Am. Dec. 677.

Defendant in this case had a vested right in the tickets which it is alleged he sold.

The act is also in contravention of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that the state shall pass no law impairing the obligation of a contract.

Fed. Const. art. 1, § 10.

The railroad company has the right to sell such tickets, and the defendant had the right to buy, but the law purports to prohibit the defendant from selling the same after they are purchased. This act certainly impairs the obligation of such contract.

McCruken v. Hayward, 43 U. S. 2 How. 612, 11 L. ed. 399; Ogden v. Saunders, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 259, 6 L. ed. 621; Von Baumbach v. Bade, 9 Wis. 577, 76 Am. Dec. 283; Johnson v. Higgins, 3 Met. (Ky.) 566.

Mrs. s. Maurice T. Mahoney, J. W. Herbert, W. S. Forrest, and M. Rosenthal, for the people.

Magruder, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This was an indictment against plaintiff in error for wrongfully and unlawfully selling to one L. H. Myers one certain railroad ticket, entitling the holder thereof to travel upon the Illinois Central Railroad from Cairo, in Illinois, to Chicago, in the same state, in violation of the following statute of Illinois:

"An act to prevent frauds upon travelers and owner or owners of any railroad, steamboat or other conveyance for the transportation of passengers. Approved April 19, 1875. In force July 1, 1875.

"Section 1. Be it enacted by the people of the state of Illinois, represented in the general assembly: That it shall be the duty of the owner or owners of any railroad or steamboat for the transportation of passengers, to provide each agent who may be authorized to sell tickets or other certificates entitling the holder to travel upon any railroad or steamboat, with a certificate setting forth the authority of such agent to make such sales, which certificate shall be duly attested by the corporate seal of the owner of such railroad or steamboat.

"Sec. 2. That it shall not be lawful for any person not possessed of such authority, so evidenced, to sell, barter, or transfer for any consideration whatever, the whole or any part of any ticket or tickets, passes, or other evidences of the holder's title to travel on any railroad or steamboat, whether the same be situated, operated or owned, within or without the limits of this state.

"Sec. 3. That any person or persons violating the provisions of the second section of this act shall be deemed guilty of misdemeanor, and shall be liable to be punished by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, and by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or either or both, in the discretion of the court in which such person or persons shall be convicted.

"Sec. 4. That it shall be the duty of every agent who shall be authorized to sell tickets, or parts of tickets, or other evidences of the holder's title to travel, to exhibit to any person desiring to purchase a ticket, or to any officer of the law who may request him, the certificate of his authority thus to sell, and to keep said certificate posted in a conspicuous place in his office for the information of travelers.

"Sec. 5. That it shall be the duty of the owner or owners of railroad or steamboat, by their agents or managers, to provide for the redemption of the whole, or any parts or coupons of any ticket or tickets, as they may have sold, as the purchaser, for any reason, has not used, and does not desire to use, at a rate which shall be equal to the difference between the price paid for the whole ticket and the cost of a ticket between the points for which the proportion of said ticket was actually used; and the sale by any person of the unused portion of any ticket, otherwise than by the presentation of the same for redemption, as provided for in this section, shall be deemed to be a violation of the provisions of this act, and shall be punished as is hereinbefore provided; provided, that this act shall not prohibit any person who has purchased a ticket from any agent authorized by this act, with the bona fide intention of traveling upon the same, from selling any part of the same to any other person.

"Sec. 6. Any railroad or steamboat company that shall, by any of its ticket agents in this state, refuse to redeem any of its tickets or parts of tickets as prescribed in section 5 of this Act, shall pay a fine of five hundred dollars for each offense, to the people of the state of Illinois, and it shall be unlawful for said company, subsequent to such refusal, to sell any ticket or tickets in this state until such fine is paid." 2 Starr & C. Stat. p. 1951.

The defendant, before pleading to the indictment, moved to quash it, upon the alleged ground that said act was in contravention of the constitutions of the United States and of the state of Illinois; but said motion was overruled, and exception taken. The court refused to give for the defendant an instruction to the effect that said act was in contravention of said constitutions, and therefore, void, to which refusal defendant excepted. The jury found the defendant guilty. Motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment were overruled, to which exception was taken; and judgment was entered upon the verdict, fining defendant $500, to which, also, exception was taken. The subject presented for consideration is the constitutionality of the above act, and we will consider the objections to its validity in the order in which they are presented by the counsel for the plaintiff in error in their brief.

1. It is contended that the act violates section 2 of article 2 of the Constitution of Illinois, which provides that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law," and that it also violates the provisions of a similar character in the Federal Constitution. U. S. Const. arts. 5, 14, Amend., 1 Starr & C. Stat. pp. 86, 88, 89. The position of counsel is that, when a man purchases tickets or other certificates entitling the holder to travel upon any railroad, etc., as stated in the act, such tickets are his property, and that the legislature has no authority to pass an act depriving the holder of such property of the right to sell it to whom he pleases. The constitution does not say that the disposition of property may not be limited or regulated when the interests of the public so require, but that no person shall be "deprived" of his property without due process of law. The phrase "due process of law" is the equivalent of the words "law of the land," as used in Magna Charta, and means "in the due course of legal proceedings according to those rules and forms which have been established for the protection of private rights." Board of Education of the State v. Bakewell, 122 Ill. 339; Rhinehart v. Schuyler, 7 Ill. 473; Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 24 L. ed. 616; Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed.* 356, top p. 435. An act of the legislature is not necessarily the "law of the land." A state cannot make anything "due process of law" which, by its own legislation, it declares to be such. An act of the legislature which transfers the property of one man to another without his consent is not a constitutional exercise of legislative power, because, if effectual, it operates to deprive a man of his property without "due process of law." Davidson v. New Orleans, supra; Taylor v. Porter, 4 Hill, 140, 40 Am. Dec. 274; Rohn v. Harris, 180 Ill. 525; Erwins's App. 16 Pa. 256, 55 Am. Dec. 499; Hoke v. Henderson, 15 N. C. 1, 25 Am. Dec. 677.

If, therefore, the above Act of 1875 operates to deprive the holder of a legally purchased ticket of his property rights therein, it must be declared to be void. But, upon turning to section 5 of the Act, we find that it authorizes the original purchaser of a ticket from an authorized agent to resell the whole or any unused part of such ticket to the owner of the railroad or steamboat who sold it to him, or to sell any part of it to any other person, if the original purchase of it from the agent was with the bona fide intention of traveling upon it. The purchaser is entitled to have his ticket redeemed by the railroad or steamboat owner at a rate fixed by the terms of section 5, but his right of sale is not even limited to such owner, provided, only, his purchase was made in the mode and for the purpose stated in the proviso to the section. In view of the provisions contained in sections 5 and 6, we fail to see how the owner of the ticket is deprived of his property in it. His ticket is not destroyed, nor is there any serious limitation upon his use of it. The design of the act, as stated in its title, is to prevent frauds upon travelers and owners of railroads, steamboats, and other conveyances for the transportation of passengers. The business of a common carrier is a public employment. The franchisees of railroads acting under charters or acts of incorporation are of a public nature, so far as the safety, convenience, and comfort of passengers are concerned. Reasonable regulations affecting the conduct of such public employments are fit subjects for legislative action. The lawmaking power may provide means for remedying such evils as, in its opinion, may exist in the management of these public agencies of transportation; and in doing so it may sometimes impose restrictions, which are deemed to be necessary, upon the use and enjoyment of property. A man is not deprived of his property unless it is taken away from him, so that he is divested of his title and possession. To limit the use and enjoyment of property by legislative action is not to take it away from the owner, when the property whose use and enjoyment are so limited is invested in a business affected with a public use, or is used as an accessory in carrying on such business. Munn v. People, 69 Ill. 80; Com. v. Wilson, 14, Phila. 384. We are therefore of the opinion that the act under consideration does not violate section 2 of the Bill of Rights.

2. The act is alleged to contravene the provisions of the federal and state constitutions which forbid the passage of laws impairing the obligation of contracts. U. S. Const. art. 1, § 10; Ill. Const. art. 2, § 14, 1 Starr & C. Stat. pp. 81, 105. The tickets proven to have been sold by the plaintiff in error contain only the name of the railroad company, the words "Calro to Chicago," the signature of the general ticket agent, and certain figures or numbers. It has been held that such a ticket is not a contract, but merely the evidence of a contract, or a mere receipt taken or voucher adopted for convenience, to show that the passenger has paid his fare from one place to another. Logan v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 77 Mo. 663; 2 Redf. Railways, 6th ed. p. 303; Ray Negligence of Imposed Duties, p. 495; Com. v. Wilson, supra. But, if it be admitted that the ticket is a contract, the statute would only be inoperative and of no effect as to contracts existing at the time of its passage. It would be valid and constitutional as to future contracts. It cannot be said that the Act of 1875 impaired the obligation of any contract connected with the tickets upon the sale of which the present indictment is predicated. The tickets sold by plaintiff in error were issued by the railroad company in 1893,—eighteen years after the passage of the act. The plaintiff in error must be presumed to have known that the sales of the tickets by him were criminal acts. Fry v. State, 63 Ind. 552, 30 Am. Rep. 238; Com. v. Wilson, supra.

3. The act is charged with contravening the third clause of section 8 of article 1 of the Federal Constitution, which confers upon congress the power to regulate commerce among the several states. 1 Starr & C. Stat. p. 80. In the present case the tickets sold only entitled the holder to travel between points located wholly within the state of Illinois. But the portion of the act upon which the present objection is founded is the prohibition contained in the second section, against the sale of tickets entitling the holder to travel on any railroad or steamboat, "whether the same be situated, operated, or owned within or without the limits of this state." It is held by the Supreme Court of the United States that interstate commerce, the regulation of which is within the exclusive power of congress, includes interstate transportation of passengers. But the deposit in congress of the power to regulate commerce between the states was not intended to deprive the states of their police power. Under its police power, a state may legislate to promote domestic order, morals, and safety; to protect the lives, limbs, quiet, and property of all persons within the state; to secure the general comfort, health, and property of the state; to prevent crime, pauperism, disturbance of the peace, and all forms of social evils. The state cannot invade the domain of the national government, or assume powers properly belonging to congress. In relation to the subject of commerce, including interstate passenger travel, the state cannot place any obstacle in the way of such travel, or impose any burden upon it. But many acts of a state may affect or influence commerce without amounting to a regulation of it. State legislation, which is not an obstacle to interstate commerce, and imposes no burden upon it, and which comes within a proper exercise of the police power, is not unconstitutional, as infringing upon the powers of congress. The Act of 1875 is, we think, such a species of state legislation. The duties which it imposes upon the carriers therein named, and their agents, cannot interfere with the freedom of interstate travel. Such travel is not impeded because tickets are required to be purchased from agents of the carrier who are provided with certificates of their authority. The limitation of the sale of tickets to such agents may be a restraint upon the business of scalpers and ticket brokers, but cannot be regarded as a burden upon interstate commerce. If the body of the Act of 1875 be read in connection with its title, it must have been the opinion of the legislature that the restriction of sales of tickets to authorized agents was necessary to prevent frauds upon travelers and carriers, and to remedy the evils growing out of the practices of scalpers and ticket brokers, as described by Mr. Ray in his work on Negligence of Imposed Duties, Passenger Carriers, at pages from 491 to 498, inclusive. Viewed in this light, the act in question amounts to nothing more than the regulation of a public employment under the police power of the state. The business of the carrier being a proper subject for the exercise of the police power, its necessary incidents and adjuncts are also subject thereto. As the issuing and use of tickets are required in such business, their sale is an incident thereof, and may be regulated by legislative action. It is the province of the legislature to determine the nature and character of such regulations, and the judiciary is not called upon to consider whether they are wise or unwise. The views herein expressed are sustained by the following authorities: Fry v. State, and Com. v. Wilson, supra; People v. Walser, 11 Chicago Legal News, 12; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Huss, 95 U. S. 465, 24 L. ed. 527; Patterson v. Kentucky, 97 U. S. 501, 24 L. ed. 1115; Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. * 574, 597. We do not think that the act violates the constitutional provision conferring upon congress the power to regulate interstate commerce.

4. It is claimed that the act violates that part of section 22 of article 4 of the Constitution of Illinois which provides that the general assembly shall not pass special laws "granting to any corporation, association, or individual any special or exclusive privilege, immunity or franchise whatever." 1 Starr & C. Stat. pp. 119, 120. Counsel contend that by the terms of the act a certain class of persons, namely, railroad ticket agents, are permitted to sell tickets, and are thereby granted a special privilege. We do not think that there is any force in this contention. It is disposed of by what has already been said in regard to the validity of the act as an exercise of the police power of the state. The requirement that tickets shall only be sold by agents authorized so to do is merely a police regulation as to the manner in which the business of the carrier shall be conducted. From the nature of things, only common carriers can, in the first instance, issue or sell tickets for passage in their own conveyances, or over their own lines. They have no more a monopoly of the ticket business than a manufacturer has of the articles which he manufactures. The authority to the agent is not an authority to sell tickets generally for all other carriers, but only to sell them for the particular carrier providing the certificate of authority. The act would seem to impose upon the carrier a burden, and not to grant a privilege or immunity, as the repurchase of unused tickets is required; and, in order to prevent frauds, the sale of tickets can only be made through agents authorized to sell in the particular mode designated by the statute. Substantially the same phraseology contained in section 1 of the present Act, to which counsel object as amounting to special legislation, is to be found in an act passed by the legislature of Indiana, which was upheld by the supreme court of that state, as being consistent with a constitutional requirement forbidding the legislative grant of exclusive privileges or immunities to any citizen or class of citizens. Fry v. State, supra. We see no good reason for adopting a different conclusion. Nor can it be said that the law abridges "the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." U. S. Const. art. 14, § 1, Amend., 1 Starr & C. Stat. p. 88. The privileges or immunities referred to in the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution are those which are fundamental, such as "protection by the government; the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind, and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety; subject, nevertheless, to such restraints as the government may justly prescribe for the general good of the whole." No privilege or immunity of the plaintiff in error has been abridged by the Act of 1875. The right of conducting the business of selling railroad and steamboat tickets is curtailed and hedged about by certain restrictions, which the legislature deemed necessary to prevent frauds upon travelers and public carriers. But these restrictions amount only to "such restraints as the government may justly prescribe for the general good of the whole." Coryfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C. 871, Fed. Cas. No. 3,280; Slaughter-House Cases, 88 U. S. 16 Wall. 86, 21 L. ed. 894. In the case at bar, our conclusion is that the statute of this state, above quoted, is not in conflict with the Federal Constitution, or with the constitution of the state, but was a legitimate exercise by the legislature of the police powers of the state. Accordingly, we hold that no error was committed by the court below in its rulings above indicated.

Phillips, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

appellate court of the first district affirming a decree of the circuit court of Cook county. The facts on which the decree dismissing the bill was based are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the appellate court, by Mornin, J., which is as follows: "The bill in this case was filed to restrain and prevent encroachment upon appellants' rights, as abutting owners and occupiers of the Union Passenger Station and grounds, situated on the east side of South Canal street in Chicago. The bill claims that at common law, and under the ordinances of the city, complainants are entitled to have the space in front of said station grounds, from the east line of the street west to the center line thereof, kept free, and unobstructed by, and clear of, solicitors, hotel runners, and drivers of all vehicles, and persons not in the employ of complainants, and engaged in the prosecution and management of the business of said stations. Alleges that the mayor, chief of police, etc., have assumed, in their official capacity, and against the will of complainants, to give express drivers and hotel runners the right and privilege of standing in front of said passenger station, and east of the center line of said Canal street, and soliciting employment, and have assumed to direct policemen on duty at said station not to interfere with or arrest such persons for so doing; that, by reason thereof, persons, in large numbers, gather in front of said station. And near the east line of said street, and, in loud tones of voice, solicit business for hotels, express wagons, and other vehicles, thereby obstructing the street and sidewalks in front of said stations, and annoying the occupants of said building, and the throng of passengers going to and from said station; that defendant Cheevers and Geary are among the persons so acting, and that they combine with others, and threaten to continue to violate complainants' rights. The prayer is that the mayor, chief of police, etc., be restrained from giving, against complainants' will, permission to any persons to stand, or to stand any vehicle, in front of complainants' station, east of the center line of said Canal street, there to solicit or wait for employment, and that said Cheevers and Geary be enjoined from acting under any permission granted by any official to stand in front of said station, and there wait for or solicit employment, and that said injunction be made perpetual, etc. The bill was answered by the defendants, a temporary injunction denied, and the matter referred to the master, to take proofs and report his conclusions. The master reported against granting the relief prayed, and, on a hearing of exceptions to his report, the same was confirmed, and the bill ordered by the court to be dismissed for want of equity. The master has stated in his report, which we find in the record, the conclusions as to law and fact reached by him, with clearness and force; and an examination of the record, and consideration of the arguments presented in the briefs of counsel, has led us to the conviction that the result reached by him, and, as to the substantial questions in the case, approved by the court, is correct. The master states that he finds and concludes that the manner in which said business of soliciting passengers for their patronage, for hotels and express wagons, is conducted, is a nuisance as to such passengers, and to the public, but that such conduct on the part of said expressmen and hotel runners does not interfere with the railroad company in discharge of its duties, and as a common carrier of freight and passengers, and does not deprive it of free access to the street in front of its depot, and does not interrupt or hinder its business, and that such nuisance is not a nuisance to the railroad company in such a manner that it is specially and peculiarly injured thereby, aside from annoyance suffered by the traveling public patronizing its depot and road. The whole effect of the testimony is that the only detriment to the railroad company, from the manner of conducting their business by the hotel runners and expressmen, is through annoyance caused to passengers entering and departing from said depot; and it is argued that from such annoyance the business of the company is injuriously affected, in that passengers will avoid patronizing a depot or railroad, in order to patronize which they have to expose themselves to such annoyance. I conclude, as a matter of law, that such annoyance and indirect injury does not constitute such a nuisance as a court of equity will enjoin, but that, in order to lay the basis for equitable relief, it is necessary to show that the complainant is injured in its property rights by the obstruction or interference with its easement and right to an uninterrupted use of the public street in front of its premises; and such detriment and annoyance as it suffers in common with the public, and which is only indirect, must be left to the public authorities to regulate and control, and cannot be remedied by a court of equity on the application of one, as a member of the public, even though he may suffer more than the majority of others from the existence. It is needless to discuss the numerous authorities cited by the learned counsel for appellants, which it is claimed establish a rule for this case contrary to that stated by the master. Each one will be found to depend for its decision upon special and peculiar circumstances and conditions, which do not exist in this case. Such occupation or obstruction of a public street as will entitle an owner of land abutting thereon to the aid of a court of equity to abate must be shown to be such as works an injury to him, not merely greater in degree than that sustained by others of the general public, but such as is special and peculiar in its effects upon him in relation to the use and enjoyment of his property. Such a case is not made out by this record, and the decree dismissing the bill for want of equity must therefore be affirmed."

We have examined the argument of counsel for appellants in support of the errors assigned on the record here, and are of opinion that the decree dismissing the bill was properly entered. We are satisfied that the reasons for affirmance of that decree are sufficiently stated in the foregoing opinion.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

George McALISTER et al.

Benjamin F. BURGESS, Executor, etc., of Jane D. Royce, Deceased.

(..... Mass. ....)

1. A gift for the benefit of poor churches of a city and vicinity is charitable within the exception to the rule of law against perpetuities.
2. It is a matter of common knowledge that the attendants of any particular church are not limited to its members, but are an indefinite and varied number.
3. There is no uncertainty which will defeat a gift for the benefit of poor churches of a city and vicinity.

(May 15, 1894.)

RESERVATION by the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County for the consideration of the full court of a bill filed to nullify the residuary clause of the will of Jane D. Royce, deceased, as being void for creating a perpetuity. Bill dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—For uncertainty and indefiniteness as to beneficiaries of charity as affecting validity of gift, see Johnson v. Johnson (Tenn.) 22 L. R. A. 179, and cases referred to in footnote.

Messrs. Robert M. Morse and Charles E. Hellier, for complainants:

The words "for the benefit of" may be sufficient to create a trust.

Going v. Emery, 16 Pick. 107, 26 Am. Dec. 645; Nichols v. Allen, 130 Mass. 211, 39 Am. Rep. 445.

No question is made that "in this commonwealth trusts for the support of public worship and religious instruction, or the spreading of religion at home or abroad, have always been deemed charitable uses."

Jackson v. Phillips, 14 Allen, 539, citing Bartlett v. King, 12 Mass. 537, 7 Am. Dec. 99; Going v. Emery, supra; Sohier v. St. Paul's Church, 12 Met. 250.

But it is equally well settled that a church or religious society in this commonwealth is a voluntary association, formed for the use of its members or pewholders, and of such persons as may become members or pewholders; that it does not differ essentially from other voluntary associations organized for other good purposes, and that a gift for its benefit cannot be upheld as a public charity.

Atty-Gen. v. Federal Street Meeting-House in Boston Proprs. 3 Gray, 1; Atty-Gen. v. Trinity Church, 9 Allen, 422; Atty-Gen. v. Old South Soc. 13 Allen, 474; Old South Soc. v. Crocker, 119 Mass. 1, 20 Am. Rep. 299.

Assuming, then, that a gift for the benefit of a particular church cannot be supported as a public charity, it must follow that a gift for the benefit of all the churches in a particular place is open to the same objection.

The case falls within the principle laid down in Kent v. Dunham, 143 Mass. 216, 56 Am. Rep. 667, where it was held that a devise for the benefit of the destitute descendants of the testator was invalid as a public charity.

Such a gift is too vague to be capable of execution.

Nichols v. Allen, supra; Chamberlain v. Stearns, 111 Mass. 287.

Mr. D. C. Linseott for defendants.

Barker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By the residuary clause of her will, the testatrix gives property, which is said to be about $20,000 in value, "to the Evangelical Baptist Benevolent and Missionary Society, for the benefit of poor churches of the city of Boston and vicinity." The respondent corporation of that name was chartered by Stat. 1857, chap. 154, "for the purpose of securing the constant maintenance in said Boston of evangelical preaching for the young and the destitute, with free seats; for the employment of colporteur and missionary laborers in Boston and elsewhere; for the purpose of providing suitable central apartments to other and kindred benevolent and missionary societies, and for the general purpose of ministering to the spiritual wants of the needy and destitute." The bill is brought by the next of kin of the testatrix, who contend that the residuary clause is void because creating a trust contrary to the rule against perpetuities, and because the clause is so indefinite and uncertain that its provisions cannot be carried out; and they ask that the executor be directed to pay the residuary fund to the next of kin of the testatrix, in accordance with the laws of distribution. The attorney-general has been made a party, and, by his answer, claims that a valid public charity was created by the clause quoted. The Evangelical Baptist Benevolent & Missionary Society contends that the clause gives it the residue of the estate as an absolute gift, adding that if it shall be decided that the gift was not absolute, but in trust for the benefit of poor churches in Boston and vicinity, it will accept and administer the trust, and contends that on either construction of the clause the bequest is valid. The executor takes no position upon the question whether the gift is absolute or in trust, but demurs on the ground that the bequest is a valid one, and that the next of kin have no right to claim the fund as undivided property.

A gift of property, to be lawfully applied for the benefit of an indefinite number of persons, by bringing their minds or hearts under the influence of religion, is a charity in the legal sense, within the terms of the definition given in Jackson v. Phillips, 14 Allen, 539, 556. As held in Baker v. Fales, 16 Mass. 488, 495: "The very term 'church' imports an organization for religious purposes, and property given to it eo nomine in the absence of all declaration of trust or use, must, by necessary implication, be intended to be given to promote the purposes for which a church is instituted, the most prominent of which is the public worship of God." It follows that the legitimate use by a church of property so given must result in its application for the benefit of those who attend upon, or are within the sphere of the influence of, the services of the church, by bringing them under the influence of religion. It is a matter of common knowledge that the individuals who attend the services of any particular church are not limited to the members of that church, but are an indefinite and varying number of persons; and there can be no question that an indefinite number of persons is constantly benefited by having their minds and hearts brought under the influence of religion by poor churches of the city of Boston and vicinity. Grants and donations both of real and personal estate may, consistently with existing laws, be made to churches, and provision is made by the statute law for the manner in which such grants and donations shall be held. Pub. Stat. chap. 89, §§ 1-8. There seems to be no reason, therefore, why a gift of property to one or more churches should not be held a charitable gift, and none why, if it is given in trust, the trust should not be held a trust for a public charity, and not subject to the rule of law against perpetuities.

The plaintiffs contend, however, that it is settled by a course of decisions that in this commonwealth a church is a voluntary association, of such a nature that a gift for its benefit cannot be upheld as public charity, and they cite as authority for this contention the cases of Atty-Gen. v. Federal Street Meeting-House in Boston Proprs. 3 Gray, 1; Atty-Gen. v. Trinity Church, 9 Allen, 423; Atty-Gen. v. Old South Soc. 18 Allen, 474; and Old South Soc. v. Crocker, 119 Mass. 1, 20 Am. Rep. 299. In none of these cases, however, was it contended that the gifts or devises were void. In the first of these cases the property which the attorney-general contended was held as a public charity was not the property of a church, but of the proprietors of a meeting-house; nor was it the proceeds of a gift, but of a purchase for full consideration. In the second case there was a gift by devise of land to the Rector and church wardens of King's Chapel, and their successors in office, upon several distinct trusts, one of which was to pay a stated yearly sum forever to the church; another, to pay a yearly sum for the support of a course of sermons to be preached in the church building during every Lent; and another, to pay a fixed sum yearly at the door of the church building, on certain days in Lent, for the use of the poor, by way of a contribution. The two latter gifts were held to be clearly of the nature of public charities; but the first was not held void, and the reason why the information or bill was dismissed was because there had been no failure in the due execution of the trusts, and no occasion existed for the intervention of the court. The practical result of the decision was that a church held for its own use a large surplus coming from the devised property, and not needed to execute the specific public charitable trusts created by the will. The case is therefore an authority in favor of the validity of gifts for a church, as well those for its private use as those which are clearly public charities. In Atty-Gen. v. Old South Soc. supra, no question of the validity of a gift to a church, or in trust for the benefit of a church, was raised or considered; and the only doctrine there held which may be considered as at all bearing upon the present case was that the sacramental contributions of the society, which was not a church, but a religious corporation, were not impressed with the character of a public charity. In Old South Soc. v. Crocker, supra, the two conveyances by Madame Norton were not to a church, but to certain persons named, and their associates; and the purpose of the conveyance was not for general church purposes, but for the erection of a meeting-house and of a dwelling for the minister, while her devise, although to the "Third Church of Christ in Boston," was not for the general purposes of the church, but "for the use of the ministry in the said church, successively, forever." While it was held that no public charity was created by the deeds or the devise, it was also held that a trust not obnoxious to the rule of law against perpetuities was created by them. The case is certainly not an authority for the position that a gift for the benefit of a church, simpliciter, is not a public charity, and is an authority that a devise to a church for the use of the ministry in the church, forever, is a good devise. In our opinion, a gift to a church, without restrictions as to the use to be made of the property, is a gift to be applied for the promotion of public worship and of religious instruction, which must necessarily influence other than church members, and has all the elements of a public charity.

If, as contended by the Evangelical Baptist Benevolent & Missionary Society, the gift is not in trust, but is an absolute one to that corporation, there can be, of course, no question of its validity on the ground that it is obnoxious to the rule against perpetuities. It is not now necessary to decide whether the gift is absolute, or in trust. That question depends upon whether the testatrix used the words, "for the benefit of poor churches of Boston and vicinity," as a further description to identify the legatee, or a direction to the legatee to use in a particular branch of its work a fund which she gave to it absolutely, or meant that the bequest was to be used only for the benefit of the churches indicated. Nor, in our opinion, is the gift, whether absolute or conditional, void for uncertainty. It is not contended by the plaintiffs that there are no poor churches in Boston and vicinity, and we see no more practical difficulty in ascertaining the beneficiaries, if the bequest is a trust, than in the case of poor persons, or of deserving charitable institutions, while the territorial designation is sufficiently exact. See Jackson v. Phillips, 14 Allen, 539, 597; Seres v. Chapman, 153 Mass. 400.

It is not necessary now to decide whether, if the bequest is in trust for poor churches of Boston and vicinity, it is a permanent trust, or one which could properly be executed by an immediate distribution of the whole fund. All that we now decide is that the bequest, however it may be construed, is a valid one, and that the next of kin of the testatrix have no right to have the residuary fund, of which it disposes, distributed to them as intestate property.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH CABLE CO.,

Appt.,

v.

Mayor, etc., of BALTIMORE.

(.....Md.....)

An ordinance imposing a tax of $3 on each telegraph, telephone, electric light, or other pole except trolley poles used exclusively for wires of street railways does not violate the right of a telegraph company, which has accepted the provisions of the Act of Congress of July, 1868, giving it the privilege of operating a line over post-roads.

(June 19, 1894.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Baltimore County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover a tax which had been assessed by the plaintiff city upon the poles used by the defendant in its business. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—Power of states to control or impose burdens upon interstate telegraph and telephone companies.

The conclusion to be drawn from all the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States bearing upon the subject seems to be clear that a state cannot impose burdens of any kind whatever upon interstate messages by telegraph or telephone; but that business of such companies, so far as it consists of messages of private individuals between points in the state, is subject to state regulation and taxation. This doctrine runs through the decisions touching the various kinds of state interference and burdens on such business.

In American U. Teleg. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 67 Ala. 26, 48 Am. Rep. 90, a state constitutional provision requiring a foreign corporation to have a known place of business and an authorized agent in the state was held to be a valid police regulation and not an unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce in respect to a foreign telegraph company. But in that case the company had acquired no property nor attempted to construct any line in the state and no interstate business of the United States officers or agents was involved. It would seem under the federal decisions cited below that the company would have the right to engage in interstate business or do business for the government without any interference by the state.

Where the business of a telegraph company is largely interstate and the company has complied with the Act of Congress of July 24, 1868, so as to be entitled to the use of post-roads, a municipal license tax, as a condition precedent to the doing of any business within a municipality, is unconstitutional. Bradford v. Postal Teleg. Co. (Pa.) 11 Ry. & Corp. L. J. 54.

This doctrine was fully established in the case of Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 640, 32 L. ed. 811, reversing Port of Mobile v. Leloup, 76 Ala. 401. The decision of the United States Supreme Court, the source of ultimate authority on the question, was that no municipal license tax could be authorized by a state on a foreign telegraph company acting under the act of congress, where it was engaged in interstate business, if the tax was imposed on the whole business of the company, although a portion

A city ordinance for police regulation is void if it is made a means of revenue.

Vansant v. Harlem Stage Co. of Baltimore, 59 Md. 330; State v. Rowe, 72 Md. 548; Easton Comrs. v. Corey, 74 Md. 263.

A regulation is not a tax.

Western Union Teleg. Co. v. Pendleton, 122 U. S. 359, 30 L. ed. 1187.

A tax is a regulation when applied to means of interstate commerce and is within the prohibition of United States Constitution that prevents any regulation of interstate or foreign commerce without authority of congress.

An ordinance may regulate but not restrain trade.

of such business was entirely within the state. This case establishes clearly the proposition that telegraph business between states is interstate commerce within the constitutional protection against interference.

But a license tax of $500 imposed by a city ordinance as a condition of carrying on business within the city by sending messages between points in the same state, other than messages sent for the United States government, its officers or agents, is not unconstitutional, although the company is also engaged in interstate business. While the interstate business of the company, or that which is done by it for the United States government, cannot be prohibited, or in any respect interfered with by municipal or state authorities, such part of the business of the company as consists of messages for private individuals between points in the same state is subject to state regulation and burdens, although they are not between points within the city, but between that city and other places within the state, so that a license tax or other burden may be imposed in two cities for the same message. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Charleston, 153 U. S. 602, 38 L. ed. 371.

That a city cannot tax the government business of a telegraph company acting under the act of congress is declared in Charleston v. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. (S. C.) 9 Ry. & Corp. L. J. 123, in which it is also held that the authority of a city to impose a license tax on business of a telegraph company wholly or partly within the state does not authorize a tax on all the business of the company within the state.

This subject of licenses appears also under different headings below, in respect to various forms of taxation.

Tax on messages.

Telephone messages sent to other states constitute interstate commerce, which are not subject to state taxation. Re Pennsylvania Teleph. Co. (N. J.) 9 Ry. & Corp. L. J. 112.

A tax on each telegraph message under state authority is unconstitutional, so far as it touches messages between states, or those sent by United States officers or agents, where the company has accepted the Act of Congress of July 24, 1868 (Rev.

But a municipal license tax on messages "to and from points within the state" is not an interference with interstate commerce, although the company is engaged in business over post-roads. Moore v. Bufaula, 97 Ala. 670.

Tax on gross receipts.

A tax by state authority on the gross receipts of a telegraph company, including those from interstate business, was upheld by several state courts which declared that this did not constitute a regulation of commerce. Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Mayer, 28 Ohio St. 521; Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Com. 110 Pa. 406; Western U. Telegr. Co. v. State Board of Assessment, 86 Ala. 273.

The same was held in respect to a municipal tax on such receipts. Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Richmond, 26 Gratt. 1, in which it was also held that the fact that the company had accepted the Act of Congress of 1866 did not exempt it from such tax as a government agency.

But these state decisions were overruled or reversed by decisions of the United States Supreme Court, which fully establish the doctrine that a state tax on gross receipts of a telegraph company, where a part of its business is interstate, is an unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce. Ratterman v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 127 U. S. 411, 32 L. ed. 229; Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 128 U. S. 39, 32 L. ed. 845, reversing 110 Pa. 405; Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Seay, 132 U. S. 472, 33 L. ed. 409, reversing Western U. Telegr. Co. v. State Board of Assessment, supra.

In such a case an injunction against that portion only of the tax which is based on interstate commerce may be granted if such portion can be separated from the remainder. Ratterman v. Western U. Telegr. Co. supra.

Tax on franchisees.

A state tax on the franchise of a telegraph company which has accepted the Act of Congress of 1866 is void, as an attempt to tax an instrument of general government. San Francisco v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 17 L. R. A. 301, 96 Cal. 140.

It was said in Atty-Gen. v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 24 L. R. A.

38 Fed. Rep. 129, that a state tax on the franchise and property of a foreign telegraph company was not a regulation of commerce, although the company had accepted the act of congress; but the tax involved in this case was regarded by the Supreme Court of the United States, which upheld it (Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Atty-Gen. 125 U. S. 530, 31 L. ed. 790), as a tax on the property of the corporation, although nominally on such portion of its capital stock as corresponded with the portion of its whole line which was within the state.

It is said in Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Lieb, 76 Ill. 174, that a foreign telegraph company is taxable on the exercise of its franchises and privileges in the state, but in that case the tax was in fact on capital stock and was held not to be authorized by a statute which in terms applied only to domestic corporations.

Tax on property or capital stock.

That a tax by each town or ward on telegraph lines within such district, including the easement of the company in the land occupied by its poles and apparatus, is not an unconstitutional regulation of commerce, is decided in People v. Dolan, 12 L. R. A. 251, 126 N. Y. 166, modifying on other grounds People v. Tierney, 57 Hun. 357. Although the telegraph company was in this case a domestic corporation, it was engaged in interstate business, and the decision would undoubtedly have been the same if the company had been a foreign corporation. It was held also in that case that the value of such property could not be estimated with reference to its use as part of a telegraph line in operation, but must be based on the value without regard to such use.

A telegraph company operating its lines under authority of the act of congress is not exempt from the ordinary burdens of taxation in a state where its line runs. Atty-Gen. v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 141 U. S. 40, 35 L. ed. 623.

A state tax nominally based on the shares of stock of a foreign telegraph company doing business within the state in proportion to the part of the whole line operated by the company which is within the state was held to be in effect a tax on the property of the corporation within the state, and road track in the state is in violation of a constitutional provision requiring uniformity.

Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. State, 16 L. R. A. 380, 49 Ohio St. 189.

This tax cannot be imposed under the authority to levy taxes for the support of the city government.

Burroughs, Taxn. 418; Daly v. Morgan, supra; St. Mary's Industrial School v. Brown, 45 Md. 311; Cooley, Const. Lim. 231, ed. of 1890. 227.

This ordinance by imposing this specific tax in effect determines the value of the property—that is it assumes that all of this class of property is of the same value.

This renders it void in any event.

People v. Hastings, 29 Cal. 449; Burroughs, Taxn. chap. 12, p. 283.

A legislative enactment making or determining the value of property for taxation would be the blending of the legislative and judicial functions and also would deprive the property owners of due process of law and give them no opportunity to be heard in the matter.

Urban v. Baltimore, 11 L. R. A. 224, 72 Md. 587; State v. Rowe, 72 Md. 548; Easton Comrs. v. Cooley, 74 Md. 263.

not an invalid burden on interstate commerce. Ibid.; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Atty-Gen. supra.

A question under the Ohio state constitution, which requires property to be taxed according to its true value in money, and that all moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint-stock companies, or otherwise, shall be taxed by a uniform rule, has arisen with reference to the so-called Nichols law, which provides that the value of the property within the state of telegraph, telephone, and express companies shall be determined for taxation in proportion to the value of the entire property of such companies and that the board shall, "be guided by the value of said property as determined by the value of the entire capital stock of said companies, and such other evidence and rules as will enable said board to arrive at the true value in money."

The supreme court of the state in State v. Jones, 23 Ohio L. J. 54, holds that this law does not violate the constitutional rule of uniformity, since that rule does not preclude placing such corporations in a class by themselves, and that the statute did not bind the board to find the value of the entire property of the company equal to that of the entire capital stock, but only to be guided thereby in ascertaining the true value in money of the property in the state.

On the other hand, the circuit court of the United States, expressing regret that it could not wait for a decision of the state supreme court before passing on the question, has held the statute unconstitutional on the ground that the market value of the shares of capital stock had no legitimate effect in increasing the value of the tangible and visible property in Ohio of the Western Union Telegraph Company, because the good-will and other intangible factors of the value of the capital stock were not taxable as property themselves, under the Ohio laws and constitution, nor as an increment to the value of such tangible property, and therefore, that a statute requiring the value of the capital stock to be a guide in determining the value of the tangible property of a small class of business corporations violates the constitutional rule of uniformity. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Poe, 61 Fed. Rep. 449.

A telephone company incorporated in another state is not taxable on its gross earnings or capital stock merely because it has leased apparatus to a domestic corporation, with the reservation of the right to take and operate the line in case of a certain breach of contract. People v. American Bell Teleph. Co. 117 N. Y. 241; Com. v. American Bell Teleph. Co. 129 Pa. 217.

A franchise tax on the capital of an interstate telegraph company employed within the state is not an unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce. People v. Campbell, 70 Hun. 507.

An injunction against operating a telegraph line of a foreign corporation engaged in interstate business until the payment of a lawful tax cannot be allowed as a remedy to compel the payment of the tax, as this would interfere with interstate business. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Atty-Gen. supra, reversing on this point. Atty-Gen. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 33 Fed. Rep. 129.

These ordinances discriminate against the property of defendant in imposing the taxes. This poll tax is in addition to the amount of taxes imposed upon the property of other citizens and corporations.

Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. v. Gibbs, 142 U. S. 391, 35 L. ed. 1053.

These ordinances are in violation of the Con-domestic corporation, with the reservation of the right to take and operate the line in case of a certain breach of contract. People v. American Bell Teleph. Co. 117 N. Y. 241; Com. v. American Bell Teleph. Co. 129 Pa. 217.

A franchise tax on the capital of an interstate telegraph company employed within the state is not an unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce. People v. Campbell, 70 Hun. 507.

An injunction against operating a telegraph line of a foreign corporation engaged in interstate business until the payment of a lawful tax cannot be allowed as a remedy to compel the payment of the tax, as this would interfere with interstate business. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Atty-Gen. supra, reversing on this point. Atty-Gen. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 33 Fed. Rep. 129.

Charge for poles and wires.

The main case is clearly supported by the authorities.

It is established that a municipal corporation being chargeable with the duty of supervising the construction and maintenance of electric lines within its streets and public places in order to prevent danger to the people from their defective condition, may impose upon such electric lines a reasonable charge to pay for such supervision.

A charge of one dollar per annum for each pole and two dollars and fifty cents per annum for each mile of wire was held reasonable. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Philadelphia (Pa.) Jan. 23. 1888.

In Philadelphia v. Postal Teleg. Cable Co., 67 Hun. 21, the reasonableness of a charge for each pole and each mile of wire under the Philadelphia ordinance was involved. The amount of such charge is not stated in the opinion, but it would appear to be the same as that in the preceding case.

The New York court declared that it could not say this charge for police regulation and supervision was unreasonable, and held that it did not constitute a restraint upon interstate commerce. Philadelphia v. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. supra.

But the circuit court of the United States refused to uphold the Philadelphia ordinance in Philadelphia v. Western U. Teleg. Co., 2 Intern. Com. Rep. 728, 40 Fed. Rep. 615, declaring that Philadelphia was not authorized to tax a telegraph company occustitution of the United States and the laws of congress relating to the regulation of interstate commerce and the protection of property.

Pensacola Teleg. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 96 U. S. 11, 24 L. ed. 711; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 464, 26 L. ed. 1068.

The property of a telegraph company situated within a state may be taxed by the state, as all other property is taxed; but its business of an interstate character cannot be thus taxed.

Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 640, 32 L. ed. 311; Charleston v. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. (S. C.) 9 Ry. & Corp. L. J. 129; Bradford v. Postal Teleg. Co. (Pa.) 11 Ry. & Corp. L. J. 54.

This tax or claim is a restriction upon the use of the United States post roads.

This tax or claim is a restriction upon an agent of the national government without authority of congress.

U. S. Const. art. 1, § 8, subsec. 18; Ward v. Maryland, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 427, 20 L. ed. 451; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Texas, supra.

This license exaction is an abridgment of the rights, immunities, and franchises of the Postal Telegraph Cable Company's charter in the free use of the post-roads of the United States.

S. 459, 30 L. ed. 694; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 136 U. S. 114-118, 84 L. ed. 394-356; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Texas, supra; Crutcher v. Kentucky, 141 U. S. 47-62, 35 L. ed. 650-654; Lyng v. Michigan, 135 U. S. 161-166, 34 L. ed. 151-153.

The specific tax upon telegraph poles, as such, without regard to size, height, or material of which it is composed, and physical condition and extent of business, is unequal.

Pacific Exp. Co. v. Seibert, 142 U. S. 333, 35 L. ed. 1035, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 810; Lickard v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 117 U. S. 33-51, 29 L. ed. 787-791; Tennessee v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 117 U. S. 51, 29 L. ed. 791; also Harman v. Chicago, 147 U. S. 896, 37 L. ed. 217; Minot v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 2 Abb. U. S. 828.

This tax or claim, and the manner of creatpying its streets, and further that if it was engaged in interstate commerce, the state could not confer such power. The opinion proceeds, however, to say that the city may charge for supervision of the telegraph lines what is reasonable, but cannot lay away any fund for imaginary future demands, and therefore, that an ordinance which would impose a charge of about $16,000 per year, while experience shows that $3,000 or $3,500 per year was sufficient to pay the expenses, was unreasonable and invalid. Therefore the federal court, while acknowledging that the state courts upheld the ordinance, refused to uphold it.

A charge of one dollar per annum for each pole was held not to be unreasonable in Chester City v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 154 Pa. 464; Allentown v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 148 Pa. 117.

In Chester v. Western U. Teleg. Co., supra, the supreme court of Pennsylvania declared that the reasonableness of the license fee for such a telegraph company may be measured partly by the liability of the city for injuries caused by defective poles and wires, as well as by the amount of actual expense for licenses.

A charge of $5 per pole for the privilege of using streets, alleys, and public places of the city of St. Louis being graduated by the amount of use is held by the Supreme Court of the United States not to be a privilege or license tax, but to be valid. St. Louis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 148 U. S. 92, 37 L. ed. 380, and on denial of rehearing in 149 U. S. 467, 37 L. ed. 812, but the dissenting opinion in this case denies that the charge is reasonable, reciting that it amounts to 44 per cent of the entire value of the property of the company in the city. This case reverses the decision of the circuit court in 39 Fed. Rep. 59.

The city of St. Louis having full control of streets and power to "regulate the use" is held entitled to demand a consideration and the majority of the court holds that $5 per pole cannot be declared unreasonable on the case as then presented but that this question was open to investigation on another trial.

A tax by the state of one dollar for each mile of the first line of wire within the state and fifty cents per mile for each additional wire, with a penalty of $500 imposed on any agent of the company for failure to pay the tax, was held unconstitutional 24 L. R. A.

as an attempted regulation of commerce on the ground that it was not a tax on the property of the company within the state, but upon its business. Com. v. Smith, 92 Ky. 38.

Considering the fact that a state tax, like that in the case last cited, can hardly be claimed to be a charge for police supervision of the poles and wires, it would seem that this decision is not in conflict with that of the Supreme Court of the United States upholding a city charge of $5 for each pole. If the tax is in fact on the business rather than on the property of the company it is clearly within the scope of the decisions above respecting various forms of license or privilege taxes. A state tax might easily become prohibitory if not restricted.

The St. Louis board of public improvements was held in State v. Flad, 28 Mo. App. 185, to have no power to impose upon a telephone company other conditions for the use of streets than those imposed by statutes and ordinances, and that the board must issue a permit for poles in the streets on compliance with these conditions.

State monopolies.

A legislative grant of an exclusive franchise for telegraph business between certain points in the state was held, in a controversy between domestic corporations, to be valid under the state constitution, in California State Teleg. Co. v. Alta Teleg. Co. 22 Cal. 398, but the case was considered only with respect to the provisions of the state constitution.

A Pennsylvania case held that the post-roads, which a telegraph company, accepting the act of congress, is entitled to use cannot include roads which are the property of a state, and the soil of which is generally owned by individuals. Philadelphia v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 2 W. N. C. 455.

But this decision is clearly superseded by that of the United States Supreme Court in Pensacola Teleg. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co., 96 U. S. 1, 24 L. ed. 708, affirming 2 Woods, C. C. 643, in which it is held that the Act of Congress of July 14, 1866, prohibits state monopolies in telegraph business, and extends the right of a company which has accepted the act to run its line over all post-roads and navigable waters, and that post-roads within this provision are not restricted to roads over the public domain, but include all roads which are properly known as ing it, or any statute similar to it, is against the public policy of the United States.

Weldon v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 347; Passenger Cases, 48 U. S. 7 How. 468, 12 L. ed. 777; McGulloch v. Maryland, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 481, 4 L. ed. 607.

Messrs. Thomas G. Hayes and William Bryan, Jr., for appellee:

The mayor and city council of Baltimore have power, under chapter 370 of the Acts of 1890, to regulate the use of the streets of the city by telegraph, telephone, and other poles.

Under this power, the municipality has been decided to be authorized to permit iron railway tracks to be laid on the streets of the city by street railway companies.

Koch v. North Avenue R. Co. 15 L. R. A. 877, 75 Md. 239; North Baltimore Pass. R. Co. v. Baltimore, 75 Md. 239; Lake Roland Elec. R. Co. v. Baltimore, 20 L. R. A. 126, 77 Md. 352.

The city has the right to charge a reasonable rental for the use of its streets.

St. Louis v. Western U. Tele. Co. 148 U. S. 93, 37 L. ed. 390, and 149 U. S. 465, 37 L. ed. 810.

post-roads. It holds also that although the statute does not give a foreign corporation the right to enter on private property without consent of the owner it does prohibit the state from preventing the occupation of post-roads for telegraph purposes.

To the same effect it was held in Western U. Tele. Co. v. Atlantic & Pacific States Tele. Co. 5 Nev. 102, that a state cannot by the grant of an exclusive franchise, prevent the use of a post-road by any telegraph company which has accepted the act of congress. But this decision adds that proof of such acceptance is necessary, and that a letter purporting to be from the postmaster general, which is not authenticated, is not sufficient proof. It says that while the letter, if authentic, may be sufficient, the proper proof would be a certified copy of the acceptance filed under seal of the government.

So in Southwestern R. Co. v. Southern & A. Tele. Co. 46 Ga. 43, it is held that a foreign corporation may be given the right to build a telegraph line across the public domain but not upon private property without compensation.

The authority given to a telegraph company to lease its line was held in Philadelphia v. Western U. Tele. Co., 3 W. N. C. 455, not to include the right to lease its franchise, so as to authorize the lessee to open new lines. But it may be questioned how far this decision remains unimpaired in this respect by the decision of the United States Supreme Court denying the right of the state to give an exclusive franchise.

Revocation of license.

In State v. Jersey City (N. J.) Feb. 7, 1897, it was held that the common council could not review the permission of a telegraph company to use a street, after it had incurred the expense of placing poles, etc.

But in American Rapid Tele. Co. v. Hess, 13 L. R. A. 454, 125 N. Y. 641, it is held that the license of a telegraph company to use a highway is revocable by the legislature.

Placing wires under ground.

The fact that a telegraph company has accepted the act of congress and obtained the right to use public streets which constitute post-roads does not exempt it from the power of the state to compel

Bryan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 20th day of April, 1893, the mayor and city council of Baltimore passed an ordinance which imposed a tax $3 on each telegraph, telephone, electric light or other pole, which should be used in any of the streets, lanes, or alleys of the city.

But the ordinance excepted trolley poles, which were used exclusively for stringing thereon wires for use in the propulsion of street passenger cars by electricity.

The Postal Telegraph Cable Company used and maintained five hundred and nine telegraph poles in the public streets of Baltimore, but refused to pay the tax on them. A suit was brought by the mayor and city council to recover the amount due according to the terms of the ordinance. That telegraph company, instead of pleading to the declaration, filed an answer, composed of twenty-five sections. The plaintiff demurred, and by consent of counsel, a pro forma judgment was entered, sustaining the demurrer and determining that the plaintiff should recover the amount of the tax.

the placing of wires under ground. American Rapid Tele. Co. v. Hess, 13 L. R. A. 454, 125 N. Y. 641; Western U. Tele. Co. v. New York, 3 L. R. A. 449, 2 Intern. Com. Rep. 533, 86 Fed. Rep. 552.

But a telegraph company having the right to use post-roads cannot be prevented by state law from carrying its wires along an elevated railway which constitutes a post-road independent of the street beneath it. Western U. Tele. Co. v. New York, supra.

State regulation of business.

Many decisions have been made construing and giving effect to state laws respecting Sunday messages and other matters of regulation of telegraph business in which the effect of the statutes upon interstate business or foreign corporations has not been considered or questioned, although such business or corporations were involved. For an illustration in case of a foreign company, see Western U. Tele. Co. v. Yopet, 3 L. R. A. 224, 118 Ind. 243.

Statutes providing penalties for default or mistake in transmission of messages have been construed in a number of cases, and with some conflict.

An Indiana statute of this kind was construed by the state courts to be inapplicable to messages sent into the state from other states on the ground that the contracts were made outside the state. Rogers v. Western U. Tele. Co. 122 Ind. 306; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Reed, 96 Ind. 195; Carnahan v. Western U. Tele. Co. 89 Ind. 523, 46 Am. Rep. 175.

On the other hand, in Georgia, a penal statute requiring delivery of a message within a reasonable time was held not a violation of the interstate commerce law, although the message was sent from another state. Western U. Tele. Co. v. James, 90 Ga. 254.

And in Indiana the state courts held that such a penal statute did apply to a message sent from that state to a point in another state because the contract was made within the state, even if the default in delivery or mistake of the company was made in another state. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Hamilton, 60 Ind. 181; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Lindley, 62 Ind. 371; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Pendleton, 95 Ind. 12, 43 Am. Rep. 608; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Ferris, 103 Ind. 91.

These Indiana decisions as to penalties for messages sent out of the state are rendered obsolete by

The answer filed by the defendant seems to be framed on the model of equity proceedings. Both in form and substance, it is in absolute disregard of the practice prevailing in this state, and was necessarily held bad on demurrer. But as the object of this suit is to determine the validity of the ordinance in question, we shall express our opinion upon it without regard to errors in practice and procedure. We shall assume (as is undoubtedly the case) that the defendant is a corporation under the laws of New York; and that it is engaged in operating telegraph lines over the post-roads of several states of the Union, by making telegraphic communications for commercial and other purposes; and that it has accepted the provisions of the Act of Congress of July, 1866 (Title 65 of U. S. Rev. Stat.), relating to the occupancy of post roads; and that it is entitled to the privileges conferred by that Act. It has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that telegraphic communication between the different states is a species of interstate commerce, and that it is, therefore, within the control of congress. The telegraphic companies which have accepted the provisions of the Act of 1866 are entitled to use the post-roads of the United States for the operation of their lines.

The streets of the city of Baltimore are post-roads, and in this capacity are subject to this act of congress.

But it cannot be supposed that any power is conferred upon a telegraph company to use the streets without compensation.

The supreme court has decided what the right to use a post-road means. It has said that this act "gives no foreign corporation the right to enter upon private property without the consent of the owner and erect the necessary structures for its business; but it does provide that whenever the consent of the owner is obtained no state legislation shall prevent the occupation of post-roads for telegraph purposes by such corporations as are willing to avail themselves of its privileges." These (meaning post roads) are within the dominion of the national government to the extent of the national powers, and are, therefore, subject to legitimate congressional regulation. No question arises as to the authority of congress to provide for the appropriation of private property to the uses of the telegraph, for no such attempt has been made. The use of public property alone is granted. If private property is required, it must, so far as the present legislation is concerned, be obtained by private arrangement with its owner. No compulsory proceedings are authorized.

State sovereignty under the constitution is not interfered with.

Only national privileges are granted. Pennacola Teleg. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 96 U. S. 1, 24 L. ed. 708.

It is not contended on the part of the plaintiff that any state authority can prevent or hinder interstate commerce, or that it can tax the receipts derived from it, or that it can require a license for carrying on the business, or the payment of a sum of money for such license.

The city ordinance does not exclude the telegraph company from the use of the streets as post-roads; on the contrary, it recognizes such use, and exacts compensation therefor. The question arises whether such compensation can be lawfully demanded.

The power of the mayor and city council of Baltimore over the streets cannot be regarded as within the region of debate.

By legislative enactment, by long continued usage, and by repeated decisions of our courts, it has been determined that it has full and complete control over the streets and highways of the city. The Act of 1890, chapter 370, declared that it should have power to regulate the use of the streets by telegraph, telephone, electric light and other wires and poles; and that it might require the wires to be placed under ground. It may permit the erection of poles, determine where they may be placed, and upon what terms they may be used. The erection of a pole is the appropriation of a portion of a street, and the entire exclusion of the public from the use of it. It is necessarily to some extent the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Pendleton, 122 U. S. 358, 30 L. ed. 1187, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 303, reversing 95 Ind. 12, 48 Am. Rep. 602, which decides that a state statute cannot regulate the transmission of telegrams into other states, and that such messages are not within the provisions of a state statute giving a penalty for a default in delivery which occurs in another state.

It is perhaps open to question how far this decision of the United States Supreme Court affects the Indiana decision in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Fenton, 52 Ind. 1, which holds that the Indiana statute providing for special damages in case of negligence of telegraph company can be recovered, although the message was sent from another state. The question is suggested whether or not the recovery of special damages, as distinguished from a penalty, is a part of the remedy which is within the proper sphere of state regulation, although the action may be based on an interstate transaction.

In Central U. Teleg. Co. v. State, 118 Ind. 194, it was held that a telephone company was not exempt from state control in respect to service and rates for persons within the state, although the line extended into other states and belonged to a foreign corporation.

So in Central U. Teleg. Co. v. State, 106 Ind. 1, and Hockett v. State, 105 Ind. 290, 55 Am. Rep. 201, an Illinois corporation was held subject to the Indiana statutes as to service of process for persons in Indiana, but there was no discussion in those cases as to the interstate character of the business.

That a state statute may require sufficient facilities on the part of a telegraph company to do business both for individuals and for other telegraph lines, and that such business shall be done promptly and impartially, is declared in Connell v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 108 Mo. 459, holding that this is not an interference with interstate commerce; but the case also holds that such a statute does not apply to a delivery of the message in another state.

And in State v. Nebraska Teleph. Co., 17 Neb. 128, 52 Am. Rep. 404, an interstate telephone company was held bound to furnish service but there was no discussion of interstate matters.

For note on compulsory service in similar cases see Rushville v. Rushville Nat. Gas Co. (Ind.) 15 L. R. A. 321.

B. A. R.

an obstruction, and under some circumstances, it may be a great public inconvenience.

The telegraph company has not the semblance of a right to appropriate any portion of the streets in this way.

It may be suggested that it might acquire such right by condemnation.

We shall not discuss this question.

The assertion of such a pretension would be regarded as offensive in the highest degree, and would call forth great opposition. If the question should ever be presented to the courts, we trust that it may be temperately and dispassionately discussed, and wisely and justly decided.

As the matter now stands, the consent of the mayor and city council must be obtained for the use of the poles.

It would not be right to clog the consent with unjust and unreasonable conditions, such as would manifest a purpose to prevent the transaction of the interstate business of the telegraph company, or to impede, oppress, and embarrass it, or to make a discrimination against it in favor of some rival company. The privilege of using the poles is granted on the payment of the sum of two dollars per annum for each pole. This is less than seventeen cents a month. Baltimore is a large and populous city. In the localities desirable for telegraph offices the sidewalks are frequently thronged by large numbers of people, and the driveways so closely blocked with vehicles that it is a matter of peril and difficulty to cross from one side of the street to the other.

In many other parts of the city the crowding of the streets is sometimes very great. It is a matter of much importance to preserve space for public convenience. If we take as a standard the rental value of ground fronting on public streets, we will see that seventeen cents a month for the space covered by a telegraph pole is a very small fraction of the value of its occupation; and it is a vastly smaller fraction of the compensation due for the inconvenience caused to occupiers of houses in the vicinity, and to persons using the streets in the ordinary methods of travel.

The mayor and city council, however, with a wise and liberal forecast have forborne to place burdens on industries and enterprises, which accompany and increase the growth and prosperity of the city. In our opinion the tax on these poles is reasonable and moderate. We, of course, are conclusively bound by the decision of the supreme court in St. Louis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 148 U. S. 92, 37 L. ed. 380.

In that case the validity of a tax was in question, which had been imposed by the city of St. Louis on telegraph poles of the Western Union Company. The court overruled the suggestion that the act of congress which granted the use of the post-roads, conferred on telegraph companies the unrestricted right to appropriate public or private property; and affirmed that the franchise or privilege was to be exercised in subordination to public and private rights. It held that the tax was valid; and said in speaking of the public streets: "While for purposes of travel and common use they are open to the citizens of every state alike, and no state can by its legislation deprive the citizens of another state of such common use, yet when an appropriation of any part of this public property to an exclusive use is sought, whether by a citizen or corporation of the same or another state, or a corporation of the national government, it is within the competency of the state, representing the sovereignty of that local public, to exact for its benefit compensation for this exclusive appropriation."

It matters not for what that exclusive appropriation is taken; whether for steam railroads, telegraphs, or telephones; the state may, if it chooses, exact from the party or corporation given such exclusive use, pecuniary compensation to the general public for being deprived of the common use of the portion thus appropriated. The tax was five dollars per annum for each pole, and it was maintained by the telegraph company that it was unreasonable, unjust, and excessive. As the judgment in favor of the telegraph company was reversed on other grounds, the court said that the question might be passed for further investigation on the new trial. It also said "prima facie," an ordinance like that is reasonable. The court cannot assume that such a charge is excessive, and so excessive as to make the ordinance unreasonable and void; for, as applied in certain cases, a like charge for so much appropriation of the streets may be reasonable. On a motion for reargument, the court reaffirms the validity of the tax.

In speaking of the power to regulate the use of the streets, which was vested in the city of St. Louis under its charter, it said: "If it should see fit to construct an expensive boulevard in the city, and then limit the use to vehicles of a certain kind, or exact a toll from all who use it, would that be other than a regulation of the use? And so it is only a matter of regulation of use when the city grants to the telegraph company the right to use exclusively a portion of the street, on condition of contributing something towards the expense it has been to, in opening and improving the street. Unless, therefore, the telegraph company has some superior right which excludes it from subjection to this control on the part of the city over the streets, it would seem that the power to require payment of some reasonable sum for the exclusive use of a portion of the streets was within the grant of power to regulate the use. That the company gets no such right from the general government is shown by the opinion heretofore delivered, nor has it any such from the state."

A contract between abutters on a street about to be closed that certain parts of the bed of the street shall be awarded to each without specifying any instrument of title, and that then one shall sell and the other buy "at the market price" a strip fronting seven feet on a designated street to a ten-foot alley not located, is too indefinite to be specifically enforced.

(March 15, 1898.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City in favor of defendants in an action brought to compel specific performance of a contract to convey real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Emil Budnitz and C. D. McFarland for appellants.

Mr. James McColgan for appellees.

Alvey, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an application for specific performance of what is alleged to be a contract between the parties, plaintiffs and defendants in this case, for the partition or division of certain portions of the bed of Birkhead street, condemned and closed by the authority of the city of Baltimore, between Charles and Patapsco streets. It appears that each of the parties, complainants and defendants, had some interest in the soil, by previous lease or conveyances, in the bed of Birkhead street, between Charles and Patapsco streets, and there was an ordinance pending, or about to be introduced, in the city council, for the condemnation and closure of Birkhead street between Charles and Patapsco streets; and in this state of affairs the parties to this case entered into an agreement; the parties of the second part to the agreement being the complainants in this case, and the parties of the first part thereto being the defendants. The agreement is as follows: "That the parties hereto do mutually agree and covenant to do no act that shall hinder the passage by the mayor and city council of Baltimore of an ordinance providing for the reversion of the city's interest in certain portions of ground binding upon lots of ground held by the parties hereto, and which portions of ground were dedicated to the city for the use of a street to be known as 'Birkhead Street,' and which said dedication was not accepted by the city; and they do further agree that, in the event of the passage of said ordinance, they will divide the ground forming the bed of said street, in the manner following, that is to say: The parties of the second part shall be awarded the ground beginning at the southwest corner of the lot now owned by them at the N. E. cor. of Charles and said Birkhead streets; running thence southerly into the bed of said Birkhead street a distance of 25 feet; thence easterly, a distance of 95 feet, to a ten-foot alley, with the use in common; thence northerly to the southeasterly boundary of the lot now owned by them; thence westerly 95 feet to the place of beginning. The parties of the first part hereto [that is to say, the defendants] shall be awarded the ground of said proposed street which shall remain after the award to the parties of the second part, as above set forth. The parties of the second part [the plaintiffs] further agree to sell to the parties of the first part, after said division shall be made, a piece or parcel of said ground which shall be furthest south in the proposed division, which said piece or parcel shall front 7 feet on Charles street to a 10-foot alley, charging therefor the market price for said ground, as it shall appear on the date of said sale. The parties of the first part agree to purchase, on the above terms, the piece or parcel of ground above described." It is quite apparent that this agreement was unskillfully drawn, and it is open to doubtful construction in regard to several questions. It is alleged in the bill, and admitted by the answer, that the ordinance referred to, for condemning and closing Birkhead street from the east side of Charles street to the west side of Patapsco street was passed in October, 1888, and that the city authorities proceeded to condemn and close the street between said points, and that the defendants were assessed for benefits the sum of $432.14, which amount constitutes a lien on the ground of the defendants embraced within the bed of Birkhead street, fronting on Charles street, but which assessment the defendants have refused to pay, and the city officials threaten to sell the ground of the defendants so embraced in the bed of Birkhead street, for payment of the assessment. The plaintiffs allege that the defendants have refused to execute to them a deed for the lot to which they are entitled under the agreement, although they (the plaintiffs) are ready and willing to sell and convey the lot, 7 by 95 feet, to the defendants, at the market price, as provided in the agreement.

The bill prays—First, that the defendants may be decreed to pay the $432.14, the assessment against them as for benefits for closing the street, and all costs on the assessment, and thus relieve the ground of the lien or incumbrance; second, that the defendants be decreed to grant and convey to the plaintiffs, by a good and sufficient deed, the lot of ground forming a part of the bed of Birkhead street, condemned and closed as aforesaid, having a front of 25 feet on Charles street, with a depth of 95 feet, being the lot agreed to be awarded to the plaintiffs by the agreement exhibited with the bill; and for general relief. The defendants, by their answer, deny in toto the rights claimed by the plaintiffs; they deny the correctness of the construction of the agreement as contended for by the plaintiffs; and they insist that they are under no obligation whatever to the plaintiffs to pay off the assessment made upon them by the city for benefits for closing the street, nor are they bound, as they contend, to make a deed to the plaintiffs for any part of the bed of the street; and they further insist that the contract is greatly wanting in certainty and mutuality; and that it is not such as a court of equity should specifically enforce. The city of Baltimore, by its answer, insists upon its right to enforce the assessment, and to the benefits of the lien upon the ground.

NOTE.—As to definiteness of contract, see Wells v. Alexandre (N. Y.) 15 L. R. A. 218, with note on validity of contract for purchase of indefinite quantity.

The contract provides for a division of the bed of the street between the parties, upon its being condemned and closed by the city, and it refers to the parts to be awarded to each; but how or by whom the award is to be made, or by what instrument effected, the contract is entirely silent. Whether this award was intended or was supposed to be necessary to be made by the city commissioner in condemning and closing the street, or that it was necessary to have the sanction of the city authority to any division that might be agreed upon by the parties themselves, would seem to be matter of doubt. The parties have not stipulated for mutual conveyances for the parts to be awarded. They have simply said that certain parts of the bed of the street shall be awarded, but without fixing any valuation or specifying any instrument of title whatever. But it is stipulated by the plaintiffs that they will sell to the defendants, after said division shall be made, a certain piece or parcel of said ground fronting 7 feet on Charles street to a 10-foot alley (without saying whether the alley is the boundary of the width or the depth of the lot), "charging therefor the market price for said ground as it shall appear on the date of said sale," and the defendants agreed to purchase the same on those terms. This is, in part, of the substance of the consideration for the contract. But how is this price to be ascertained? It was not designed that this particular piece or parcel of ground should be put up at public sale, in order to ascertain the market price, and the opinions or judgments of witnesses as to values are too proverbially variant and conflicting to be appealed to for the purpose of fixing with certainty the market value of the property at a particular date. The court has no means by which to ascertain, with any proper degree of certainty, the market price of this piece of ground at the date of its sale. There would therefore seem to be such uncertainty and vagueness in the terms of the contract as to render it improper for the court to undertake to decree its specific performance. It is a settled principle in this court that "every agreement, to merit the interposition of a court of equity to enforce it, must be fair, just, reasonable, bona fide, certain in all its parts, mutual, etc., and, if any of these ingredients be wanting, courts of equity will not decree a specific performance. Gelston v. Sigmund, 27 Md. 334, 343, and the cases there cited. In the case just cited the agreement was to let B. retain possession of certain property from the 1st of July, 1866, to the 1st of July, 1867, upon his giving the same rent that A. "might be able to obtain from other parties;" and it was held that the agreement was uncertain, and was not such as a court of equity would enforce; that it could not be certainly ascertained how much any other person would pay, and it was therefore too uncertain to be specifically enforced. In that case the case of Bromley v. Jefferies, 2 Vern. 415, was cited and relied on by the court, in which there was a covenant by A. that B. should have a certain estate for £1,500 less than any other purchaser would give for it, and afterwards the covenantor devised this estate to his grandson for life, with remainder over, and died. The court refused to decree specific performance of the agreement, by reason of the uncertainty of it, because, as said by the court, "if the estate was not to be sold, but the plaintiff was to have it, it was not practicable to know what a purchaser would give for it." And so, here, the market price of property being what it will bring in fair, open market at public sale, it is not practicable to ascertain that price unless the property be subjected to the test of such sale, and that is clearly not what was contemplated by the parties; and to determine the matter upon the mere opinions of witnesses that might be produced by the opposing parties would not conform to the terms of the contract, and might work surprise to either or both of the parties. Indeed, to determine the question on such evidence would simply be to make it depend upon the opinions of values, with respect to which opinions the parties might not have been willing to contract; for, as said by Lord Arden, M. R., in the case of Emery v. Wase, 5 Ves. Jr. 848, "values differ so much that it is not very wise to agree to sell according to the valuation of any one." The agreement not being of a nature to be specifically enforced by a court of equity, the decree below dismissing the bill will be affirmed, with costs, and the plaintiffs be left to any legal remedy they may have on the contract for breach thereof. Emery v. Wase, 5 Ves. Jr. 848, 848; Colson v. Thompson, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 386, 4 L. ed. 253.

Decree affirmed, with costs to appellees.

The appellant sued the appellees. Hill and the sureties on his sheriff's bond, and filed this declaration:

"The State of Tennessee, for the use of the United States of America, Plaintiff v. Wm. J. Hill, H. C. Hudson, James W. Johnson, R. G. Fehr, J. G. Sawyer, T. M. Graham, B. H. Beazeley and V. E. Shwab, Defendants. (No. 882.)

"The plaintiff sues the defendants for this: That on the 1st day of January, 1893, and on divers other days before said date, the defendant William J. Hill was the sheriff of Davidson county, Tennessee, within said middle district of Tennessee, duly elected, qualified, and acting as such sheriff. That on the 1st day of September, 1890, he, the said William J. Hill, as required by the law of the state of Tennessee, executed a bond in the penal sum of $40,000, with the defendants H. C. Hudson, Jas. W. Johnson, R. G. Fehr, J. G. Sawyer, T. M. Graham, B. H. Beazeley, and V. E. Shwab as sureties thereon, and they, the said sureties, executed said bond, and it was approved and delivered; that said bond was conditioned as required by the law of Tennessee, in cases of sheriff's bonds, and was, among other things, conditioned that he, the said William J. Hill, would 'faithfully execute the office of sheriff of Davidson county, and perform its duties and functions during his continuance in office,' etc. A certified copy of said bond as it was delivered to, executed before, and accepted and approved by the judge of the county court of Davidson county, and filed as provided by law, together with a duly certified copy of the oath of office taken by the said William J. Hill as sheriff, is here to the court shown, and made a part hereof. That among the duties of said William J. Hill, as sheriff, as provided by law, is the following, to wit:

"To take charge and custody of the jail of said county, and of the prisoners therein to receive those lawfully committed, and to keep them, himself or by his deputies or jailer, until discharged by law.' That by the statutes of the state of Tennessee, in such cases made and provided: '(1) The county jail is used as a prison for the safe keeping and confinement of all persons committed thereto under the authority of law. (2) The foregoing provisions extend to persons committed by authority of the courts of the United States. (3) The sheriff is liable for failing to receive and keep all persons delivered under the authority of the United States to the like pains and penalties as to similar failures in the case of persons committed under the authority of the state. (4) The sheriff has the custody and charge of the jail of his county, and of all persons committed thereto, and may appoint a jailer, for whose acts he is civilly responsible. (5) It is made the duty of the sheriff to take charge and custody of the jail of his county, and of the prisoners therein, to receive those lawfully committed, and to keep them himself or by his deputies or jailer until discharged by law.'

"And the plaintiff says that the conditions of said bond, executed by the defendants as aforesaid, have been broken in this, that is to say: One Thomas C. Boalen, at the October term, 1891, of the United States circuit court for the middle district of Tennessee, was duly indicted by the grand jury of said court for violation of sections 5440, 5456, 5477, and 5469, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to wit: 'For stealing, embezzling, and taking out of the street mail box at the corner of Church and Market streets, in the city of Nashville, a letter containing a check, and he unlawfully opening it, and embezzling said check therein contained. For taking from the street mail box another letter, and opening it, and embezzling said check therein contained. For conspiring with Charles Hubbard, alias Charles Dymond, and Charles J. K. Stratton, alias Harry Armstrong, to commit the offense of breaking open said mail box and taking therefrom said two letters, and opening the letters and embezzling two checks therein contained. For willfully and maliciously destroying mail matter deposited in said letter box. For feloniously having in his possession certain keys suited to locks of the street mail boxes in use by the United States for receiving mail in the city of Nashville, etc. For stealing and taking from an authorized depository for mail matter, to wit, the street mail box in the city of Nashville, two letters deposited in said mail box. For opening and embezzling and destroying two drafts, which he, the said Thomas C. Boalen, took out of a street mail box, in the city of Nashville, one of said letters containing a draft for $601.05, and another a draft for $352.50, and embezzling said two letters and drafts.' That, after said indictment was found as aforesaid, the said Thomas C. Boalen was arrested by due process of law on a warrant sworn out before Will. Haight, a United States circuit court commissioner, at Atlanta, Ga., on the — day of November,

NOTE.—The above case seems to be strictly novel as a suit by a state for the use of the United States upon the bond of a sheriff who has suffered the escape of a federal prisoner.

1891, and thereupon, to wit, on the 9th day of November, 1891, an order was made by the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Georgia that he, the said Thomas C. Boalen, be removed and transferred to the circuit court for the middle district of Tennessee, etc. That thereafter, to wit, on or about the 10th day of November, 1891, the United States marshal for the northern district of Georgia, as he was ordered to do, did transfer the said Boalen to the middle district of Tennessee, and there delivered him to C. B. Harrison, United States marshal for the middle district of Tennessee. That thereupon, under an order of commitment duly made by H. M. Doak, Esq., United States circuit court commissioner for the middle district of Tennessee, being an officer authorized by law to issue said order, to wit, on the 10th day of November, 1891, which was during the time for which said bond aforesaid was executed by the defendants, the said United States marshal did commit the said Thomas C. Boalen to the jail of Davidson county, within said district, and to the custody of him, the said William J. Hill, sheriff for Davidson county, aforesaid, who was then acting as such sheriff. That thereupon, to wit, on the — day of —, 1891, the said William J. Hill, failing to do his duty, and without the leave and license of, and against the will of, the plaintiff, negligently and unlawfully suffered and permitted the said Thomas C. Boalen to escape and go at large wheresoever he would, out of the custody of him, the said William J. Hill, so being such sheriff as aforesaid, and the said Thomas C. Boalen is still at large, and cannot be found. Whereby the said plaintiff has been and is greatly injured, and plaintiff is greatly delayed and prevented from prosecuting the said Thomas C. Boalen for the great crimes and felonies by him committed, contrary to the statutes and against the peace and dignity of the United States; and plaintiff is greatly delayed in and prevented from prosecuting him, the said Thomas C. Boalen, under the said indictment so found as aforesaid against him by the grand jurors for the said United States circuit court for the middle district of Tennessee, in the cause of the United States v. Thomas C. Boalen et al., then and there pending before the said United States circuit court for the middle district of Tennessee; and whereby the said plaintiff aforesaid is delayed in and prevented from causing the said Thomas C. Boalen to be punished with imprisonment for the term and terms of years which is provided by statute as a punishment in such cases, and is delayed in and prevented from recovering from him, the said Thomas C. Boalen, the fines imposed by law for violation of the United States statutes, —$10,000. And in endeavors to arrest and to cause the arrest and capture of him, the said Thomas C. Boalen, who was notoriously one of a gang of dangerous offenders, plying their vocation in many places in the United States, prior to the time he was found and arrested in Atlanta, Georgia, to wit, on the — day of November, 1891, and leading up to the arrest, and bringing about the arrest, the plaintiff necessarily expended large sums of money, to wit: $10,000, for traveling and other necessary expenses of officers and employes of the United States postoffice department; and also, $2,000 for other necessary expenses in that behalf, such as advertisements, printing, etc., etc. And for the arrest and imprisonment and trial of the said Thomas C. Boalen, at Atlanta, Georgia, proceedings for removal, and removal from Atlanta, Georgia, to Nashville, the plaintiff necessarily expended another large sum of money, to wit, $1,000. And for endeavors to recapture and ferret out the whereabouts of the said Thomas C. Boalen, since he, the said defendant, William J. Hill, negligently, carelessly, etc., as aforesaid, allowed him to escape from his custody, the said plaintiff has necessarily expended another large sum of money, to wit, $1,000, and other necessary expenses in this behalf, —$1,000. To the plaintiffs' damage twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000). Hence suit.

"John Ruhm,

"U. S. Attorney. M. D. T."

The defendants demurred to this declaration, and alleged several grounds therefor. The principal ones are: "(1) Because the defendants were not liable to a civil action on the bond given to the state of Tennessee at the suit of the United States for damages for the alleged negligence. (2) The said action is one that cannot be maintained in the United States district court. That the liability of the officers of the state of Tennessee upon their official bonds can only be enforced in its own court, and that the state of Tennessee is a necessary party plaintiff, and no suit can be brought by her or in her name against citizens of the state of Tennessee in a United States court sitting in that state. (3) That no recovery can be had for expenses incurred by the officers of the United States for the arrest, imprisonment, and trial of said Boalen, or for his removal from Atlanta, Ga., to Nashville, Tennessee, because the same was not a debt or liability against said Boalen. (4) That no recovery could be had for the fines imposed by law for the offenses charged against said Boalen until conviction and imposition of said fines by a verdict of a jury and judgment of the court against him. (5) That the money expended by plaintiff in an effort to recapture said Boalen after his escape is not recoverable, in this action, for the reason such expense would not be recoverable against Boalen should he be recaptured, convicted, and sentenced. (6) Because the declaration nowhere alleges that said escaped prisoner was guilty of the offenses charged in the indictment." The demurrer was sustained, and the suit dismissed by the district court.

Argued before Jackson and Taft, Circuit Judges, and Barr, District Judge.

Mr. John Ruhm, U. S. Atty., for plaintiff in error:

The district court of the United States shall have jurisdiction of all suits at common law brought by the United States or by any officer thereof, authorized by law to sue.

Rev. Stat. § 563, subsec. 4.

The penalty of the official bond of the sheriff is by the provisions of section 809, Milliken & Vertrees' Code of Tennessee, made payable to the state. It is therefore proper, if not imperative, that the suit should have been brought in the name of the state for the use of the party agreeing.

Milliken & Vertrees' Code, §§ 3492, 3494.

The United States have the same right as a citizen would have.

The sheriff is liable only to pains and penalties for negligent escape of defendants in error.

The sheriff is neither by the statute of Tennessee nor by those of the United States criminally liable for a mere negligent escape. He is indictable in both jurisdictions where he voluntarily permits the escape.

Milliken & Vertrees' (Tenn.) Code, §§ 5569, 5570; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5409; Cotton v. United States, 52 U. S. 11 How. 231, 18 L. ed. 676.

The novelty of the particular complaint alleged in an action on the case is no objection, provided that the injury be cognizable by law, and that it be shown to have been inflicted on the plaintiff.

Broom, Legal Maxims, *198, citing cases.

The majority of cases cited in the books, where sheriffs have been sued upon their official bond for negligently allowing prisoners to escape—and there are many of them—arise under the old ca. sa. law. There are, however, a few cases in which suits have been brought by the state for its own use, where the person who escaped, had been indicted under the criminal laws of the state.

Com. v. Reed, 2 Bush, 618, 8 Bush, 516.

While the liability is everywhere recognized, the rules as to measures of damages are different in escape on mesne and final process.

The state has a right of action for its own use upon the official bond of a sheriff where he negligently allows prisoners indicted under state laws to escape.

Why, then, should there be no liability to the United States, who are by law required to place their prisoners under the custody of the sheriff, and pay him for their keeping.

Com. v. Reed, 2 Bush, 618, 8 Bush, 516; Shattuck v. State, 51 Miss. 575.

There can be no distinction whether the escape occurred before or after conviction.

Even if it affirmatively appears that the plaintiff in an action on the case has sustained no damage, the officer guilty of a technical violation of duty would still be liable to nominal damages.

breach of duty is committed; and once existing should not be destroyed by the circumstances that it proves to inflict no pecuniary damages.

Of "escape" generally, and the distinction between voluntary and negligent escape.—

See 2 Hawk. P. C. 196; 1 Hale, P. C. 696.

A sheriff's duties are ministerial, and the statute imposing them usually inflicts penalties for neglect in their performance, but the imposition of such penalties does not relieve him from his common-law liability, in an action for negligence.

To suffer an escape to occur is a very grave offense in the sheriff, and subjects him to very severe punishment.

An action against a sheriff for permitting an escape on mesne process before judgment against the prisoner, can only be sustained by averring and proving that the prisoner was indebted to the plaintiff.

2 Sedgw. Damages, p. 546.

The true measure of damages is the value of the custody at the moment of the escape. The true inquiry is, Has the defendant, by his negligence, deprived the plaintiff of any legal means of securing the payment of his debts?

2 Sedgw. Damages, § 554.

The sheriff's liabilities for the escape of one arrested under criminal process are such only as the criminal law prescribes by way of punishment. He is never in such case liable, at any person's suit, in a civil action.

Smith, Sheriffs, p. 564.

Barr, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Many errors have been assigned, but we need only consider whether the suit as brought was maintainable. The opinion of the court is very brief, but the learned judge seems to have been of the opinion that no expenses incurred by the United States in causing the indictment, arrest, or removal of the prisoner, nor the expenses of his recapture, could be recovered against the sheriff and his sureties, unless such expenses could have been recovered against the prisoner had he been convicted, and that the fines which might have been assessed against him, had he been convicted of the offenses or offenses charged, could not be considered in estimating the damages unless the prisoner had been previously convicted and fined. It may be conceded that, had said Boalen been tried and convicted, none of the expenses alleged to have been incurred by the United States could have been assessed against him, and judgment rendered therefor on the indictment. But this is not an action at law against a sheriff for an escape in which the measure of damages is confined to the interest which a creditor has or might have in his imprisoned debtor. It is an action on the official bond of a sheriff, in which one of the obligations is that he will faithfully perform his duty as sheriff. Among other duties, the sheriff has the charge and custody of the jail of his county, and the prisoners legally committed therein, until discharged by law. This includes federal as well as state prisoners, and the Tennessee statute makes the sheriff civilly responsible for the acts of the jailer whom he appoints. Tennessee Code, §§ 6233-6242. The sheriff executed his bond to the state, but any party aggrieved can under the statute sue on the bond in the name of the state, and in such cases the suing party is considered the real plaintiff. Id. §§ 8492-8494.

The district court has, by the express terms of the act of congress, jurisdiction of all suits at common law brought by the United States; hence there is no difficulty as to the jurisdiction of that court, if there is a cause of action on this bond alleged in favor of the United States. It is insisted that although Boalen was in the legal custody of the sheriff, and his escape is alleged to have been by the negligence of the sheriff, the United States cannot maintain an action for his escape, because the United States, in the arrest and punishment of offenders against its laws acts as sovereign, and not in its corporate capacity, and, therefore, cannot have an action for damages whatever may have been the negligence of a jailer in allowing the escape of the prisoner Boalen; and Cotton v. United States, 52 U. S. 11 How. 229, 18 L. ed. 676, and South v. Maryland, 59 U. S. 18 How. 896, 15 L. ed. 483, are referred to as sustaining this proposition. Cotton v. United States, supra, was an action of trespass quare clavum fregit brought by the United States against Cotton for cutting and carrying away pine timber from the lands of the United States. The error complained of by Cotton was the refusal of the trial court to instruct: "(1) That the only remedy for the United States for cutting pine timber on public lands was by indictment; (2) that the United States have no common-law remedy for private wrongs." The supreme court sustained this refusal of the lower court, and there is nothing in the opinion sustaining the distinction suggested. Indeed, the court says, in answering the suggestion, that an indictment was the only remedy: that "the punishment of the public offense is no bar to the remedy for the private injury." In South v. Maryland, supra, the action was against a sheriff and his sureties for his refusal and neglect in not rescuing one Pottle from mob violence, and the court held the action could not be maintained. The court held that the duty of the sheriff to protect Pottle from mob violence arose from his being a conservator of the peace, and his neglect was not merely the neglect to perform a ministerial duty. In the opinion the court divided the duties and powers of a sheriff at common law into four distinct classes. In the ministerial class are put the duty of a sheriff as keeper of the county jail, and his liability for the safe keeping of prisoners committed to his custody. The court says, in the course of the opinion:

"It is an undisputed principle of the common law that for a breach of a public duty an officer is punishable by indictment; but where he acts ministerially, and is bound to render certain services to individuals for a compensation in fees or salary, he is liable for acts of misfeasance or nonfeasance to the party who is injured by him."

In this case an individual was suing; hence, the use of that word by the court. But the question of the liability of a ministerial officer in a civil action for misfeasance or nonfeasance to a state or the United States was neither presented nor considered by the court. Neither is there any suggestion of a distinction between the sovereign powers and the corporate capacity of the United States as to the right to institute a civil action. The sovereign power and corporate capacity of the United States are so intermingled that it is often impossible to separate them, or to know when one ceases and the other commences. But, whatever may be the distinction, it can have no relation to the right of the United States to bring a civil action or to defend one, if they so elect. It is argued, however, that as there has not been a trial of Boalen, and it is not alleged he was guilty of the crimes for which he is indicted, and for which he may be fined if guilty, there can be no recovery, because the alleged negligence of the jailer has not caused the United States any pecuniary injury, but rather the contrary, as the escaped prisoner was no longer a charge upon the United States. This argument overlooks the fact that the United States, in arresting and imprisoning Boalen, who was charged with the violation of its criminal laws, acted under an undoubted power, and in the performance of a duty, and that in the exercise of this power and the performance of this duty, it has expended money in causing the arrest, removal to Nashville, and the imprisonment there of Boalen, to secure his trial for indictable crimes, and that the benefit of the money thus expended by the United States has been entirely lost by the negligence of his jailer.

Such actions as this are unusual, but this fact is certainly not conclusive against the right, since criminal proceedings against an officer who has given bond for the faithful discharge of his duties, for misfeasance or nonfeasance in office, may have proven to be the more efficient remedy. No decision has been cited in which the right of action in such a case as this one has been denied, and there are two cases at least in which such right of action has been recognized and sustained. Com.

v. Reed 2 Bush, 618. 3 Bush, 516. In Com. v. Reed, 2 Bush, 618, the Kentucky court of appeals sustained an action on a sheriff's bond against him and his sureties for the negligence of the sheriff in failing to arrest a person on bench warrants issued on indictments for unlawful gaming, and for willfully taking insufficient surety on bond for the appearance of another person whom he had arrested for the same offense. The court of appeals, by C. J. Robertson, in the opinion said: "Although there may be no precedent for any judicial recognition of such a remedy, yet we perceive no reason why it should not be available; and it seems to us that principle sanctions it, and that it is sustained by both the common and statutory law of Kentucky."

This court, in another part of the opinion, says: "Nor is the undeterminateness of the damages, and the difficulty of ascertaining their precise amount by any certain or fixed standard, a sufficient answer. The same difficulty occurs in many other classes of action undoubtedly maintainable."

In this case the Tennessee statute makes the sheriff civilly responsible for the acts of the jailer whom he appoints, and as we have seen the United States may sue, and a cause of action is alleged in the declaration, the demurrer should have been overruled. The measure or extent of damages is not now before this court and we do not indicate an opinion thereon.

The judgment of the District Court sustaining the demurrer to the declaration and dismissing the action is reversed, and the District Court is directed to set aside said order, and proceed in conformity with this opinion.

Taft, Circuit Judge, concurring:

I concur in the foregoing opinion, and only wish to add that negligence of the sheriff resulting in the escape of Boalen, which made the duty of the United States as a government to apprehend and punish him more onerous in a pecuniary way, was a breach of the bond, and a pecuniary injury to the United States, for which they may recover damages. The last count in the declaration is for $1,000 expended in Boalen's recapture after his escape from the sheriff's custody, and that, even if there is no other averment of recoverable damages, as to which no opinion will be expressed, is sufficient to make the declaration good.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

Mattie D. FALLS et al., Appts.,

UNITED STATES SAVINGS, LOAN & BUILDING CO.

(97 Ala. 417.)

1. A statute recognizing as evidence the proceedings of any legislative body "purporting on the face of the book to be printed by authority of the government," applies to a book compiled by an individual under statutes which are printed in full at the beginning of the book and which recognize the compilation as authoritative and make it evidence.
2. One who executes a mortgage to a corporation as such to secure a loan of money cannot deny its corporate character to defeat foreclosure.
3. Charter privileges as to the rate of interest a corporation may receive on its loans are not available to it in a foreign state in contravention of the usury laws.
4. A statute giving special advantages to building and loan associations as to the rate of interest they may receive on loans will, unless a contrary intention appears, be confined in its operation to domestic corporations.
5. The steps taken to become a member of a building and loan association must be regulated by the law of its domicile, and the fees allowed by that law will be held valid everywhere.
6. An attorney's fee for the foreclosure of a mortgage expressly provided for in the instrument is collectible on foreclosure.

7. Persons compelled to take stock in a loan association to secure a loan, but for whom the scheme of the concern provides no dividends or other share in the profits, cannot be regarded as members and their payments as made upon stock calls for the purpose of taking them out of the usury law.

8. An agreement for a loan to be paid in seven equal annual installments, with interest reserved for the whole time at six per cent per annum on the amount of the original loan, is usurious under a statute permitting interest at 8 per cent per annum.

9. The laws of arithmetic are judicially noticed.

10. The borrowing of money from the local agent of a foreign loan association which maintains a place of business within the state and giving the association a mortgage as security through him is a local contract, although the papers are to be approved and the money paid at the domicile of the association, and the papers expressly state the contract is to be governed by the law of the domicile.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the City Court of Birmingham in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to foreclose a mortgage. Reversed.

In the complaint the complainant described itself as a body corporate under the laws of Minnesota, doing business in the county of Jefferson, state of Alabama. A demurrer was who takes shares as security, is treated at length in a note to Reeve v. Ladies Bldg. Assn., Perpetual (Ark.) 18 L. R. A. 129.

fled to the complaint on the ground that it was not shown therein that complainant had a known place of business in the state of Alabama; that it was not shown that the complainant had a resident agent in the state; that the bill shows the rate of interest was usurious. The demurrer was overruled. The answer alleged that the loan to secure which the mortgage was made was executed by the mortgagor for the benefit of her husband; that the entire transaction took place in the county of Jefferson, Ala., and that the effort to locate the transaction in Minnesota was to avoid the laws of the state of Alabama; and that the mortgage was contrary to the policy of the state of Alabama and void.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. John Vary, for appellants:

Foreign corporations are permitted to do business in this state by the law of comity. Such corporations have no more rights or privileges than the citizens of this state.

2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 965.

The laws of the state of Minnesota have no binding force, proprio vigore, outside of its territorial limits and jurisdiction.

2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 959.

The United States Savings Loan & Building Company is permitted to loan money in this state at the legal rate of interest just as any citizen may do because it has complied with the law in reference to appointing an agent with a known place of business.

Const. art. 14, Act 1886-87, p. 102.

But the said appellee is not permitted to loan money upon the building and loan plan in this state because it has not complied with the law of this state in reference to corporations engaged in similar business.

2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. §§ 505, 964; Story, Conf. L. 8th ed. § 106, note a; Hitchcock v. United States Bank, 7 Ala. 886; Nelms v. Edinburg American Land Mortg. Co. 92 Ala. 157; Martin v. Johnson, 8 L. R. A. 170, 84 Ga. 481; American Freehold Land Mortg. Co. v. Sewell, 18 L. R. A. 299, 92 Ala. 163; Dolman v. Cook, 14 N. J. Eq. 56; Campion v. Kille, Id. 229; Andrews v. Torrey, Id. 355.

This is simply an Alabama contract for the loan of money. In determining whether a contract is infected with usury, its substance and effect, not its form, are material.

Uhlfelder v. Carter, 64 Ala. 527.

The corporate powers, the by-laws, and the contract show the loan to be tainted with usury.

Mr. J. M. McMaster, for appellee:

Is the legislative incorporation of building and loan companies against the general sentiment or policy of civilized countries? We find them in England, in Canada, and in every state of this Union. The schemes are only different in the minuteness of their details; the general purpose of all is the same, their workings may be slightly different, but they are immaterial incidents, and have nothing to do with their general purport.

In Vermont Loan & T. Co. v. Whitted, 2 N. Dak. 82, the court uses the following language: "Endlich, on Building Associations, p. 161, says: 'If we consider the reasons which may be assumed to have guided legislatures in conferring upon building associations the extraordinary privileges and immunities which they enjoy, it will be readily understood (and there can be no other apology for it) that at the bottom of it all is a motive of public policy.'"

Contracts made upon valuable consideration by competent parties are never void as against public policy unless the objects or ends which they have in view "injuriously affect or subvert public interest, or are such as by their terms or contemplated manner of performance must work some mischief affecting the body politic."

What is there immoral in giving the wage earner a plan which he can adopt and utilize and become a freeholder of a country, closely identified by residence with his state and community.

The fine feature is a necessity going to the very essence of the corporation.

Endlich, Building Associations, p. 401.

As a matter of American history, the city of Philadelphia, known as the home of building and loan companies, has more owners of homes than any other city in the world of its population and it has been directly attributed to companies like the appellants. Can for a moment any system or plan with such beneficent effects be confronted with the charge of invading moral institutions?

Endlich, Building Associations, § 1.

The general assembly have sanctioned transactions of this kind by especially providing that building and loan companies may loan their funds in that way and to use the words of this court, "that which the legislature authorizes to be done cannot be in violation of law."

Security Loan Asso. v. Lake, 69 Ala. 456.

The transaction entered into by it with the appellant was one which in itself had been declared by the general assembly not to be offensive to the usury laws of the state.

These contracts are not usurious.

Reeves v. Ladies Bldg. Asso., Perpetual, 18 L. R. A. 129, 56 Ark. 335.

There is in the transaction an element of uncertainty and hazard that seems to exclude the idea of a loan of money at a usurious rate of interest. Where the promise to pay a sum above legal interest depends upon a contingency, and not upon the happening of a certain event, the loan is not usurious.

Spain v. Brent, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 604, 17 L. ed. 619; Tyler, Usury, pp. 89, 175, et seq.; Lloyd v. Scott, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 205, 7 L. ed. 883; Delano v. Wild, 6 Allen, 1, 88 Am. It cannot be well maintained that there is a corrupt intent to make a usurious contract when as the books everywhere show that judges of learning and ability in courts of last resort have after patient and careful consideration of contracts of this nature expressly held that they do not come under the operation of usury laws.

A building and loan company which has loaned money to one of its stockholders on a bond and mortgage conditioned for the payment of a specified interest with monthly installments on each share of stock owned by such member, until the principal is paid can recover on foreclosure the amount in arrear without any deduction for the monthly installments paid by the stockholder as he will receive the benefit of such installments in the increased value of the stock.

There can be no difference as a matter of principle between a member who takes stock for an investment, and a member who takes stock as a borrower from the association. The investor has to pay monthly payments on stock owned by him, and so does the borrower. The only difference is, that the borrower must pay interest, and in the case at bar Mrs. Falls contracted to pay 6 per cent.

Stone, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In Code 1886, § 2790, is this language: "The proceedings of any legislative body, purporting on the face of the book to be printed by authority of the government, state, or territory, are evidence without further proof." A book published in St. Paul, Minn., in 1879, was offered in evidence to prove the statute law of that state. It was objected to. The title page of the book has these words: "The General Statutes of the State of Minnesota. . . . Prepared by George B. Young." Immediately succeeding the foregoing statement is found the following: "Edited and published under the authority of chapter 67 of the Laws of 1878 and chapter 67 of the Laws of 1879." These statutes are printed in full on the second leaf of the book. Chapter 67 of the Statutes of 1878 declares that "the said statutes shall be compiled and published by a commission consisting of George B. Young and such others as he may associate with him, under the supervision and direction of the governor." Chapter 67 of the Statutes of 1879 provides that "the edition of the General Statutes and other public laws of this state in force at the close of the legislative session of eighteen hundred and seventy-eight (1878) prepared by George B. Young, pursuant to chapter sixty-seven (67) of the General Laws of Eighteen Hundred and Seventy-Eight (1878), shall be competent evidence of the several acts and resolutions therein contained, in all courts of this state, without further proof or authentication." It is difficult to conceive of language which would more clearly express the fact that the laws found in said book were printed by authority of the state than is here shown. Our statute does not require that the state shall be the publisher. That it is done with its authority is enough. Clanton v. Barnes, 50 Ala. 260; Bradley v. Northern Bank of Alabama, 60 Ala. 252. There is nothing in this exception. There is, if possible, less merit in the objection to the introduction in evidence of the Minnesota Compilation of Statutes, published in 1891, so far as those statutes can be considered in this case. See the certificates in the first of the volume, made by the secretary of state and state librarian, and see section 361 of the book itself.

The real transaction in this case was a loan of money by a Minnesota corporation—the United States Savings, Loan & Building Company—to Mrs. Falls; and the negotiation and agreed contract were conducted and consummated in Alabama. The corporation had a place of business in Birmingham, Ala., and had an agent thereat. It had complied with our constitutional and statutory provisions. Const. art. 14, § 4; Sess. Acts 1886-87, p. 102. This compliance gave it a constitutional and legal right to transact business in Alabama.

An objection was reserved to the action of the city court in receiving in evidence what purports to be a certified copy of the act and proceedings by which appellee was incorporated. The precise objection is that the authentication is not a compliance with legal requirements. We hold it to be unnecessary to decide this question. That the appellant executed the note and mortgage, the collection of which by foreclosure is the purpose of this suit, is fully shown, and nowhere denied. We hold that the mortgage shows on its face that the United States Savings, Loan & Building Company is a corporation. This is shown in very many of its recitals, and this dispensed with all proof of its incorporation. So whether the transcript was properly authenticated or not was immaterial. Mrs. Falls had admitted complainant's corporate character by the execution of the mortgage. 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 39; 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. §§ 592, 774. Each separate government or state has its own legislative system and policy; and in determining and enforcing rights which originate out of our jurisdiction, comity requires that we shall admeasure the redress by the yardstick of the place where the right accrued. In entering into contracts, if nothing appear to the contrary, the law of the place silently becomes a part of the contract, and determines the measure of right it secures. This right by comity, however, has limitations. No state will enforce contracts or redress grievances entered into or suffered in another state or foreign country, if the enforcement involve a breach of legal or moral right as maintained in the law of the forum. When a corporation of foreign creation not only attempts to enforce rights before our tribunals, but goes further, and actually performs corporate acts within our jurisdiction, they can claim and exercise no exceptional rights or privileges which may have been conferred by the law of their creation, if such enforcement involves a breach of our own public policy or statutory system. The legislature of one state cannot confer rights and authorize their exercise beyond its own boundaries, unless they be in harmony with the general policy of the state or country in which the exercise is attempted. "The power of a corporation to act in a foreign country depends both upon the law of the country where it was created, and on the law of the country where it assumes to act. It has only such powers as were given to it by the authority which created it. It cannot do any act by virtue of those powers in any country where the laws forbid it so to act. It follows that every country may impose conditions and restrictions upon foreign corporations which transact business within its limits." Story, Conf. Laws, 8th ed. § 106, note a. In 2 Morawetz, Private Corporations, § 959, is this language: "It is a fundamental principle that the laws of a state can have no binding force, proprio vigore, outside of the territorial limits and jurisdiction of the state enacting them." And in section 964 the same author says: "It has been held that, although a corporation be expressly authorized by its charter to charge a certain rate of interest upon its loans, it will nevertheless not be permitted to charge the same rate in a foreign state, if that would be contrary to the usury laws there in force." And in section 965 this author says: "Foreign corporations have no right by the law of comity to do acts within a state which are prohibited by the laws of that state to its own citizens or corporations engaged in a similar business." It is not our intention to determine in this case whether a building and loan association, incorporated and doing business in Alabama, can contract for and recover a greater rate of interest than 8 per cent per annum. See our statutory system, commencing with section 1558 of the Code of 1886. What we do decide is that the statutes of Minnesota have no binding force with us; and any provision found in them which authorizes a corporation of their creation to contract for and recover more than 8 per cent for the loan or forbearance of money is obnoxious to our statute enacted for the prevention of usury. We hold, further, that the contract which gave rise to the present suit is an Alabama contract, and can only be enforced to the extent our statutes permit. Any statute of this state which may be supposed to confer on building and loan associations the right to charge more than 8 per cent interest, even if we concede such statutory authority, must be confined in its operation to such corporations as are chartered in Alabama. It cannot be supposed that our legislation had a greater purpose or intent than this. We have made no accurate calculation, and hence cannot declare the precise rate of interest Mrs. Falls would be required to pay, if she were to comply with the letter of her contract. It is greatly in excess of 8 per cent per annum. The plea of usury is very fully sustained. With us, however, usury is only a partial defense. It extends only to a denial of all interest, when the party contracting to receive usury is the complainant. The rule in chancery is different from that which prevails at common law. Dawson v. Burrus, 73 Ala. 111; Uhlfelder v. Carter, 64 Ala. 527.

Several other defenses were urged in this case which we consider untenable. This was in no sense a loan of money to the husband. The loan was to Mrs. Falls; and we think there is nothing in any of the objections urged, save the single one of usury. That, with us, is only a partial defense. A single feature of the controversy before us, we think, must be governed by the laws of Minnesota. The United States Savings, Loan & Building Company was incorporated under the laws of Minnesota, and has its business domicile in that state. The first step taken by Mrs. Falls was to constitute herself a stockholder in that corporation. This act must be considered as having been performed in Minnesota, and as governed by the laws of that state. Under their system corporations in forming are permitted to charge a graduated membership fee. In the case before us it amounted to $155. We hold that this fee, together with the agreed attorney's charge of $200 for foreclosing the mortgage, is collectible. The latter—the attorney's fee of $200—is expressly provided for in the mortgage. No question is raised upon its reasonableness, and we feel no hesitancy in holding that this item was properly allowed to complainant. Mrs. Falls did not receive the full $10,000, the amount of the agreed loan. Three monthly installments were retained, amounting to $510; also the membership fee, $155, was withheld; the latter rightfully, as we think, and she is entitled to no credit for that. What she actually owes is $9,490, plus $200 attorney's fee for foreclosing the mortgage. The decree of the chancellor is reversed, and a decree here rendered that the complainant, instead of the sum of $12,638, recovered in the court below, have and recover of appellants $9,490, and other $200 attorney's fee with a lien, and to be enforced as directed in the decree of the chancellor. Let the costs of appeal be paid by the appellee.

A rehearing was subsequently asked for and on May 2, 1893, the following additional opinion was filed:

Since the opinion in this case was delivered, November 25, 1892, an elaborate and earnest argument has been submitted by appellee, asking a reconsideration of that decision. One position assumed and pressed with great zeal is that the contract under consideration is not tainted with usury, even assuming it to be governed by the statutes of Alabama. The precise argument used in this connection is that the payments stipulated to be made monthly by Mrs. Falls, other than those which are, in the very terms of the by-laws and contract, called "interest," are not payments on the debt contracted, but calls or installments paid on the shares of stock subscribed for. If this position be sound, the interest actually collected is only one-half of 1 per cent per month, equal to 6 per cent per annum, and hence not usurious. The corporate powers, by-laws, and methods of doing business which pertain to the United States Savings, Loan & Building Company are set forth in the transcript before us. We will briefly sketch what we understand to be the main features of its plan of operations, so far as it is necessary to a proper understanding of this case. The authorized capital of the corporation was and is $10,000,000. It is divided into shares valued at $100 each. Unlike most money corporations the capital stock is not required to be paid in at or within a short time after organization, with a view of supplying a fixed security for creditors. On the contrary, the shares are paid for in monthly installments, aggregating 7.20 per cent during the year, or six-tenths of 1 per cent per month. Paid at this rate, and without other resource, the entire capital stock will be paid in a fraction under fourteen years. This is the rate to non-borrowers, called "investors." The business of the corporation is lending its money, and its chief loans are made on real security, appraised and valued at double the amount of the loan. The monthly installments paid in, less 10 per cent thereof reserved to defray the expense of administering the corporation, supplemented with the monthly payments of interest, constitute the operating capital of the corporation, on which it conducts its business of lending money. These loans are made monthly, and consequently the funds are kept employed and interest-bearing. What are denominated "shareholders" are divided into two classes,—those who borrow from the corporation, and those who do not. To obtain a loan from the corporation, the applicant must first become a shareholder, paying for the privilege a small, graduated membership fee, of $1.60 per share, down to 75 cents. After paying three monthly installments, he may apply for and obtain a loan on the following terms and conditions: (1) The applicant must first obtain the requisite shares of stock; and for this service he must subscribe for double the number of shares, which would be requisite to make up the sum proposed to be borrowed, rating the shares at their full matured value of $100 each. So, in borrowing $10,000,—the sum borrowed in this case,—the borrower must subscribe for 200 shares. That was done in this case. (2) The applicant must also have paid three monthly installments of 60 cents per share, and three months' interest on the sum proposed to be borrowed, at 6 per cent interest. These sums, which were required to be prepaid, in this case amount to $510; being for installments, $360, and for interest, $150. So the borrower actually obtained only $9,490. (3) The borrower, before obtaining the loan, was required to, and did bid 100 of his subscribed shares, to be surrendered to the company as a bonus for the privilege and personal favor of being allowed to become a borrower; but monthly installments exacted from shareholders of 60 cents per month were still required to be paid by the borrower on the entire number of subscribed shares, including the 100 surrendered as a bonus. So the borrower is required to pay, and did bind himself to pay, in this case, double the sum of the installments required of nonborrowers,—equal to one seventh of the sum borrowed. These payments, unaided, if credited, without discount or diminution, would mature the stock and extinguish the debt in seven years. (4) The borrower was required to mortgage and did mortgage real estate appraised at $20,000, to secure the payment of the monthly installments and interest until the sum borrowed should be repaid, after deducting from all installments paid a sum to cover the operating expenses. (5) In addition to this mortgage security the borrower was also required to pledge and did pledge for the repayment of the money borrowed her remaining 100 shares of stock which had been made the basis of the loan. (6) Notwithstanding the installments required to be paid monthly, which in the course of the year amounted, in addition to interest paid during the year, to a fraction over 14 per cent of the principal of the money borrowed,—the sum of the year's installments paid on the principal of the debt being one seventh thereof,—this did not diminish the sum of the interest required to be paid each year, so long as any portion of the money borrowed remained unpaid. Thus: The sum borrowed in this case was $10,000. The agreed interest on this was 6 per cent, equal to $600 for the first year. But the payment of this same sum of $600 interest was to be kept up so long as any of the principal debt remained unpaid. Even when the principal of the debt became reduced by installments paid to one seventh of the original sum borrowed, the rules of the company and the contract in this case required the borrower to pay the same agreed amount of interest—$600—for the forbearance of the remaining one seventh of the debt for one year.

The borrowers must first become shareholders. In what sense do they become such? They acquire none of the privileges or rights of shareholders, in the ordinary sense of that term. They receive no dividends, and have no share in the profits of the enterprise. When they repay the money borrowed, according to the terms of the loan, they receive no certificate of stock, and when the business of the corporation is wound up, they have neither part nor lot in its profits or accumulations. On the contrary, when the principal debt is extinguished by the payment of the monthly installments demanded, and the fixed, unchanging sum of agreed, so-called "interest," is paid up to and including the time when the installments extinguish the principal debt, then their connection with and interest in the enterprise ceases. Not by the receipt or retention of a certificate of stock. Not by any participation or right to participate in the profits or accumulations of the adventure. It ceases by a cancellation of the so-called "certificates of stock," and a final severance of the borrower's connection with the corporation. By the very terms of the note and mortgage the borrower is required to make the agreed monthly payments of installments and interest, "until said stock becomes fully paid in, and of the value of $100 per share, . . . and shall then surrender said stock to said company in payment of said note." These are the terms the contract imposes on the borrower; these the conditions on which she can obtain a release of her lands from the mortgage lien. When these terms are complied with (and of course not till then), "this deed [the mortgage] shall be null and void, otherwise to remain in full force and effect." It is nowhere said that the borrower shall share in the profits or assets of the association; the very language of the note and mortgage as copied repels such interpretation. Can it with any propriety be said that persons, filling the relation we have been describing, ever become shareholders in the corporation? They acquire none of the rights which attach to that relation. Are they not simply borrowers of money; and is not all else simply machinery to bring about that end,—useless machinery, save that it may furnish excuse for demanding of the borrower a membership fee, and that he shall contribute to the expense fund of the corporation's administration? The corporation is also empowered to impose and does impose penalties and forfeitures for delays and defaults in the payment of installments and interest. Such imposed penalties are found in the transcript before us. Being practically a loan of money, was the loan in the present case an agreement to demand and pay a greater rate of interest than 8 per cent per annum,—the lawful interest of the state of Alabama? We employ the word "agreement" intentionally; for, to be usurious, the contract itself must stipulate for interest above the lawful rate. We have been referred to two calculations, with the view of convincing us that the interest stipulated to be paid in this case is not usurious on its face. One of those calculations is shown in the deposition of the witness Douglas, found in the transcript before us. The other is seen in the report of the case of Thompson v. Gillison, 28 S. C. 584. In each of those instances the calculator was betrayed into the same oversight or error. Each allowed to the lender the same sum as interest for each of the years the loan was permitted to run, as if the principal or interest bearing fund had remained undiminished during the whole term of the loan. Had that been the case,—in other words, if the borrower had paid only the interest during the intervening years, and had left the principal intact until the final settlement, and then paid the entire principal at one time,—their calculations would stand vindicated. This, because in such case the interest-bearing fund would remain the same during the entire period of the loan. But they were not dealing with such facts. The problem they were handling was like the one we have in hand; the principal, or interest-bearing debt, was being reduced, say, one seventh each year. We have made many calculations, and have, in that way, demonstrated the correctness of the proposition that, by the very terms of the contract Mrs. Falls made with the United States Savings, Loan & Building Company, she bound herself to pay interest, and to pay it monthly, at a rate greatly in excess of 6 per cent per annum, and very materially in excess of 8 per cent per annum.

Let us state the account on the facts of the case we have in hand. Computing the several payments of the principal debt required to be made during each year as aggregating one seventh of the debt, the whole debt will necessarily become extinguished in seven years. In this we do not compute the sums paid as interest, but include only the excess of the several payments over and above interest. Thus, the sum of the amount of the loan being $10,000, it necessarily follows that for the first year the interest-bearing debt must be $10,000. But the principal, or interest-bearing debt, being reduced one seventh by payments during the first year, it follows that the sum of the debt left unpaid for the computation of interest for the second year will be only six sevenths of $10,000. And so the process of reduction of the interest-bearing debt will go on at the rate of one seventh each year. For the seventh year the principal on which interest is to be computed will be only one seventh of $10,000; a fraction over $1,428. Six per cent interest paid at the fixed, unchanging sum of $600 per annum for these seven years will aggregate $4,200. Calculated on the balances left after the several yearly payments are deducted, the sum of the several payments of interest will amount to $2,400, or four sevenths of $4,200. This shows an excess of interest stipulated to be paid during the seven years of $1,800, if we compute interest at 6 per cent per annum. If the unchanging sum of $600, stipulated to be paid during each year —aggregating $4,200 during the seven years —be in fact paid, the borrower, instead of paying 6 per cent for the forbearance of the money, will in fact have paid at the average rate of 10½ per cent per annum. And this excess of interest Mrs. Falls bound herself to pay by the very terms of the contract she entered into. The contract requires Mrs. Falls to pay $170 per month, equal to $2,040 during each year. In the calculations we submit, we treat these payments as if made in gross at the end of each year. Treating them thus, and computing interest only on the balances left after the annual payments, the following results are shown: (1) At 6 per cent interest, the debt of $10,000 will be entirely extinguished, principal and interest, by these annual payments of $2,040, in a fraction less than six years; and in so paying, the entire interest paid by the borrower will amount to a fraction less than $2,200. Paid at the agreed rate of $600 for each of the six years, it would amount to $3,600. (2) At 8 per cent interest, the same annual payment of $2,040 would extinguish the debt, principal and interest, in something less than six and one-half years, while the sum of all the interest paid would be $3,178. Paid on the basis of the contract at the gross sum of $800 per year, it would amount to $5,200. We might give other examples by way of illustration; but we think these sufficient. It will be observed that, in making our calculations, we have assumed that the borrower received the full $10,000. She actually received only $9,490. And we have pretermitted all consideration of the membership fee she was required to pay, and her share of the operating expenses of the corporation, which the rules of the association hold her liable for. We have likewise taken no account of the fact that the interest was made payable monthly. These items brought into the account would materially swell the burden the contract imposes on the borrower.

If further proof be required to show the contract we are considering is usurious in its terms, it is furnished in the decree the chancellor rendered in this cause. No one contends that in rendering his decree he went beyond the letter of the contract he was construing. Yet, although the decree was rendered less than two years after the money was borrowed, the $10,000 had increased to $12,638; and of this sum only $440 was for fines assessed for nonpayment of monthly installments and interest. This taken from the $12,638 leaves about $2,300 of interest and charges for the use of $10,000 from the date of the contract—May 10, 1890—to the date of the decree,—March 10, 1892. This accorded to complainant about 1 per cent interest per month, or 12 per cent per annum. The other class of shareholders are nonborrowers, sometimes called "investors." The monthly installments required of these is just one half of the sum required of the borrowers,—being one fourteenth of the value of their stock,—and they pay no interest. They have no shares required to be surrendered as a bonus, or premium; no dead shares. They pay installments only on the shares they own, and acquire all the rights of shareholders or stockholders in the corporation, to the extent of the stock they subscribe for. They have a voice in the government of the corporation, and share in its dividends and other accumulated assets. They share ratably in all the excess of interest paid by the borrowers, and in this way realize more than lawful interest on their investment. Under all the calculations, the shares of the investors mature in about seven years up to the full $100 per share. These are shareholders in fact and in law, for they have all the powers and rights of shareholders in corporations. No one will dispute that the investors realize more than lawful interest. Whence comes the fund from which this excess of interest is realized? It must come from the borrowers, for there is no other source from which it can be derived. To secure to one class unlawful interest, while none of the shareholders pay in excess of the lawful rate, is a physical impossibility. The consequence is that their shares will have matured up to their full value of $100 per share, while they have paid out but little, if any, over half that sum, and have lain out of the use of their money for a time which averages only three and a half years, or four at most. So, the nonborrower realizes a much higher rate of usurious interest than the borrower pays. This, because there are many more borrowers who pay usurious interest than there are investors who divide that usury between them. We have said this was practically a loan of money. Stripped of all mere formal accompaniments, we are not able to discover any material connection Mrs. Falls ever had with the corporation, other than as a borrower of money. She had no voice in its government, no share in its profits or assets. In determining the character of any given transaction, the law regards the substance, not the form it is made to assume. In Uhlfelder v. Carter, 64 Ala. 527, this court said: "In determining whether a contract is infected with usury, its substance and effect, not its form, are material. The intent to take or reserve more than lawful interest for the loan of money, or the forbearance of a debt, must exist; and this is deduced from the relations of the parties, their acts contemporaneous with or subsequent to the contract, and all attendant circumstances. When this intent exists, and such is the substance and effect of the contract, no form or covering which may be given to it, no device or shift, can sustain it. A simple loan, or the mere forbearance of an existing debt, which, with the lawful interest, is not put at hazard, but is certainly to be paid, will become usurious, by ingrafting upon it stipulations intended for the additional profit of the creditor, and not as compensation for loss or inconvenience he may bear." Our calculations and argument are based, not on contingent or possible losses the association may suffer in its administration. We have considered the questions on a basis the most favorable and successful that could possibly attend the enterprise, even if every borrower meets his contractual engagements punctually, and every installment is paid on the day it matures. We have allowed to the borrower full credit for the entire sum of the installments he is required to pay, without deduction of anything therefrom to meet corporation or other expenses or losses. And we have shown that with these most favorable, possible results,—we may say impossible,—the borrower is bound, by the very letter of the contract, to pay a rate of interest greatly in excess of 8 per cent per annum. And it is of no moment that no witness testifies that the interest is usurious. The corporate powers, the by-laws, and the contract are shown in the transcript, and these furnish the evidence—the indisputable evidence—that the rate of interest required and contracted to be paid is manifestly in excess of 8 per cent. The question is simply one of arithmetical calculation,—and the laws of arithmetic are judicially taken notice of,—and the excess is so obvious that it is impossible to suppose it was not intended. The excess of interest, noted above, is one of the fixed, certain terms of the contract by which the money was lent, and which Mrs. Falls, in obtaining the loan, bound herself to pay. No ingenuity can infuse any element of contingency or uncertainty into her contractual obligation to pay up to this point. Beyond this, however, there is an uncertain liability, namely, it cannot, from anything shown to us, be certainly known how much she may be required to pay beyond the sums shown in our calculations. Enough for us that the contract itself requires the borrower to pay more than lawful interest.

But there was another reason operating upon the writer of this opinion which induced him to request a recall of the certificate of reversal, and a further consideration of the case. He had come to doubt the correctness of the conclusion announced, that in determining the question of usury, we must be governed by the Alabama statutes. The facts shown by the record are as follows: "The United States Savings, Loan & Building Company is a private corporation, incorporated under the laws of Minnesota, located and doing business in the city of St. Paul, of that state. One of its purposes is the loan of money on long time, secured by mortgage on real estate, the accruing interest and partial installments of the principal to be repaid monthly. True, they are not in the books of the corporation, or in the contract of the parties, called installments of the debt, but monthly payments on the capital stock. We think, however, that this is a misnomer; for we cannot perceive that the borrower on subscribed shares ever becomes a stockholder in fact. He acquires none of the rights or powers of a stockholder, as that term is generally understood and applied. The negotiation for a loan was entered upon in Birmingham, Ala. That negotiation was conducted by the husband of Mrs. Falls, representing her, and by a soliciting agent, representing the corporation. As we understand the record, the following comprises substantially what was done in Alabama: The soliciting agent furnished the information and the blanks necessary to be filled out and signed, in order to make the application in proper form to obtain membership and the loan, and probably filled those blanks, and forwarded the application. It is probable that he also represented the corporation in having the abstract of title prepared, a valuation made of the property offered as security, and the preparation of the note and mortgage, to be executed by the applicant. All these acts, however, were provisory. They were but an offer. It is not only not shown that the soliciting agent entered into any binding contract that the company would accept the offer and lend the money, but the converse of this proposition is established. Not until the proposition was considered at the home office, not until the papers were examined and the offer accepted, was any contract made which would bind the company. Not until then could Mrs. Falls have maintained an action for a breach of contract, if the company had refused to advance the money; for no contract had been concluded. Such is the unmistakable language of the record. Derrick v. Monette, 73 Ala. 75; 3 Brickell, Dig. p. 361, § 426; Whart. Conf. L. § 421. When Mrs. Falls' proposition was accepted, a check for the money was issued by the proper officer of the United States Savings, Loan & Building Company, in St. Paul, Minn., payable to the order of Mrs. Falls. That check was drawn on the Minnesota Loan & Trust Company, the building and loan company's trustees, having its business habitation in Minneapolis, Minn. True, that check was cashed at a bank in Birmingham, Ala., but there is nothing unusual in that; and it is not shown that the building and loan company had any agency in procuring that to be done, even if we concede such agency would affect the question. The note given by Mrs. Falls and her husband, although signed in Birmingham, Ala., is made payable "to the order of the United States Savings, Loan and Building Company at the office of the treasurer, St. Paul, or to its trustee in Minneapolis, Minn. . . . This note is understood to be made with reference to and under the laws of the state of Minnesota." The mortgage also stipulates that the money is to be paid "at the office of [the company's] treasurer at St. Paul, Minnesota, or at the office of its trustee, Minneapolis, Minnesota;" and it also contains the clause: "This mortgage is understood to be made with reference to and under the laws of the state of Minnesota." So, we repeat, no binding contract was agreed on or concluded in Alabama. That justly celebrated jurist, Chancellor Kent (2 Com. 459), employed this language: "If a contract be made under one government, and 'is to be performed under another, and the parties had in view the laws of such other country in reference to the execution of the contract, the general rule is that the contract, in respect to its construction and force, is to be governed by the law of the country or state in which it is to be executed; and the foreign law is in such cases adopted, and effect given to it." In Story on Conflict of Laws, § 280, 24 L. R. A.

it is said: "Where the contract is, either expressly or tacitly, to be performed in any other place, there the general rule is in conformity to the presumed intention of the parties that the contract, as to its validity, nature, obligation, and interpretation, is to be governed by the law of the place of performance." In 8 American & English Encyclopedia of Law, 543, 544, the principle is thus expressed: "As a general rule, the validity of a contract is to be determined by the law of the place where it is made, unless it appears on its face that it was to be performed, or was made, in reference to the laws of some other place, in which case it will be governed by the laws of the place of the performance." Each of these standard works has an abundant citation of authorities. See also, Hunt v. Hall, 37 Ala. 702; Cubbage v. Napier, 62 Ala. 518; American Freehold Land Mortg. Co. v. Sewell, 92 Ala. 163, 13 L. R. A. 999; Boone, Mortg. § 86; Hanrick v. Andrews, 9 Port. (Ala.) 9; De Wolf v. Johnson, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 367, 6 L. ed. 343; Cromwell v. Sac County, 96 U. S. 51, 24 L. ed. 681; Peyton v. Heinikin, 131 U. S. Append. ci. and 20 L. ed. 679; Dolman v. Cook, 14 N. J. Eq. 56; Goodrich v. Williams, 50 Ga. 425.

I am aware that artifice is sometimes resorted to in the making of contracts, with a view of evading the laws against usury. To this end a false or fictitious place of performance is sometimes inserted in the writing. Whenever such attempt is made to appear, the courts refuse to lend their sanction to it. If such was the intention in this case, it has not been shown. I feel forced by the authorities to hold that, in the matter of collectible interest under this contract, the laws of Minnesota must govern. It is not my intention to disturb our former rulings as to the law which should govern this contract. On that question I think the present case clearly distinguishable from any we have heretofore decided, in two particulars. First, the final agreement of the parties—the closing of the bargain—was consummated in Minnesota, and the money borrowed was promised to be repaid there; second, it is one of the express terms of the contract that it is "made with reference to and under the laws of Minnesota." This provision, standing alone, would not be decisive, for it might be prostituted to improper uses. Taken in connection with the facts of this case, I think it supports the conclusion I have reached. I repeat: It is not my intention to overturn our former rulings. Farrior v. New England Mortg. Secur. Co. 88 Ala. 275; American Freehold Land Mortg. Co. v. Sewell, supra; Evans v. Kittrell, 33 Ala. 449.

The foregoing is only my own opinion, formed alone on what is shown in the transcript. My brothers, however differ with me, and adhere to the first opinion. The result is that the application for a reversal of the former ruling is denied.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

Frank CARGILL et al., Plffs. in Err.,

v.

KOUNTZE BROS.

(86 Tex. 386.)

1. Bills of discovery are not authorized under the Texas practice, in which law and equity are blended into one system, and in which statutory provisions have been made for the discovery of evidence by simple interrogatories in a pending suit and for depositions of the adverse party.
2. Re-enactment of a statute which has been construed by the courts must be presumed to be with the intent to adopt that construction.

NOTE.—Right to discovery by bill where the statutes provide for the examination of the party before trial.

The jurisdiction in equity for discovery originated in the absence of power in courts of law to compel a discovery by their own process, either by means of the oath of a party, or by the production of deeds, books, and writings in his possession or control.

It does not, however, follow that because the courts of law have had power given to them to grant such relief, courts of equity have therefore been wholly deprived of the right to entertain such bills which formed part of the ancient well-settled jurisdiction of the latter courts. Colgate v. Compagnie Francaise du Telegraphe de Paris, a New York, 23 Fed. Rep. 82.

The principle that courts of equity will not yield the jurisdiction vested in them, merely because of the extended powers of courts of law, seems to be vigorously asserted. Ibid.

Accordingly it is no reason why, merely on account of the enlarged powers of the courts of law, equity should refuse relief. Ibid.; Millsaps v. Pfeiffer, 44 Miss. 306; Shotwell v. Smith, 30 N. J. Eq. 79.

The question how far jurisdiction will now be entertained for the purpose of compelling discovery by bill in equity, in cases where jurisdiction has been conferred upon courts of law by statutes of the different states, is one upon which the practice of the courts in the different states is not uniform.

The right to the bill in equity has been expressly abolished by statute in some states. Thus, relief by way of the old bill of discovery has been abrogated by statute in Arkansas, except in cases mentioned in section 4922 of the digest of the statutes of that state infra, and in Connecticut to a certain degree.

So in Dakota and in Iowa, except in cases mentioned in section 3723 of the Code of the latter state. And in Missouri, Montana, New York, when brought in aid of another action, North Carolina, Ohio, South Carolina, Texas, and Wisconsin.

The right, however, would still seem to exist in the following states, even though provision has been made for the examination of the parties pending the action.

Thus in Alabama, Georgia, Illinois, Maryland, Mississippi, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia, although the common law practice has been enlarged in this respect by statute in those states.

In Michigan, the question would seem to be an open one.

ERROR to the Court of Civil Appeals for the First Supreme Judicial District to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Circuit Court for Harris County in favor of defendants in a proceeding brought to compel them to discover assets which might be reached by an execution upon a judgment which had been recovered against them. Reversed.

Statement by Gaines, J.:

This suit was brought by Kountze Bros., alleging themselves to be creditors of Cargill & Dennis, to compel the latter to make discovery of their assets. After stating that the plaintiffs had obtained a judgment against the defendants for $1,054; that they had sued out executions, which had been returned "No property found;" and that they had caused an abstract of the judgment to be filed in the when in aid of another suit, yet they would seem to exist for other purposes. Hart v. Albright, 23 Abb. N. C. 74, infra; Shoe & Leather Reporters Asso. v. Bailey, infra.

Alabama.

In Cannon v. McNab, 48 Ala. 99, it was held that the laws of that state allowing the parties to be examined as witnesses, did not take away the right to a bill in equity seeking a discovery.

The same principles are upheld in Shackelford v. Bankhead, 72 Ala. 476, wherein it was stated that the well-established jurisdiction of equity in matters of discovery was not ousted or in any wise affected by the statutory changes in the common-law rules of evidence.

And again in Handley v. Hedlin, 84 Ala. 600, where the bill was sought as auxiliary to an account.

In Wood v. Hudson, 96 Ala. 469, 530, it was held that the well-established jurisdiction of a court of equity to compel a discovery from a party, was not affected by the statutory provisions, which permitted an examination of the parties to a suit as a witness in a court of law, the jurisdiction remaining the same as before the adoption of the statute.

Under sections 3544-3547 of the Alabama Code, as amended by the Act of 1888, 1889, page 96, the remedy of a simple contract creditor is enlarged, and under their provisions he may maintain a bill for discovery and relief in certain cases for which the general principles of courts of equity, without the statutory aid, would be wholly inefficient. Sweetser v. Buchanan, 94 Ala. 574.

Under the above sections a creditor's bill upon a simple contract alleging that the defendant had "property, or an interest in property, real or personal, or money or effects, or chose in action, subject to the payment of his debts," but that the kind and description of the property and how held was concealed and unknown to the petitioner, and seeking a discovery thereof, was allowed. Ibid.

Arizona.

The right to discovery by means of bill in equity would seem to have been abrogated by the Compiled Laws of this state of 1887, section 2855. But by the Revised Statutes of this state, ed. of 1887, chap. 48, of the Compiled Laws relating to proceedings in civil cases is repealed.

Under the Revised Statutes of the state, ed. of 1887, section 1855, page 329, either party to a suit may make the deposition of the opposing party as a witness, and shall have the same process to obtain his testimony as in the case of any other witness, th-office of the clerk of the county court of Harris county, so as to secure a lien upon the real estate of defendants in that county,—they proceed, in their petition, to make the following allegations: "And your petitioners represent that, shortly before the recovery of said judgment against Cargill & Dennis, they, the said Cargill & Dennis, were, and for several years previous thereto had been, and are now, engaged in divers money-making and speculative enterprises and transactions, and your petitioners are informed and believe that, in the course of such business pursuits of the said Frank Cargill and E. L. Dennis, divers persons became indebted to them to a large amount, and that the defendants, Cargill & Dennis, have, at the time of filing this, your petitioners' bill of complaint, debts due to them, and for which they hold divers securities and evidences to a large amount, and have divers goods, wares, and merchandise, or other articles of personal property, which belong to them, or in which they are in some way beneficially interested, and that they have equitable interests and things in action, of some kind or nature, which might or ought to be applied to the payment of your petitioners' said judgment against them, the defendants, Cargill & Dennis. And your petitioners further represent that the defendants, Frank Cargill and E. L. Dennis, more especially E. L. Dennis, are owners of, or in some way or manner beneficially interested in some real estate in this or some other state or territory, or some chattels real, of some name or kind, or in some contract or agreement relating to real estate, or rents or issues and profits of some real estate, and also that the defendants are the owners of, or in some way or manner beneficially interested in, the stock of some company, incorporated or unincorporated, or in examination being conducted in the same manner as in the case of other witnesses.

And under section 1862 of the same statutes, the common law of England as now practiced and understood in its application to evidence has to be followed and practiced so far as not inconsistent with this act or any other law.

Arkansas.

Under the Digest of the Statutes of Arkansas, ed. of 1884, chap. 119, page 970, section 4921, no action to obtain a discovery shall be brought except as provided in the next section, and section 4922 provides where any person or corporation is liable, either jointly or severally with others by the same contract, an action may be brought against any of the parties who are liable to obtain discovery of the names and residences of the others who are also liable.

California.

In Pacific Bank v. Robinson, 57 Cal. 520, 40 Am. Rep. 120, it was held that a creditor might compel his debtor, who refused to apply property to the satisfaction of a judgment upon examination in supplementary proceedings, to deliver such property up in satisfaction, under the Code of Civil Procedure, sections 714, 721, which was intended as a substitute for the creditor's bill as formerly used in chancery.

Connecticut.

A discovery is auxiliary or incidental to the relief, and if the relief is unattainable, the discovery can answer no imaginable purpose. Welles v. Rhodes, 59 Conn. 498.

Chapter 22 of the Statute of 1889 provides the plaintiff at any time after entry of action, and the defendant at any time after answer, may file a motion praying for the disclosure of facts or production of papers, books, or documents material to the support or defense of the suit within the knowledge, possession, or power of the adverse party, and such facts, papers, books, or documents being disclosed or produced may be given in evidence by the party filing such motion.

The question was raised whether or not, under the above section, a defendant would have a right to call upon plaintiff in defense of the trial, to disclose the proof proposed to be offered by him for the express purpose of enabling the defendant to prepare his defense, and it was held that the section countenanced no such claim and did not indicate that either party could procure such disclosure to enable him to state his case; that he must first state his case and then seek the disclosure for the purpose of proving it. Downie v. Nettleton, 61 Conn. 598.

The statute was not designed to enlarge the scope of an equitable principle, but simply to enable a court of law, in administering legal remedies, to exercise and clearly define the power of a court of equity. Ibid.

In Welles v. Rhodes, supra, it was said that it was very doubtful whether the plaintiff, who was seeking to remove a cloud upon title, could not have obtained, under the provisions of chapter 22 of the Public Acts of 1889, all that he was seeking in equity by way of discovery.

Dakota.

Under section 438 of the Dakota Code, ed. 1885, page 128, no action to obtain discovery under oath in aid of the prosecution or defense of another action shall be allowed, nor shall any examination of a party be had on behalf of the adverse party, except in the manner prescribed by this chapter.

Georgia.

Under section 8610 of the Code of Georgia, ed. 1882, page 991, discovery may be had from the opposite party, either nominal or real, in any case pending in any court in this state.

In Mahone v. Central Bank of Georgia, 17 Ga. 111, relief was asked in equity for the purpose of discovery, the defendant contending that under the Act of 1847, the plaintiff had a right to administer interrogatories at common law, and that therefore the proceedings in equity could not stand. The court held that the Act of 1847 did not preclude any person from exhibiting his bill in chancery for discovery touching the same matters, and that therefore the plaintiff's right to a discovery in equity was not lessened by such act.

Illinois.

Where an administrator filed a bill of discovery against the defendant, to ascertain the date, time of maturity, rate of interest, and place of payment of promissory notes given to the intestate, plaintiff alleging his inability to declare upon the said notes by reason of want of such knowledge, and the defendant relied upon section 81 of chapter 8 of the Revised Statutes of Illinois, giving an adequate remedy at law, and also upon the provisions of the statutes, compelling the testimony of the defendant on his behalf in a suit at law and allowing amendments to the declaration which such evidence might make requisite,—it was held that the original power of equity in such cases was not to be the profits of some company or copartnership, and also that they have in their possession at the time of filing this, your petitioners' bill of complaint some money or bank bills; or that they have money deposited in some bank or elsewhere to their credit; or that they have money or securities for the payment of money held by some other person, in trust or otherwise, for their benefit. And if the defendants, Frank Cargill and E. L. Dennis, have made any sale or assignment of their property or effects, or any part thereof, your petitioners expressly charge that they believe that such sale, transfer, or assignment is merely colorable, and made with the view of protecting the property or effects of the defendants, so assigned, and placing the same beyond the reach of your petitioners' said judgment, and to enable the defendants to control and enjoy the same, and the avails thereof, and that it would so appear if the defendants, Frank Cargill and Edward L. Dennis, would state and set forth when and to whom such sale, transfer, or assignment was made, and what was the amount, in value, of the property and effects assigned, sold, or transferred, and what were the terms and conditions upon which such sale, transfer, or assignment was made, and what disposition had been made of the property or effects so sold, transferred, or assigned, and in whose possession the same is now, or what has been done with the avails thereof. And your petitioners claim a full discovery and complete disclosure of all such property and effects and things in action belonging to the defendants, Cargill & Dennis, and all trusts whereby any property, debts, or other effects are held for the use and benefit of the defendants, Frank Cargill and Edward L. Dennis, and of every sale, transfer, or assignment which defendants have made of their property, debts, or other effects, and of the person or persons to whom such assignment, sale, or transfer has been made, the amount and value questioned, the statutory provisions containing no words prohibiting or restrictive of the original powers of such courts. Grimes v. Hilliary, 38 Ill. App. 246.

In Kendallville Refrigerator Co. v. Davis, 40 Ill. App. 616, it was held that the legislature did not deprive equity of jurisdiction to compel discovery, where such jurisdiction would be exercised by the statute, particularly where there was another ground of jurisdiction as in the case of an account.

A strict bill of discovery to obtain evidence to be used in an action at law, may be abrogated by implication; but even that is doubtful. Kendallville Refrigerator Co. v. Davis, supra.

Iowa.

Under section 3723, McClain's Annotated Code of Iowa, ed. 1883, vol. 2, page 972, no action to obtain a discovery shall be brought, except that where any person or corporation is liable, either jointly or severally with others by the same contract, an action may be brought against any parties who are liable to obtain discovery of the names and residences of the others who are liable.

Under this section it has been held that no action can be brought for the purpose of discovery alone. Searcy v. Miller, 57 Iowa, 613.

In Greene v. Woods, 24 Iowa, 573, it was held that the law gave the defendants the right to take the testimony of the plaintiffs by interrogatories, the method of procuring the testimony of the opposite party in such a manner being additional to the other ordinary methods, and therefore an interrogatory tending to elicit evidence pertinent and material to the issue would not be stricken out. Rev. Stat. § 2385.

Maryland.

It is quite a familiar principle, that where a court of equity has original jurisdiction and its statutes confer upon the common-law courts the same power, the jurisdiction of equity is not thereby ousted. Union Pass. R. Co. of Baltimore v. Baltimore, 71 Md. 233; Harnes v. Crain, 8 Gill, 348.

In Union Pass. R. Co. of Baltimore v. Baltimore, supra, a bill was filed for an account of the company's earnings and discovery and the payment of a tax, and was demurred to upon the ground that equity had no jurisdiction to compel discovery, as under article 75, section 69, of the Code, (section 94 of the Code of 1888) the precise relief could have been obtained in an action at law. It was held that it never had been understood to be the law in that state, that a court of equity was deprived of its jurisdiction by reason of the powers conferred by act of assembly on the courts of common law.

By the section of the Maryland Code above referred to, this court has power to require the parties to answer any bill of discovery, only in case and under circumstances where they are compellable to produce original books or writings, or to answer such bill of discovery according to the rules of procedure in chancery.

By the Code of Maryland, article 16, sections 20, 21, power is conferred upon the courts of equity on the application of either party, on the trial of any action at law or suit in chancery, either for discovery or relief, to require a decree that the parties shall produce either the original books, writings, or papers, or copies certified before a justice of the peace by all such parties, of such books or papers in their possession or power as contain evidence pertinent to the issue, or relative to the matters in dispute between the parties, to be used as evidence at the trial of such cause, provided the party making the application shall satisfy the court, on oath or affirmation, that such books, writings, or papers contain material and necessary evidence, and that he cannot safely proceed to the trial of his case without the benefit of such testimony; and if the party required to produce shall fail to obey the order to that effect, the court may in its discretion take the allegations of the bill pro confesso and decree ex parte in such manner as shall appear just and reasonable.

Michigan.

Since the Michigan statutes have allowed parties to become general witnesses, there seems to be no further office for the bill of discovery. Riopelle v. Doelner, 26 Mich. 102, 155.

It is well settled that no discovery will be granted when the court of law wherein the proceedings are pending has means of compelling the defendant to make disclosure. Ibid.

So, it has been decided that since parties have become general witnesses, under the statutes, a bill of discovery will not lie where the facts sought to be discovered are within the knowledge of any witness. Id.; Shelden v. Walbridge, 44 Mich. 251; M'Creery v. Cobb, 93 Mich. 463.

In Hubbard v. McNaughton, 43 Mich. 223, 38 Am. Rep. 176, it was said that no universal rule could be laid down where most of the facts necessary are within the knowledge of the defendant. Under the old practice before parties became competent as witnesses, it was often necessary to draw out of the property, debts, or effects so assigned, sold, or transferred, and the trusts or other conditions upon which said sale or assignment or transfer was made, and all the facts and circumstances relating thereto, and particularly what is the situation of the property, debts, or other effects assigned or transferred at the time of the filing of this, your petitioners' bill of complaint. And your petitioners further represent that they have reason to believe, and so charge the fact to be, that the defendants have property, debts, and other equitable interests, things in action, or effects, of the value of more than $1,054, interest and costs, exclusive of all prior just claims thereon, and which your petitioners have been unable to reach by execution on said judgment against said defendants, Cargill & Dennis, and that this, your petitioners' bill of complaint is not exhibited by collusion with the defendants, or with any other person, or for the purpose of protecting the property or effects of defendants, Frank Cargill and Edward L. Dennis against the claim of other creditors, but for the sole and only purpose of compelling payment and satisfaction of the judgment so as aforesaid recovered by your petitioners against the defendants, Frank Cargill and Edward L. Dennis." The petition concludes with a prayer that each of the defendants be required to disclose, under oath, all their assets, of every description whatever, and that they also be required to answer certain special interrogatories, which are set out therein. The trial court sustained a demurrer to the petition, and dismissed the suit. The plaintiffs having sued out a writ of error, the court of civil appeals reversed the judgment, and remanded the cause. The case came to us upon a writ of error from this court to the court of civil appeals.

such matter by a discovery, and it is still competent, although not common to do so.

It has always been held that when a court of law can enforce the production of documents, or any other disclosure required by a party of his adversary, that was a complete answer to a bill of discovery, and this can now be done in all cases more readily and completely than was possible by bill in equity. Riopelle v. Doellner, supra.

In Turnbull v. Prentiss Lumber Co., 55 Mich. 393, the right to compel discovery in a judgment creditor's bill was said still to exist.

And in McCreery v. Cobb, supra, the court stated that it did not think that the provisions of the statute, relating to the powers of chancery to compel discovery, were repealed by the statutes making parties witnesses, and held that the right of discovery existed, and therefore sections 6814 and 6815 of Howell's Statutes, relating to judgment creditor's bills, and sections 8168 and 8169 of the same statutes, relating to proceedings against corporations giving jurisdiction in chancery to compel discovery, were not affected by the statute making parties competent witnesses.

Mississippi.

In Mississippi the jurisdiction in chancery, in aid of a proceeding at law, has by statute been conferred upon the courts of law. Kearny v. Jeffries, 43 Miss. 357.

In the above case, the court stated that under the system which enabled the plaintiff to examine the defendant as a witness at law, and to file in court the ancillary petition for discovery, the plaintiff might nevertheless have a right to resort to a court of chancery for discovery, and that the jurisdiction of that court had not been taken away by the statutory changes, but yet the court of equity will not undertake to try the case where a plaintiff had a legal title and needs discovery. Ibid.

Missouri.

In Bond v. Worley, 26 Mo. 263, it was held that no bill of discovery was allowable in that state since the statutes provided other more convenient modes by which every purpose of such bills could be attained.

Montana.

Section 688 of the Compiled Statutes of Montana, ed. 1897, page 234, provides that no action to obtain a discovery under oath, in aid of the prosecution or defense of another action or proceeding, shall be allowed, nor shall any examination of a party be had on behalf of the adverse party, except in the manner provided by this and the foregoing chapter.

New Jersey.

Courts of equity will always compel discovery in aid of prosecuting or defending suits at law, and to make such discovery of use on the trial at law will restrain the suit from proceeding until the discovery is had. Shotwell v. Smith, 20 N. J. Eq. 79.

Such jurisdiction is not taken away by the fact that courts of law have been clothed with powers to compel the discovery in such cases, by the oath of the complainant. Ibid.

The jurisdiction in equity is concurrent with that of the court of law. Hoppock v. United New Jersey R. & Canal Co. and Pennsylvania R. Co., 27 N. J. Eq. 236.

The power given to courts of law is not so complete and ample as the power of the court of equity, the plaintiff not being actually compellable to answer at law, the only consequence of his not answering being the right of the court to stop his proceeding in his suit. Shotwell v. Smith, supra.

New York.

Under section 1914 of Bliss's Annotated Code of New York, vol. 2, page 238, an action cannot be maintained to obtain a discovery under oath in aid of the prosecution or defense of another action.

Section 389 of the New York Code does not prohibit the obtaining discovery, but declares that it can be sought only in the mode specified in that chapter. In the same action in which the relief is sought must the discovery be sought also. Glenny v. Stedwell, 51 How. Pr. 329.

And section 390 makes it lawful to examine as a witness a party to an action, whether that action be equitable or at law. Ibid.

In Cutter v. Pool, 54 How. Pr. 311, it was held that section 388 of the New York Code of Procedure, relating to the inspection of documents and the discovery of evidence, was auxiliary to and not a substitution for the provisions of the revised statutes.

In McVicker v. Ketchum, 1 Abb. Pr. N. S. 453, it was held that the authority given under the code for the examination of the adverse party was intended to be in lieu of the former bill of discovery, and such right exists immediately on the commencement of the suit and not only after issue joined.

A bill of discovery can be maintained in chancery not only before issue joined, but even before the suit was commenced, and under the code such right may be had at any time before the trial,

Measner, Goldthwaite & Ewing and H. F. Ring, for plaintiffs in error:

There is no such thing as an inherent jurisdiction in any court, not derived from the law of its creation; nor does the constitution grant to the district court every remedy that may have been administered by the chancery system of England, but only jurisdiction for relief where there is a suit with a matter in controversy amounting to $500. Here there is no pretense of controversy about the judgment, no matter in controversy of any value is alleged, only a fishing for a matter of some value or other. The petition invoked no jurisdiction lodged in the court by the organic law.

Tex. Const. art. 5, § 8; Measner v. Giddings, 65 Tex. 308.

The bill is one for discovery as an independent remedy. Such a bill never lay in the state courts of Texas, except in aid of a pending suit (Cronin v. Gay, 20 Tex. 460), and is now superseded entirely (Love v. Keowne, 58 Tex. 197). A bill very similar to the one in question was expressly characterized as an anomaly, and dismissed as such without demurrer, in Cronin v. Gay, 20 Tex. 461, and 464.

See too, Carter v. Hightower, 79 Tex. 185; Noyes v. Brown, 75 Tex. 458; White Sewing Mach. Co. v. Atkeson, 75 Tex. 830; Price v. Brady, 21 Tex. 614; Taylor v. Gillean, 23 Tex. 508; Donovan v. Fine, Hopk. Ch. 59, 2 L. ed. 342, 14 Am. Rep. 531.

While a plaintiff with a suit involving matter in controversy of proper value, may have any relief given in equity consistent with our system or policy of law, yet he cannot invoke a remedy dependent solely upon the practice peculiar to chancery of bill and specific answer, and which is utterly at war with our and is not limited to cases where issue has been joined. Hadley v. Fowler, 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. 244.

The examination allowed by the New York code, and which is to be had on a summary application to the court, is a substitute for the bill of discovery under the former practice, and the settled rules in relation to those bills may with propriety be regarded as controlling with respect to the examination under the code, when they did not conflict with the letter or reason of that act. Ibid.

In Hauseman v. Sterling, 61 Barb. 347, it was said to have become the universal practice to refuse applications to compel the production of books and papers on the examination of a party before trial, that the code did not warrant it, the statute pointing out the only mode by which such a discovery can be obtained before a trial, and that if either party wished for such a discovery, he must adopt the course provided by the statute.

Unless there is some other mode of examining a party than conditionally, by commission or at the trial, the suitor has not the benefit which the former bill of discovery would have given him. Glenny v. Stedwell, supra.

In the above case the court found that section 360 of the Code gave the right to examine at any time before trial at the option of the party claiming it, and such testimony may be perpetuated.

In Knoch v. Funke, 27 Jones & S. 240, plaintiff sought an account of an alleged partner in a partnership dissolved by death, the defendant being examined as a party before the trial and denying the partnership relations; the court held that the plaintiff could not obtain a discovery and inspection.

Whenever the production of books can be compelled by subpoena duces tecum, the provision of the code allowing the examination of parties to the action has practically become a substitute for the mode prescribed by the revised statutes to an action by or against a corporation, but is not among the cases where such a subpoena would be effectual to compel the corporation to bring its books into court. Shoe & Leather Reporter Assn. v. Bailey, 17 Jones & S. 385.

Where a creditor's bill was filed to obtain discovery of certain book accounts, concealed, withheld, and transferred in fraud of creditors, it was stated that the ancient equitable jurisdiction of the courts in regard to creditor's bills had been preserved, and that the complaint showing a sufficient cause of action for equitable relief was not open to demurrer under the present mode of procedure. Hart v. Albright, 28 Abb. N. C. 74.

supra, the defendant moved for discovery and inspection of writings in an action for an alleged conversion of the contents of a certain printing office. It was held that the rule in chancery upon the late bill of discovery was not abrogated or changed by the code of civil procedure, and that the plaintiff might make a discovery of matters necessary to maintain his own title, but was not entitled to discovery of the title of his adversary from whom he sought the discovery and whose title he denied; that it was only when the plaintiff was entitled to a discovery of deeds or documents for the purpose of establishing his own case, that his right to such discovery was held not to be affected by the circumstances, that the same deed or documents were also evidence of the defendant's action.

North Carolina.

By section 579 of the Code of Civil Procedure of North Carolina, chapter 5, vol. 1, page 223, ed. 1883, it is provided that no action to obtain discovery under oath in aid of the prosecution or defense of another action shall be allowed, nor shall any examination of a party be had on behalf of the adverse party, except in the manner prescribed by that chapter.

Ohio.

Section 5208 of the Revised Statutes of Ohio, ed. 1891, vol. 2, now regulates the practice in actions for discovery in that state.

Although the doctrine and rules concerning the subject-matter of discovery, established by courts of equity, are believed to be still in force and to control the same matters in the new procedure, yet the bill of discovery, as a separate action, is practically obsolete in the state of Ohio. Chapman v. Lee, 45 Ohio St. 366.

Pennsylvania.

In Milne's App. (Pa.) Jan. 25, 1888, it was held that a bill in equity would lie in some cases for the discovery of facts material to a just determination of an issue pending in an action at law, but that the reason for sustaining such bill was much less now than before the parties could be compelled to testify.

In that case an action had been brought upon a bill and discovery was refused both in the action and by a subsequent bill in equity, the reason of refusal being that the defendants were special partners and had not the custody of the books for which discovery was sought. Milne's App. supra.

In Phillips v. Kern, 6 Phila. 2, it was sought to compel the defendants to disclose certain facts by bill of discovery, and the court held that where one might be called as a witness, he could not be very system of practice, in which a plain, concise positive statement of facts is required on the one side, and a general denial merely is permissible on the other. Such a remedy comes within the exception of grant of equity jurisdiction, because inconsistent with the policy of our system as existing under organic law from the earliest days.

Newson v. Chrisman, 9 Tex. 117.

The statutes of attachment, garnishment (a mode of discovery) and execution purport to furnish a complete system for the forced collection of debts, and thereby repeal all laws on that subject.

Rogers v. Watrous, 8 Tex. 63, 58 Am. Dec. 100.

Where positive law, enlarging the unwritten law on the subject, prescribes the remedy to be pursued for a given purpose, as the collection of debts, courts will not add another remedy by supplemental proceedings, except where the positive law so provides, as it does in Illinois (Underwood's Stat. 75), New York from a very early day (N. Y. Code, § 292), California (Cal. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 714, 715), Ohio (Ohio Code Civ. Proc. §§ 459, 460), Iowa (Iowa Code, §§ 8185-8188), South Carolina (S. C. Code Civ. Proc. § 818), Nevada (Nev. Comp. Laws, § 1801), Wisconsin (Wis. Stat. § 100), Indiana (Ind. Code, §§ 518, 519), North Carolina (N. C. Code Civ. Proc. 284), and in Arkansas, Kentucky, Missouri, Maine, Oregon, New Jersey, and other states.

Messrs. Stewart & Stewart, for defendants in error:

The district court shall have original jurisdiction in civil cases of all suits, complaints, or pleas whatever, without regard to any distinction between law and equity, when the matter in controversy shall be valued at or made a party to a bill of discovery, because his testimony could be procured in another way, and it would be a mere disclosure by a third party and inadmissible in evidence if taken.

South Carolina.

Under section 890, chapter 6, of the Code of Civil Procedure of South Carolina, no action to obtain discovery, under oath in aid of the prosecution or defense of another action, shall be allowed, nor shall any examination of a party be had on behalf of the adverse party, except in the manner prescribed by this chapter.

The exclusion of the courts of equity from jurisdictions, in cases in which an adequate remedy is conferred at law, rests upon the statutes. Eno v. Calder, 14 Rich. Eq. 154.

A new remedy at law operates to destroy the existing remedy in equity allowed for the want of such legal remedy. Hall v. Joiner, 1 S. C. N. S. 186, 190.

A simple contract creditor has no standing in equity inter vivos to set aside a fraudulent conveyance, but must exhaust his remedy at law and have judgment in aid of his execution, and have a discovery of assets after satisfaction at law has failed by bill in equity. Eno v. Calder, supra.

Texas.

Under article 2216, title 33, of Sayles' Texas Civil Statutes, vol. 1, ed. 1889, page 665, it is provided either party to a suit may examine the opposing party as a witness, and should have the same process to compel his attendance as in the case of any other witness. His examination should be conducted and his testimony should be received under the same rules applicable to other witnesses.

And under article 2239 of chapter 3, either party to a suit may examine the opposing party as a witness upon interrogatories filed in the cause, and shall have the same process to obtain his testimony as in the case of any other witness, and his examination shall be conducted and his testimony received in the same manner and according to the same rules which apply in the case of any other witness, subject to the provisions of the succeeding articles of the chapter.

In Chonin v. Gay, 20 Tex. 460, it was decided that the statute gave the right as auxiliary to the regular suit, but not as an independent remedy disconnected from the suit.

In the above case a discovery was sought in aid of a separate action already commenced and pending for trial of the right to property in slaves. Cronin v. Gay, supra.

In Love v. Keowne, 58 Tex. 191, it was held that 24 L. R. A.

although a bill of discovery, technically so called and known in equity practice, was not known in the practice of that state, yet the statute was intended to answer the same purpose, the statute authorizing a party to make his opponent a witness or to propound interrogatories to him which, if not answered, should be taken as confessed.

West Virginia.

Sections 22 and 23 of chapter 130 of the Code of West Virginia authorize the examination of the parties to the suit in the same manner as any other witness, and it has been held that such powers are neither restrictive nor prohibitory of the right of the party to discovery in equity. Russell v. Dickeschied, 24 W. Va. 61.

A jurisdiction in equity is not taken away by the courts of law entertaining jurisdiction in such cases where they formerly rejected it, for being once vested legitimately in the court it must remain there until the legislature shall abolish or limit it. Ibid.

Nor is the jurisdiction to be taken away by express enactment conferring on courts of law the same jurisdiction, for unless there are prohibitory or restrictive words used, the uniform interpretation is that they confer concurrent and not exclusive remedial authority. Ibid.

Wisconsin.

Both the form and substance of the bill in equity for discovery were abolished by section 4096 of the Wisconsin Revised Statutes.

By section 4096 of Sanborn & Berryman's Annotated Statutes of Wisconsin, vol. 2, page 2123, no action to obtain a discovery under oath in aid of the prosecution or defense of another action shall be allowed, but the examination of a party, or in case a corporation be a party, the examination of the president, secretary, or other principal officer or general managing agent of such corporation, otherwise than as a witness on a trial, may be taken by deposition at the instance of the adverse party, in any action or proceeding, at any time after the commencement thereof and before judgment.

In Noonan v. Orton, 28 Wis. 386, discovery in equity was held to be abolished and discovery could be had under chapter 137 of the Revised Statutes, sections 54 and 55, in a court of justice the same as it was when delivered in an action and therefore brought in equity under the former practice instead of driving a party to his action in equity.

The bill of discovery was abolished and provision made for compelling an adverse party to testify at or before the trial by sections 54 and 55 of chapter amount to $500, exclusive of interest and to hear and determine any cause which is, or may be cognizable by courts either of law or equity, and to grant any relief which could be granted by said courts or either of them.

Tex. Const. art. 5, § 8; Tex. Rev. Stat. arts. 1117, 1122; Smith v. Smith, 11 Tex. 105.

Whatever ordinary or extraordinary writ can be issued by a common-law judge or chancellor in those states where the jurisdiction of these offices is separate and distinct, can in this state be issued by a district judge.

Jones v. McMahan, 30 Tex. 728; Johnston v. Powell, 34 Tex. 529; Shulls v. Hoffman, 18 Tex. 678.

Whatever suits may be instituted in equity courts, may be instituted in ours. The rule that courts of equity will interfere only where the party is remediless at law, has but little application under a system in which the litigants in a suit can demand, and obtain all the relief, which can be granted by either courts of law or equity.

Smith v. Olopton, 4 Tex. 118; Farrar v. Reeman, 63 Tex. 180; Grabenheimer v. Blum, Id. 378; Voigtlander v. Brotze, 59 Tex. 288; Douglas v. Neil, 87 Tex. 547.

The giving of a remedy by statute in a court of law has never been deemed to take away, or in any degree to abridge the original and inherent powers and jurisdiction of the court of chancery. Our courts, possessing the powers of courts of chancery, may proceed to administer relief upon the principles of equity as fully and completely as a court of chancery in England could do, without the aid of the statute. The foundation of the jurisdiction of equity is not in the statute, but in the judicial incompetency of the courts of common law to furnish a plain, complete, and adequate remedy.

Grassmeyer v. Beeson, 18 Tex. 766, 70 Am.

187 of the Revised Statutes of Wisconsin of 1858. Kelly v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 60 Wis. 480.

The statutes give him the same relief in a proceeding in the action wherein it is required, and at that stage in the progress of the action where such discovery is needed. Noonan v. Orton, supra.

It is clearly a provisional remedy and under subdivision 3, section 10, chapter 284, of the Laws of 1880, an appeal will lie from an order giving provisional remedies. Ibid.

The statute being remedial must be liberally construed. Cleveland v. Burnham, 60 Wis. 16.

In Cleveland v. Burnham, supra, it was held that the procedure provided by the above section of the act was undoubtedly intended as a substitute for a bill of discovery under the old practice.

The object of the statute is to elicit the full and complete disclosure of whatever may be relevant to the controversy to be ascertained, in case the pleadings are in by the issues thereby made; and in case the issues have not been joined, then by such order limiting the subjects to which such examination may extend. Kelly v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. supra.

In the same case it was held that to hold that such examination should be limited to cases where discovery might be had in equity under the old practice, would be a perversion of the statute as it now exists, in other words an interpolation of an exception not warranted by the letter or spirit of the statute. Ibid.

The examination of the party under the above section, when had after issue joined in the action, is as full and ample as the examination of any other witness in the case, and he may be examined, not merely as to such matters as would enable the plaintiff to make out his cause of action, but as to matters relating to the defense. Whereatt v. Ellis, 45 Wis. 639.

Practice in the United States Supreme Court, and the circuit courts.

In Ex parte Boyd, 105 U. S. 657, 26 L. ed. 124, the Supreme Court intimated that at the present time bills of discovery were not only useless but obsolete. See also United States v. McLaughlin, 24 Fed. Rep. 823; Preston v. Smith; Rindskopf v. Platto; Guyot v. Hilton; Manchester Fire Assur. Co. v. Stockton Combined Harvester & Agr. Works,—all infra.

In Heath v. Erie R. Co., 9 Blatchf. 317, it is stated that the theory and basis of a bill of discovery in equity in aid of a defense in another suit, was, that the court in which such other suit was pending had no means of compelling a discovery from the plaintiff therein of facts material to the defense.

A complainant's bill seeking discovery for the want of all other testimony, should not be retained after the answer has denied the matter sought. Brown v. Swann, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 497, 9 L. ed. 508.

By the 15th section of the Judiciary Act in the trial of actions at law, on motion of either party, and due notice thereof being given, the circuit court has power to require the opposite party to produce any books or writings in his possession or power, which contain evidence pertinent to the issue in cases and under circumstances where the party might be compelled to produce the same by the ordinary rules of proceeding in chancery. Merohant's Nat. Bank v. State Nat. Bank, 3 Cliff. 201.

In the above case it was stated that production before the trial was not perhaps contemplated by the words of the provision, nor was it in general necessary, but that where the motion was accompanied by satisfactory proof that the case was one in all respects within the conditions of the provision, and it was shown that there was just ground to apprehend the destruction or transfer of the documents or their removal out of the jurisdiction before the trial, that the order might be made without delay and be absolute. Ibid.

Although at one time courts of equity entertained bills of discovery in aid of executions at law, the latter courts not having adequate powers to render the assistance necessary, yet the moment such powers were sufficiently enlarged and enabled the courts of law to accomplish the same results, the jurisdiction in equity, if it did not cease as unwarranted, at least became inoperative and obsolete. Ex parte Boyd, 105 U. S. 647, 26 L. ed. 1200.

A bill in equity to compel disclosures from a plaintiff or a defendant of matters of fact particularly within his knowledge and essential to the maintenance of the legal rights of either in a pending suit at law, would now scarcely be resorted to unless under special circumstances, the parties being now competent witnesses and compellable to answer under oath all relevant interrogatories properly exhibited, and to produce documents important as instruments of evidence, and the courts at law in which such suits are pending are now authorized by summary proceedings to enforce the same rights. Ibid.

In Ex parte Boyd, supra, it was stated that at common law a judgment creditor was entitled, under the New York statutes, to an examination of the judgment debtor as therein provided as a supplementary measure and in aid of his execution.

But in Colgate v. Compagnie Francaise du Tele-

Dec. 309; Duncan v. Magette, 25 Tex. 251; Castro v. Gentiley, 11 Tex. 28.

The procedure in courts of equity in actions of this nature is usually by order made upon proof of return of an execution unsatisfied, requiring the debtor to appear in person in court, to be examined concerning his property. A receiver is then appointed to collect the assets, and upon qualifying, he becomes vested with the assets without conveyance or assignment by the debtor, (Wait, Fraud. Conv. § 60; High, Receivers, 2d ed. 401 et seq.) and the receivership may extend to property of any nature, real or personal, in which the debtor has such an interest as may avail his creditor.

High, Receivers, 2d ed. § 482.

Chancellor Green, in Robert v. Hodges, 16 N. J. Eq. 302, says: "It is a familiar and unquestionable doctrine of equity, that the court has power to aid a judgment creditor to reach the property of his debtor, either by removing fraudulent judgments or conveyances which obstruct or defeat the plaintiff's remedy under the judgment, or by appropriating in satisfaction of the judgment, rights or equitable interests of the defendant, which are not the subject of legal execution."

See also Fowler's App. 87 Pa. 454; Wait, Fraud. Conv. p. 92; Wright v. Oroville Gold, Silver & Copper Min. Co. 40 Cal. 20; Buck v. Voris, 89 Ind. 117; Livermore v. McNair, 34 N. J. Eq. 482.

On petition for rehearing.

To reach the equitable interest of a debtor in real estate by suit in chancery the creditor should first obtain a judgment at law; and to reach personal property both a judgment and execution should be shown. One exception to this rule is where the debtor is deceased; another exception is where the claim is to be satisfied out of a fund accessible only by aid of a court of chancery.

Russell v. Clark, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 69, 3 L. ed. 271; Brinkerhoff v. Brown, 4 Johns. Ch. 671, 1 L. ed. 975; O'Brien v. Cullter, 2 Blackf. 421; Clout v. Hamilton, 3 Yerg. 81; Rhodes v. Cousins, 6 Rand. (Va.) 188, 18 Am. Dec. 715.

Where a bill seeks a discovery of fraud, or of fraudulent acts of the defendants, if they do not subject him to criminal proceedings, he is bound to make the discovery.

Janson v. Solarte, 2 Younge & C. Exch. 132; Hare, Discovery, 140, 142; Green v. Weaver, 1 Sim. 404; Story, Eq. Pl. § 589, and note 3; Robinson v. Kitchin, 35 Eng. L. & Eq. 558.

It is unquestionable that chancery will decree a discovery to detect frauds and imposition.

Bennett v. Muggrove, 2 Ves. Sr. 51; Bicknell v. Gough, 3 Atk. 558; Kimberly v. Sells, 3 Johns. Ch. 467, 1 L. ed. 636; Deloraine v. Broune, 3 Bro. Ch. 633; Mitchell v. Harris, 2 Ves. Jr. 129; Lonsdale v. Littledale, Id. 451; King v. Martin, 2 Ves. Jr. 641.

graphe de Paris a New York, 23 Fed. Rep. 82, it was held that a party could not obtain the testimony of the defendant before the trial in an action pending in the circuit court, although he could do so in the state courts of that state (New York), because section 861 of the Revised Statutes required such testimony, unless taken de bene esse or by a commission, to be taken in the presence of the court and jury at the trial, and therefore a bill in equity seeking a discovery was a proper process.

In United States v. McLaughlin, 24 Fed. Rep. 825, it is said to be very doubtful whether a pure bill of discovery in an equity suit would lie at the present day, that it might be that a discovery might be asked for relief, but that it was probable that no prudent counsel would file a pure bill of discovery, or call for a discovery in a bill for relief, and thus unnecessarily give the defendant an advantage which he would not otherwise have under the present practice, which enabled the complainant to place the defendant upon the stand and examine him as a witness.

In Preston v. Smith, 26 Fed. Rep. 384, the court stated that a bill could not be sustained solely for the sake of discovery, such bills being rarely of late resorted to, having fallen into a condition of "innocuous desuetude."

In Rindskopf v. Platto, 29 Fed. Rep. 120, where discovery was sought in aid of a suit at law, brought for the recovery of certain moneys alleged to have been collected by the defendant as an attorney, the court refused the bill, stating that before the passage of the statute of the United States, permitting parties to be sworn and examined as witnesses in suits at law, there could have been no doubt but that such a bill would lie, but that since the passage of that act July the 2d, 1864, section 858 of the Revised Statutes of United States, providing that no witness shall be excluded in any civil action on account of his being a party to or interested in the issue, a party to a suit might be a witness, and be called by the adverse party and compelled to disclose all facts within his knowledge touching the controversy.

The procedure authorized by section 724 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the discovery of documents, has been held not to apply to suits in equity. Bischoffsheim v. Brown, 29 Fed. Rep. 341.

And in Guyot v. Hilton, 32 Fed. Rep. 742, where an application was sought under the above section, to require the plaintiff to produce as official liquidator for inspection the books of the company, the application was refused and the plaintiff left to seek the relief by way of a bill of discovery.

In Paine v. Warren, 33 Fed. Rep. 357, it was held that the above section of the statutes did not apply to production for the purpose of aiding the plaintiff in the framing of his complaint.

In the above case the plaintiff filed a bill in equity in aid of his suit at law, and it was held that if the original suit was at law the protection was authorized, such suit being auxiliary to the action at law, the plaintiff having the choice at his election of either of the two courses, namely, to dismiss his bill and treat his original action as one at law and apply to compel an inspection and production of the documents, or to treat the suit as in equity, frame his bill for discovery, and move for an inspection according to the equity practice. Paine v. Warren, supra.

In Manchester F. Assur. Co. v. Stockton Combined Harvester & Agr. Works, 38 Fed. Rep. 573, it was stated that there could be no need of a discovery, as the testimony could be much more effectively obtained by examining all the parties having knowledge as witnesses under the provisions of the revised statutes.

In Smythe v. Henry, 41 Fed. Rep. 715, it is stated that the mere fact that statutes have conferred upon courts of law the power to compel parties to the record to testify as witnesses did not deprive a party in courts of the United States of the right of discovery in equity when seeking equitable re-

In Babbott v. Tewksbury, 46 Fed. In an action brought upon an alleged oral agreement, to pay a commission on the capital stock of any companies formed, or caused to be formed for the use of certain patents, the court refused equitable relief by way of discovery, since the complainant had a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law, and therefore under section 723 of the United States Revised Statutes, a suit in equity could not be sustained, and under section 724 he could require the production of the books and writings in the defendant's possession, containing evidence pertinent to the issue. Babbott v. Tewksbury, supra.

In Heath v. Erie R. Co., 9 Blatchf. 519, it was stated that since the passage of the above act bill for discovery of facts resting in the knowledge of the opposite party was unnecessary, as such discovery could be obtained by an examination of the party.

In the case of Mitchell v. Burch, 2 Paige, 606, 2 L. ed. 1049, 22 Am. Dec. 669, it is stated that independent of the statute the court had jurisdiction to compel a debtor, whose body is exempt from execution at law, to discover his property, so that it may be applied in satisfaction of his just debts.

Edgell v. Haywood, 3 Atk. 352; 36 Hen. VI. 96; Cary, 16.

Gaines, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We are of the opinion that the district court was correct, and that the court of civil appeals erred in its ruling. Broad expressions of eminent text-writers would seem to sanction this proceeding. We think, however, the propositions announced by them are not supported by the cases cited, except in a restricted sense.

Mr. Freeman, in enumerating "the objects which may be accomplished by proceedings in equity to obtain satisfaction of a judgment at law," says: "(1) A full and complete discovery may be obtained of all the defendants' assets, and, when discovered, they may be compelled to contribute to the payment of the plaintiff's judgment." 2 Freem. Executions, § 424. A review of the cases cited by the learned author will show that none of them can be held a precedent for a general bill of discovery, like that under consideration. The first is Cresswell v. Smith, 8 Lea, 688. Its nature is shown by the following quotation from the opinion: "The bill must therefore be regarded as filed against the defendant Smith alone, and the any novelty into the law concerning discovery, and that the parties were only entitled to discovery in accordance with the terms of the order in cases where, according to the law and practice in courts of law or equity, there would have been a right to discovery, previously to the judicature acts as it was not intended to enlarge or alter the scope of the right to discovery by Order 81 of the Judicature Rules.

In Anderson v. Bank of British Columbia, L. R. 2 Ch. Div. 644, 45 L. J. Ch. 449, 35 L. T. N. S. 76, 24 Week. Rep. 624, decided under Rule 2 of Order 81 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, it was held that although the discovery under such rule differed very little from the similar provision in the common-law procedure act, yet having regard to the general rule that the principles of equity were to prevail, there could be no doubt that the rules previously existing respecting discovery in the court of chancery were binding then upon all the courts.

Such order only applies in cases where discovery was obtainable before the act. Hunnings v. Williamson, supra.

In Atty-Gen. v. Gaskill, L. R. 20 Ch. Div. 519, 51 L. J. Ch. 870, 46 L. T. N. S. 180, 30 Week. Rep. 553, it was held that the right to discovery as it existed under the chancery practice was still in force, except not so far as to have been modified by the judicature act and general orders, and the plaintiff was now entitled, as he always was, not only to discovery of facts not in the knowledge of the plaintiff, or of facts which the defendant knows personally and which the plaintiff does not know, but he is also entitled to admissions if he can get them, so as to render it unnecessary to adduce evidence.

question is, Can it, in this view, be maintained? The question is a new one in this state, so far as I know, and merits, as I think, a very careful consideration. It will be observed that it is not a bill for the purpose, merely, of compelling the defendant to discover generally whether he owns property, money, or effects for the payment of the debts, in the nature of a 'fishing bill.' It is true there is a prayer that the defendant be required to discover whether he owns any property or stock or choses in action, of any character; but the stating part of the bill points out specifically the property about which the discovery is specially sought, and states circumstantially the information upon which it is charged that the defendant owns the property. If the right to discovery and relief in this particular property can be maintained, then that the prayer of the bill is too broad would not be material. We think the prayer is too broad, but that part should be rejected." The opinion then proceeds to hold that the jurisdiction of the court to entertain the bill should be upheld as to the property specially pointed out by virtue of the authority conferred by a statute of the state. Carter v. Hampton, 77 Va. 381, was a bill brought by the creditor of a decedent against the administrators and heirs, to compel a discovery of assets belonging to the estate. Thomas v. Adams, 80 Ill. 37, and Clarks v. Webb, 2 Hen. & M. 8, are cases of the same character. It is well established that such a bill may be maintained, as we shall hereafter show. Gordon v. Lowell, 21 Me. 251, was a suit to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of certain property, specifically described, and to subject it to the payment of the complainant's debt. Lore v. Getzinger, 7 N. J. Eq. 191, was a bill filed under the provisions of the New York statute. Miers v. Zanesville & M. Turnp. Co., 11 Ohio, 278, was a proceeding against a corporation for the discovery of assets, and specifically pointed out the assets in reference to which the discovery was sought. Among other things, it sought to subject unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock to complainant's debt, which is a well-recognized ground for equitable interference. Cadwalader v. Granville Alexandrian Soc., 11 Ohio, 298, was a suit to subject the defendant's interest in a specific tract of land upon the ground that the interest was equitable, and not subject to sale under execution. Goss v. Lester, 1 Wis. 48, was an action to set aside fraudulent conveyances. Hacker v. Robeson, 8 R. I. 141, was a bill filed by certain creditors against the assignees of their debtor to recover a surplus of assets in their hands, and for an account. It gives no countenance to the proceeding in the present case. Hendricks v. Robinson, 2 Johns. Ch. 288, 1 L. ed. 380, was a suit to set aside certain fraudulent conveyances, specifically described. We fail to see that Kimberly v. Sells, 8 Johns. Ch. 467, 1 L. ed. 686, also cited by Mr. Freeman, has any application whatever to the doctrine announced by him: In Boden v. Dellow, 1 Atk. 289, the bill was filed by the assignees of a bankrupt suspected of having concealed his assets, against himself and certain relatives, to compel a discovery. The cases involved both fraud and trust, and the proceeding was probably specially authorized by statute. The report of the case is very meager. The case of Le Roy v. Rogers, 3 Paige, 284, 3 L. ed. 132, would be authority in support of the petition in the present case, were it not for the fact that at that time the statutes of New York expressly authorized the proceeding. A careful reading of the opinion will show that it involved the construction of a statute.

Mr. Pomeroy says: "Creditors' suits were therefore permitted to be brought in those instances where the relief by execution at common law was ineffectual, as for the discovery of assets," etc. 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1415. In support of this proposition, some of the authorities already reviewed are cited. The additional authorities we will now proceed to consider. Hadden v. Spader, 20 Johns. 554 (same case, under name of Spader v. Davis, 5 Johns. Ch. 280, 1 L. ed. 1083), was a suit by judgment creditors against their debtors and their assignees of a stock of goods alleged to have been fraudulently transferred to him by such debtors, to subject the goods, or their proceeds, to the payment of the judgment. A discovery was prayed, and, answers having been filed, the case was discussed and determined upon the question of the right to subject the proceeds of the property to the payment of the debt. Bay State Iron Co. v. Goodall, 39 N. H. 228, 75 Am. Dec. 219, was a case like the present. But it is apparent from the opinion that there was a statute of the state of New Hampshire which authorized the proceeding, although the court says the remedy existed in equity without the statute. The main authority cited to support the last proposition is Le Roy v. Rogers, supra, which, we have seen, was a proceeding under the revised statutes of the state of New York. In Trego v. Skinner, 42 Md. 427, the complainant, a judgment creditor, sought to subject real estate alleged to have been paid for by his debtor, and to have been conveyed to his wife, to the satisfaction of his judgment. A discovery was also prayed as to other assets fraudulently concealed by the debtor, and by a firm of which he was a member. The court held that a demurrer to the bill was properly overruled. The bill was certainly good in part, and the decision of the court was correct. The expressions in the opinion show that the court were also of the opinion that the bill was good as to the discovery, but for this they cite no authority.

In Bispham on Equity, p. 572, in speaking of creditors' bills, it is said: "They may also be made use of for the purpose of obtaining discovery of the debtor's property." The only case cited in support of the text is Newman v. Willetts, 52 Ill. 98, which was merely a proceeding to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of certain real estate belonging to the debtor, and to subject it to the payment of the complainant's debts.

In the latest edition of Story's Commentaries on Equity Jurisprudence it is to be noted that the editor, in a note, says "that a creditor who has exhausted his remedy at law may maintain a bill for discovery of assets and relief." 3 Story, Eq. Jur. 18th ed. § 1498, citing Treadwell v. Brown, 44 N. H. 551. We have already seen that the remedy was authorized by the statutes of New Hampshire. The text of the work, so far as we have been able to see, does not lay down that doctrine; and it is a little remarkable that, if the court of chancery had authority to entertain a bill by a judgment creditor merely to discover the assets of his debtor, so important a doctrine should have escaped the scrutiny of that able and learned commentator.

Turning to the English authorities, we find in Spence's Equitable Jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery a section upon the subject of "Suits in Chancery by Creditors," in which the author says: "The jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical court being, as before mentioned, defective, in the case of creditors, rendered it necessary to resort to the court of chancery, which court required, not only the executor or administrator to swear to his account, but, supplying the defects of the ecclesiastical law, allowed the creditor to contest it. The court also decreed payment of the debt, where there were assets, and which the court of chancery, by its process for obtaining discovery, was enabled effectually to ascertain. Suits of this description, and proceedings upon them, are found in the calendars from the reign of Edward VI. downward. The court was necessarily resorted to in order to recover merely equitable demands, as where a creditor sought to enforce an equitable security not giving any legal title, and on which, therefore, there was no remedy at law, or when the debtor had conveyed or devised his property in special trust for the payment of his debts." 2 Spence, Eq. Jur. 580. In Adams' Equity, also, the doctrine of the right of the creditor of an estate to file a bill in the court of chancery to compel the executor or administrator to disclose the assets is distinctly recognized. Adams, Eq. 257. But neither of these authors anywhere recognize the right of a judgment creditor to compel his debtor, by a bill of discovery, to make a disclosure of the property owned by him. We have been cited to no English case in which the court of chancery ever exercised such a jurisdiction, and we have found none; and it may be doubted if there be any well-considered case in the American courts in which a discovery of that character has been compelled, in the absence of a statute conferring the authority.

Every original bill in equity, according to the practice of the court of chancery, is a bill of discovery. Story, Eq. Pl. § 811. They are usually bills of discovery and relief; that is to say, they pray the court to grant some relief, and as an aid thereto they seek to purge the conscience of the defendant, in order to establish some fact necessary to be proved as a basis for the decree. But a bill for discovery, merely, does not pray a decree. It is brought in aid of a pending action at law, or of a suit at law to be brought, in order to procure evidence. Judge Story says: "The bill should set forth the particular matters to which the discovery is sought, for the other party is not bound to make answer to vague and loose surmises. On this account, when a bill of discovery was brought by an executrix, stating generally that a demand had been made upon her, as executrix, by the defendant, which she had refused to pay, and he had sued her therefor, and that the executrix knew nothing of the demand, of her own knowledge, but believed it to be unjust, because the defendant took no measures to liquidate it in the testator's lifetime, and did not produce any vouchers, and that she could not, without a discovery of all the facts, safely proceed to a trial at law in the suit, and prayed a discovery, it was held that the bill was bad, and a mere fishing bill, amounting only to a statement that the executrix was sued at law, and did not show for what, and therefore asked a discovery beforehand, although she had reason to conclude that the suit was upon some groundless pretense." Story, Eq. Pl. § 825.

The petition in the present case, although it has the semblance of great particularity, is, in effect, as general as it is possible to make it. It seems to us to amount to no more than an allegation that the defendants have concealed or covered up, somewhere, some assets, legal or equitable, subject to be applied to the satisfaction of plaintiffs' judgment, which they have been unable to discover. The authorities we have considered indicate to our minds that such a proceeding was not allowable under the English equity practice. It is provided for by statute in many of our states, and many cases may be found where the jurisdiction was exercised by virtue of such statutes. Bills against executors for a discovery of assets, and against assignees for account and discovery, were frequently entertained in the court of chancery. These all involved a trust. In cases of fraudulent conveyances, equity will extend its aid to the creditor, by entertaining a bill against the proper parties, which points out the property, and specifies the particulars in which the fraud consists, and will, as in all other cases, grant a discovery, as ancillary to the action. In this case there is no trust. There is the simple relation of debtor and creditor. The bill alleges a surmise of fraud, but specifies none. Oronin v. Gay, 20 Tex. 460, was a case somewhat like this. The court, in its opinion, characterized the proceeding as anomalous, and held that the suit could have been properly dismissed without motion or demurrer. The court also says: "Our statute has prescribed a mode of discovery as auxiliary to a suit, but not as an independent remedy, disconnected from a regular suit." This remark was pertinent to the question before the court, if not indispensable to its decision. In Love v. Keovne, 58 Tex. 191, Mr. Justice Bonner says: "Although a bill of discovery, technically so called, and known in equity practice, is not known to our practice, yet we have a statute which is intended to answer the same purpose. . . . In Oronin v. Gay, 20 Tex. 460, it is decided that the statute prescribes this mode of discovery as auxiliary to a regular suit, but not as an independent remedy disconnected from such suit." Our statutes have largely extended the legal remedies of judgment creditors, as recognized at common law. Under execution they may levy upon and sell the interest of the defendant, whether legal or equitable, in both his real and personal property. They may subject, by process of garnishment, his choses in action, and his shares in incorporated companies, to the satisfaction of their judgment. But we have held that equity will not aid in the writ of garnishment. Noyes v. Brown, 75 Tex 458. In Price v. Brady, 21 Tex. 614, it was decided that promissory notes could only be subjected to the payment of a judgment by a writ of garnishment served upon the makers; that they could not be sold under execution; and that, therefore, an agent holding them for collection could not be made liable by the writ of garnishment. And it seems to us the general trend of our decisions is to confine creditors to their statutory remedies, and not to aid them in a court of equity, except in cases of trusts and frauds. Our courts will, at the instance of a creditor, set aside a fraudulent conveyance of a debtor, so as to subject the property to sale under execution, and to enable the creditor to realize at such sale a fair price. But this court has never countenanced a proceeding to make the debtor apply his assets to the payment of a judgment against him, or to compel him to disclose his assets so that an execution may be levied, or a writ of garnishment served, to reach them; and we are of opinion that, in the absence of a statute conferring authority for the proceeding, it should be held that none exists. Many of the states have statutes authorizing bills of discovery in cases like the present. It is in the power of our legislature to make such a law, and it must be left to its wisdom to determine whether or not it is proper to confer this inquisitorial power upon the courts of the state.

For the reasons given the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals is reversed, and that of the District Court is affirmed.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently filed in response to which on February 5, 1894, Gaines, J., on behalf of the court delivered the following opinion:

Counsel for defendants in error, in support of their motion for a rehearing in this case, have filed an able and learned argument, supported by an ampler citation of authority than was contained in their original brief. At the time the former opinion was delivered, the text-books exclusively devoted to the law of "Discovery" were not at our command. This probably arose from the fact that it was thought that the rules in regard to discovery had been substituted by statutory enactment, and that the learning upon the subject had become, in a measure, obsolete. Since the filing of this motion, we have procured the authorities necessary to enable us to make an exhaustive examination of the question, with the result that we deem it proper to modify some of the expressions in the former opinion, without changing our disposition of the case.

In Hare on Discovery (chap. 5, § 1, p. 80), it is laid down that a discovery is given only in aid of some trial. But in a succeeding 24 L. R. A.

section (sec. 8, p. 84) that author says: "There are some early cases which appear opposed to the rule which has been stated in the preceding sections,—that a discovery will only be given to be used as evidence at a trial." The text is mainly predicated upon a case in Cary's Reports (page 21), the name of which is not given; upon The Protector v. Lumley, Hardr. 22; and upon Mountford v. Taylor, 6 Ves. Jr. 788. The Protector v. Lumley, and the case in Cary were bills for the discovery of the goods of an attainted felon, which had been forfeited to the crown in the one case, and for the goods of an outlaw, which had been forfeited to the commonwealth, in the other. The origin and nature of that jurisdiction is explained by Reeves, in his History of the English Law, as follows: "A grant was made, by letters patent, of goods forfeited by a person attainted. The grantee brought his bill in chancery against the person who had possession of them, for this reason: That as the king could not have an action at law for the goods of an outlaw, or one attainted, before they had been seized for the king's use, or found by a matter of record, much less could the grantee, without having had the possession. Accordingly, it was held the subpoena was his only remedy; and the defendant was ordered to exhibit an inventory of the things the next day, on pain of being committed to the Fleet." 2 Reeves, Hist. Eng. Law, 602. In Mountford v. Taylor, Lord Eldon granted a discovery in aid of an elegit; but, from the report of the case, we have but little doubt in our minds. In 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 182, the case of Taylor v. Hill is thus reported: "The plaintiff, having recovered judgment against J. S. (but no writ of execution sued out), supposing some particular effects of J. S. to be in defendant's hands, brought a bill to discover them, in order to subject them to his judgment. The defendant demurs because there is no equity to compel such a discovery, and no such bill would lie against the debtor himself,—much less against a third person. My lord keeper seemed to agree it would not lie against the debtor himself, nor to have a general discovery from a third person, but only for particular things, as this bill was, and overruled the demurrer." This would seem to indicate that the court was of opinion that no bill of the character would lie, except to discover property specifically described, though it admits of the construction that the demurrer may have been urged upon the ground that no execution had been sued out. We note, in this connection, that the bill was very similar to the petition in Cronin v. Gay, 20 Tex. 460, in which it was held, expressly, that bills of discovery had been abolished in this state.

These authorities seem to us to leave the matter in doubt; and there, as an original question of equity jurisdiction, we are content to leave it. We have commented upon the cases merely for the purpose of modifying our former opinion in so far as the intimation may be drawn from it that no case can be found in the English courts which gives color of authority to the proceeding instituted in this case. If the courts of equity in England ever entertained bills of discovery of this character, and if the jurisdiction became incorporated into our system of jurisprudence by the adoption of the common law, we are still of opinion that it is no longer the law of this state. Neither the decisions of the English courts upon the effect of their statutes, which allow a discovery in the courts where the suits are pending, nor the decisions of the courts of other states upon similar statutes, can be taken as a guide, in determining the effect of our own laws upon the subject. There is an apparent conflict of authority in our state courts. Some hold merely that statutes which permit the parties to testify, or which allow interrogatories to be filed to the opposite party, do not take away the jurisdiction of courts of equity to compel a discovery. Shotwell v. Smith, 20 N. J. Eq. 79; Elliston v. Hughes, 1 Head, 225; Russell v. Dickeschied, 24 W. Va. 61; Cannon v. McNab, 48 Ala. 99; Milleaps v. Pfeiffer, 44 Miss. 805.

In all of these states the separate jurisdiction of the law and equity courts is maintained. The contrary is held in Missouri, where the courts exercise both law and equity jurisdiction (Bond v. Worley, 26 Mo. 253), and in Hurd v. Dutchess County Bank, 1 Morris (Iowa), 291; Riopelle v. Doellner, 26 Mich. 102,—where the jurisdictions were separate. See also Heath v. Erie R. Co. 9 Blatchf. 317.

Not only were law and equity blended into one system of jurisprudence by our statutes at the same session of the congress of the republic at which the common law was adopted, but at the same time a system of procedure was established which is borrowed from the practice both of the courts of law and those of equity, as recognized at common law. Writs peculiar to courts of equity were prescribed for by statutory regulation, and at an early day provision was made by statute for the perpetuation of testimony, and for the discovery of evidence, in a pending suit, by simply filing interrogatories to the opposite party, the answers to which had the effect of an answer under oath to a bill in equity. At a later day it was provided, as a cumulative procedure, that either party to a suit could take the deposition of the adverse party. The effect of our statutory system was passed upon in Cronin v. Gay, supra, and it was held that bills of discovery were thereby abolished. This decision was doubtless well known to the able lawyers who compiled our revised statutes, and yet all the provisions of the old statutes in regard to the law of evidence were incorporated in that revision without change. See Report of Commissioners, 2 Sayles' Civ. Stat. p. 726. When the legislature re-enacts a statute which has been construed by the courts, the presumption is that it intended that the new enactment should receive the same construction as the old. The rule is universal, and is conclusive of the question under consideration. If, however, the question were one of first impression, we see no good reason which would impel us to a different conclusion.

The motion for a rehearing is overruled.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT (In Banc).

Ex parte SING LEE.

(96 Cal. 354.)

Constitutional authority to make and enforce all such police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws does not justify a municipality in prohibiting the maintenance of a public laundry in any except two designated blocks of the town without a license to be granted only on obtaining the written consent of the owners of a majority of the real estate in the block where the business is to be conducted and in the four surrounding blocks.

APPPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus to procure the release of petitioner from the custody of the marshal of the town of Chico, to which he had been committed for the alleged violation of a municipal ordinance regulating the laundry business. Petitioner discharged.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. F. C. Lusk for petitioner.

Messrs. William H. Schooler and W. H. H. Hart, Atty-Gen., for respondent.

De Haven, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioner was, at the date of the issuance and service of the writ of habeas corpus herein, restrained of his liberty by the marshal of the town of Chico, upon a charge of having violated section 1 of a certain ordinance of that town, "in that he did . . . unlawfully establish, maintain, and carry on the business of a public laundry . . . without having first obtained a written permit from the board of trustees of said town to establish, maintain, and carry on such public laundry." It is claimed by the petitioner that the section of the ordinance which he is charged with violating is unconstitutional, and that, therefore, his imprisonment is illegal. For the purpose of passing upon the question thus presented, it is only necessary to consider sections 1 and 2 of the ordinance referred to. They are as follows: "Section 1. On and after the passage of this ordinance it shall be unlawful

Sec. 2. No permit shall be granted by said board of trustees, unless the person or persons so applying for the same shall have first obtained the written consent of a majority of the real property owners within the block in which it is proposed to establish, maintain, or carry on such public laundry or public washhouse, and also of the four blocks immediately surrounding the block in which it is proposed to establish, maintain, or carry on such public laundry or public washhouse."

It is provided by section 11 of article 11 of the Constitution of this state that "any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws;" and it is argued here in behalf of respondent that the ordinance in question is a police regulation, and therefore one which the town of Chico was authorized to enact by this section of the constitution. The power conferred upon cities and towns by the section just quoted is undoubtedly a very broad and comprehensive one, and would sustain the enactment of any ordinance having a reasonable tendency to promote the health, the comfort, safety, and welfare of the municipality, and which would not be in conflict with some general law of the state. But, broad as is this power, the ordinance before us cannot be considered as falling within the limits of its proper exercise.

The business of conducting a laundry is a lawful occupation, precisely as much so as is that of the carpenter, blacksmith, or merchant, and is not of itself, and irrespective of the manner in which it is conducted, offensive or dangerous to the health of those living within its vicinity; and no municipal corporation has the power to make the right of a person to follow this business at any place he may select for that purpose dependent upon the will of any number of citizens or property owners within its limits, as is attempted in the ordinance under review. A town or city may, when deemed necessary for the public health or safety, adopt reasonable regulations as to the manner in which such a business shall be conducted, and for this purpose may, in the exercise of its police power, impose reasonable restrictions as to the kind of building which may be used for such purposes, as, for instance, that it shall be of brick or stone in large and closely-built cities, and that it shall have sufficient drainage, and may prescribe within reasonable limits the hours during which the work of the laundry shall be suspended. Ex parte Moynier, 65 Cal. 36; Barbier v. Connolly, 113 24 L. R. A.

U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923; Soon Hing v. Crowley, 118 U. S. 703, 28 L. ed. 1145.

Regulations such as these were held in the cases above cited to be merely police regulations, which any municipality possessed of the ordinary powers of such corporations may exercise with a view to promote the health and safety of the community. But the ordinance which the petitioner here is charged with violating is not of this character, and the restrictions which it imposes upon the right to carry on a public laundry have no tendency to promote the public health, or in any way to secure the public comfort or safety. The sections of the ordinance above quoted bear no kind of relation to such objects, and do not attempt to regulate the business mentioned with the view of accomplishing such ends, but they commit the right to carry on such business at all, in all but two blocks of the town, to the unrestricted will and caprice of a majority of the real property owners within the block within which it is proposed to establish such laundry, and of the four blocks immediately surrounding such block. Such a condition imposed upon the right of a person to maintain a public laundry is not only an unauthorized interference with the inalienable right of such person to engage in a lawful occupation, but also with the right of the owner of property to devote it to a lawful purpose. The personal liberty of the citizen and his rights of property cannot be thus invaded under the disguise of a police regulation. Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 50 Am. Rep. 636. In the case of Pick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 373, 30 L. ed. 227, the Supreme Court of the United States had before it the question of the validity of an ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco, which made it unlawful for any person to "carry on a laundry within the corporate limits of the city and county of San Francisco, without having first obtained the consent of the board of supervisors, except the same be located in a building constructed either of brick or stone." This provision of the ordinance was in that case held void, as conferring upon the municipal authorities an arbitrary power to give or withhold consent to the carrying on of such business in buildings not made of brick or stone. In passing upon that question the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Matthews, said: "It does not prescribe a rule and conditions for the regulation of the use of property for laundry purposes, to which all similarly situated may conform. It allows without restriction the use for such purposes of buildings of brick or stone; but as to wooden buildings, constituting nearly all those in previous use, it divides the owners or occupants into two classes, not having respect to their personal character and qualifications for the business, nor the situation and nature and adaptation of the buildings themselves, but merely by an arbitrary line, on one side of which are those who are permitted to pursue their industry by the mere will and consent of the supervisors, and on the other those from whom this consent is withheld, at their mere will and pleasure. And both classes are alike only in this: that they are tenants at will, under the supervisors, of their means of living."

The ordinance now before us is not less illegal and arbitrary in its provisions, as it makes the right of the trustees to grant permission to carry on a laundry outside of the two blocks dependent entirely upon the consent of a certain number of property owners who are not accountable to any one for their action, and who are not required to give or have any other reason for their refusal to give such consent than their mere will. It is very clear to us that the right of an owner to use his property in the prosecution of a lawful business, and one that is recognized as necessary in all civilized communities, cannot be thus made to rest upon the caprice of a majority or any number of those owning property surrounding that which he desires to use. An ordinance in all respects similar to this was held unconstitutional in the Laundry Ordinances Case, 7 Sawy. 528, 13 Fed. Rep. 229, and it was there said by the court: "In the business of a laundry there is nothing objectionable that may not be urged against all occupations in the city and county. If, therefore, the supervisors can make its prosecution depend upon the approval of others in its neighborhood, they may require a similar approval for the prosecution of other business equally inoffensive."

Such a restriction upon the freedom of the pursuit of a lawful occupation is not authorized by any power vested in the board of supervisors, and it may be doubted whether it could be authorized by any legislative body under our form of government." There is a wide distinction between the ordinance in this case and that which was upheld by this court in Ex parte Christensen, 85 Cal. 213. This ordinance deals with an occupation which is harmless in itself and useful to the community, while the other was sustained as a police regulation of a business in which the citizen has no inherent right to engage, but which may be prohibited altogether, or only permitted under such conditions and restrictions as will, in the judgment of the lawmaking power, limit to the utmost the evils which often attend it.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Superior Court for Tehama County in favor of defendants and from an order denying motion for a new trial in a suit brought to have a satisfaction of mortgage set aside and canceled. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Armstrong & Platnauer and P. H. Coffman for appellant.

Messrs. A. L. Hart, S. Solon Holl, Robert T. Delvin, and Isaac Josephs for respondents.

Searls, C., filed the following opinion:

This was an action by Henry Wittenbrock, as plaintiff, to have a satisfaction of a mortgage set aside and canceled, and to foreclose said mortgage, which was executed by the defendant John A. Parker. Defendants Bithell and Harlow were made defendants, and set up mortgages in their favor, which, by the decree of the court were adjudged valid and subsisting against the defendant Parker, and the liens thereof prior to the lien of plaintiff's mortgage. Plaintiff appeals from the decree, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The following facts illustrate the important question in the case: Plaintiff's mortgage was executed May 22, 1885, by the defendant John A. Parker, upon certain real property in the county of Tehama to secure the payment of his certain promissory note for $6,000, and interest, payable two years after date to the Union Building & Loan Association or order. The mortgage was duly recorded May 23, 1885. L. S. Taylor and S. Solon Holl were attorneys at law and copartners under the firm name of Taylor & Holl, and engaged as such firm in the practice of law in all its various branches, including the examination of land titles, giving opinions as to the validity thereof, and drawing deeds, mortgages, assignments, and other instruments in writing. In February, 1888, the note of Parker was due and unpaid, and the Union Building & Loan Association was pressing him for payment, whereupon L. S. Taylor, the senior member of the firm of Taylor & Holl, at the request of Parker, negotiated with plaintiff for the purchase by him of said note and mortgage, and to grant further time for the payment thereof. To this plaintiff agreed, and in February, 1888, the holder of the note and mortgage, in consideration of $7,000, which plaintiff paid, assigned to him, the said plaintiff, the note and mortgage. This assignment was drawn by Taylor, and at his request recorded March 5, 1888. Holl knew nothing of the assignment. On or about October 4, 1888, John A. Parker, the maker of the note and mortgage, had contracted to sell a portion of the mortgaged premises, and applied to plaintiff through said Taylor for a release of the lien of his mortgage upon the land to be sold upon his payment of $4,000 upon the note, the mortgage to remain upon the residue of the land as security for the balance due on the note. Plaintiff agreed to this, and said L. S. Taylor then prepared a release, which he represented to plaintiff and Parker was a release of the land to be sold, and plaintiff, believing this to be true, executed and acknowledged the release, but which in fact was, as the court finds, by mistake and inadvertence so drawn as to read "that said mortgage was fully paid and satisfied." Plaintiff did not himself read the release, but took the statement of Taylor that it was all right. This release came into the hands of W. F. Huntoon, at whose request it was duly recorded on the 22d day of October, 1888. The copartnership between Taylor and Holl was formed January 1, 1885, prior to which time Taylor had been an attorney for plaintiff and defendant Parker; his services consisting mainly in preparing deeds, mortgages, assignments, and releases, and examining abstracts. That, after the formation of said copartnership, plaintiff and Parker continued to employ his services in like manner, and his partner, Holl, who occupied a separate office or room, knew little or nothing of their business, and knew nothing of the mortgage in question, its assignment, or the release thereof, or of any of the agreements relating thereto, nothing in relation thereto having been in fact imparted to him. For some years prior to 1888 defendant Bithell was accustomed to loan money on real-estate security, and was accustomed to require the borrower to furnish an abstract of title to the land offered as security, and to submit such abstract to an attorney selected by him, the said defendant, and to pay said attorney for his opinion as to title, and for preparing mortgages, etc., where the loans were consummated. Bithell had for some years selected S. Solon Holl as the attorney to examine and report upon titles in all such cases, and to prepare all necessary papers, to which said Holl gave his individual attention. On the 24th day of October, 1888, defendant John A. Parker applied to defendant Bithell for a loan of $6,000, and offered real estate as security therefor. Bithell applied to Holl to examine the abstract of title of the real estate offered, and to prepare notes and mortgages if he approved the title. The title was approved by Holl, and the notes and mortgages prepared and executed by Parker on the same day, and the money, $6,000, was then and there received by said Parker. The mortgages, four in number, covered the property mortgaged to plaintiff. Neither Bithell nor Holl knew of the plaintiff's mortgage, or the assignment or release thereof, except as shown by the abstract, and had no actual notice or knowledge of any mistake in the release. The record showed plaintiff's mortgage to have been released. Holl advised Bithell that the land was clear of incumbrance, and Bithell relied upon and acted upon this belief in making his loan, and neither he nor Holl had in fact any information as to the mistake in plaintiff's release until January, 1891.

Upon this state of facts the question arises, Had Bithell such constructive notice of the mistake in the release of the mortgage of plaintiff that the lien of his own mortgages upon the same land was postponed and rendered subject and subordinate to that of plaintiff under his mortgage, so by mistake released? Taylor and Holl being engaged as copartners in the practice of the law, including business of the character transacted for the several parties to this controversy, the knowledge acquired by one member of the firm, obtained while transacting such business and relating thereto, was constructive notice to the firm as to such knowledge. An attorney is an agent for his client within the scope of his employment, and two or more attorneys practicing together as copartners are joint agents as to the business transacted for their clients as such copartners. Notice to one of two or more joint agents is notice to all. Wade, Notice, § 681; Pulton Bank v. New York & S. Canal Co. 4 Paige, 127, 3 L. ed. 372; North River Bank v. Aymar, 3 Hill, 262; Bank of U. S. v. Davis, 2 Hill, 451; National Secur. Bank v. Cushman, 121 Mass. 490. Like other copartners, each is at the same time a principal and an agent for all the others.

The important branch of the question relates to the situation of defendant Bithell as affected by the knowledge imputed to Holl, who was his attorney and agent in passing upon the abstract of title to the land and in preparing the mortgages. We say he was the attorney and agent of Bithell in the transaction, because he was employed by him, and it was to and for him the services were rendered, and the fact that his employer required the mortgagor to furnish an abstract and pay Holl for his services did not constitute him the attorney of the latter. The burden cast upon the mortgagor of paying for the services of the attorney selected by Bithell to guard his interests was simply a condition of the loan, and did not alter the status of such attorney, or diminish the duty or responsibility which he owed to his employer. Holl was, then, the agent of Bithell. It was not a general and continuing agency, extending to a range as comprehensive as the functions of an attorney, but limited to the particular business in hand, for the transaction of which he was specially employed. It is not sought to charge Bithell with any actual notice of plaintiff's mortgage or of any knowledge of facts to put him upon inquiry as to the mistake in its satisfaction or cancellation of record. The case turns upon the point of the constructive notice to the principal of the facts within the knowledge of the agent. This question presents a broad field of inquiry. A somewhat careful examination of its several phases awakens a desire to discuss it at length, and to review some of the many authorities converging and diverging in relation to its several branches, but economy of time and space forbids, and I content myself with a concise statement of what seem to be the settled propositions on the subject, so far as applicable to this case, which may be briefly stated thus: A principal is bound by the knowledge of his agent, and will in law be deemed to have constructive notice of such knowledge. In order to thus bind the principal by knowledge possessed by the agent, it is, as a general rule, essential that the information "be obtained by or imparted to the agent while he is in fact acting as agent,—while he is actually engaged in doing his principal's business, in pursuance of his authority, and in his character as agent." Pom. Eq. Jur. § 670. Within these limits and to this extent there has been but little divergence of opinion on the part of the courts, either in England or this country, and the doctrine is elementary. Connelly v. Peck, 6 Cal. 348; May v. Borel, 12 Cal. 91; Stanley v. Green, Id. 148; Hunter v. Watson, Id. 363, 78 Am. Dec. 548; Bierce v. Red Bluff Hotel Co. 81 Cal. 161; Donald v. Beale, 57 Cal. 399; Watson v. Sutro, 86 Cal. 500.

It is the duty of an attorney at law, or other agent, to communicate to his client or principal whatever information he acquires in relation to the subject-matter involved in the transaction, and he will be presumed to have performed his duty in that respect; and notice to him is constructive notice to his client or principal. Bierce v. Red Bluff Hotel Co. supra; The Distilled Spirits, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 856, 20 L. ed. 167; Watson v. Sutro, supra. The facts constituting knowledge, or want of it, on the part of the agent, are proper subjects of proof, and are to be ascertained by testimony as in other cases; but, when ascertained, the constructive notice thereof to the principal is conclusive, and cannot be rebutted by showing that the agent did not in fact impart the information so acquired. Watson v. Sutro, supra. In the present case it does not appear that Holl, who acted as the attorney of Bithell, acquired any knowledge in relation to plaintiff's mortgage, or the mistake in its satisfaction, during the time he was engaged in effecting the Bithell loan. Whatever notice he had of the mistake in such satisfaction of plaintiff's mortgage, if any, was constructive and previously obtained. There is abundant authority to the point that notice to an agent, to be notice to his principal, must be given to him while acting in the course of his employment. Weisser v. Dentson, 10 N. Y. 68, 61 Am. Dec. 731; Doe v. Ingersoll, 11 Smedes & M. 249, 49 Am. Dec. 57; Russell v. Sweetey, 22 Mich. 235; Smith v. Dunton, 42 Iowa, 48; Goodwin v. Dean, 50 Conn. 517; Pringle v. Dunn, 87 Wis. 449, 19 Am. Rep. 772. Lord Hardwicke, in discussing this rule, remarked that a different rule "would make purchasers' and mortgagees' titles depend altogether on the memory of their counselors and agents, and oblige them to apply to persons of less eminence as counsel, as not being so likely to have notice of former transactions." In

Trentor v. Pothen, 46 Minn. 298, Mitchell, J., in referring to the question, expresses like views in the following language: "If a party who employs an attorney for the special purpose of examining an abstract, and passing upon the record title, is to be charged with notice of all knowledge which the attorney may have previously acquired from other transactions for other parties, it would be very dangerous to employ an attorney at all for any such purpose; and the one whom it would be most dangerous to employ would be the attorney having the most experience and the most extensive practice." The authorities in this state have, so far as observed, confined the limits of constructive notice to the bounds hereinbefore stated. It must be admitted, however, that the rule has in many instances and by eminent jurists been extended so as to deem the principal to have constructive notice of information acquired by the agent prior to and independent of the scope of the agency. A synopsis of the rule, as thus indicated, taken from the syllabi of The Distilled Spirits, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 856, 20 L. ed. 167, indicates fairly well the result of the reasoning of the court in that case: "The rule that notice to the agent is notice to the principal applies, not only to knowledge acquired by the agent in the particular transaction, but to knowledge acquired by him in a prior transaction, and present to his mind at the time he is acting as such agent, provided it be of such a character as he may communicate to his principal without breach of professional confidence." Pom. Eq. Jur. § 672, states the general rule to be limited by cases in which the transaction in question closely follows, and is intimately connected with, a prior transaction in which the agent was also engaged, and in which he acquired material information, or where the information obtained by the agent in a former transaction was so precise and definite that it is or must be present to his mind and memory in the second transaction; then such information operates as constructive notice to the principal in such second transaction. The same author adds that, "while this particular rule is settled by a strong array of authorities, the courts show a plain determination not to extend it, but to keep it confined within narrow and necessary limits."

It seems conceded on all hands that clear and satisfactory proof that the knowledge of the former transaction was present in the mind and memory of the agent, at the time of the second transaction, is necessary in order to bind the principal in such second transaction by constructive notice of the prior information of the agent. Conceding, then, this enlargement of the rule of notice, which in a few cases may prove a salutary one, but which needs to be closely guarded to prevent injustice from the difficulty and uncertainty which must attend its application, and it is not perceived how appellant's case is strengthened. The constructive notice to a principal comes from information—knowledge—possessed by his agent. Holl, as the attorney and agent of Bithell, had no knowledge or information to put him upon inquiry as to the prior mortgage of plaintiff, its assignment, or the mistake in its satisfaction. His only information was that furnished by the abstract and satisfaction, all of which showed the property clear of incumbrance. Constructive notice to the principal springs from actual knowledge, or such information as should awaken inquiry in a reasonable man, imparted to or acquired by the agent. The reason of the rule is that the agent has acquired knowledge which it was his duty to impart to his principal, and the presumption is that he has performed that duty. The knowledge of the agent is a prerequisite to the presumption, and, where the former fails, the latter has no application. The knowledge which Taylor possessed that plaintiff's mortgage was not to be satisfied in full, and which constructively bound his law partner, Holl, applied to their then principal, the plaintiff, and to their liabilities to each other. When Holl came to act in another capacity for a new principal and in a different matter, the notice to him which constructively bound such new principal was actual notice, founded upon knowledge or information which it was in his power to impart, the facts constituting which it was necessary to prove, and which, when proven, would raise an irrebuttable or conclusive presumption against such principal. The evidence and findings show that the mistake in the satisfaction of plaintiff's mortgage was a separate and distinct transaction, and that, so far from being in the mind of the attorney, Holl, at the date of the execution of the Bithell mortgage, he had not previously been aware of any fact in the matter, and did not become aware of the mistake in satisfying plaintiff's mortgage for many months thereafter. The case presented is this: Plaintiff and Bithell are both innocent parties. Plaintiff had a prior mortgage, which he, by mistake, satisfied in full without reading the satisfaction. This was negligence on his part, and, as one of two innocent parties must suffer as a consequence of such negligence, it is equitable and just that the loss should fall upon the plaintiff, by whose negligence the mishap was brought about. Schulte v. McLean, 98 Cal. 856; Somes v. Brewer, 2 Pick. 201, 18 Am. Dec. 406; Mundorff v. Wickersham, 63 Pa. 87, 8 Am. Rep. 531; Civil Code, § 8543.

The argument of appellant directed to the allegations of the pleadings, and the issues formed thereby, does not call for special notice, for the reason that, so far as any doubt is left as to the matters discussed, it is upon questions not going to the merits of the case.

The several objections made to the introduction of evidence, and the errors assigned upon the rulings relating thereto, do not require special notice, beyond the remark that, as between plaintiff and Bithell, they involved no error, and, as between them, the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed. G. W. Harlow, administrator with the will annexed of the estate of David Fuhrman, deceased, was made a party defendant, who, it was alleged, claimed "some estate or interest in said mortgaged land, but that said estate or interest therein is subsequent to said mortgage lien (of plaintiff) thereon, and should be postponed thereto," etc. Harlow answered, denying that his estate or interest in certain of the mortgaged land, which he described, was subsequent to the alleged mortgage lien of plaintiff, but alleged that plaintiff's mortgage lien was inferior and subject to the mortgage lien of defendant thereafter set forth. Defendant then proceeds, as it is expressed, in "further answering said amended complaint," to set out in an orderly and usual manner, as in a complaint or cross complaint, and to aver that on the 23d day of January, 1889, the defendant Parker made to David Fuhrman his promissory note for $2,000, payable one year after date, with interest at 10 per cent per annum; the execution of a mortgage, to secure the payment thereof, upon certain described land, being upon a part of the land described in plaintiff's mortgage; the due recording of the mortgage on the 24th day of January, 1889; that the note is due and unpaid; the death of Fuhrman February 22, 1889; probate of his will; appointment of Harlow as administrator with the will annexed that he duly qualified, etc.; that plaintiff and certain other named parties claim some interest in the premises, or some part thereof, as purchasers, mortgagees, or otherwise, all of which interests and claims, except that of the defendant Bithell, are subsequent to the lien of defendant's mortgage. The prayer is in the usual form for foreclosure of the mortgage, sale of the property, etc. In other words, although denominated an answer, it is in fact a cross-complaint. The court in its findings and decree designates it as a cross-complaint, and such in point of law it was and is. So treating it, the court found as follows: "I find all the allegations of the defendant Harlow's cross-complaint true." There is in the complaint no allusion to the mortgage of Fuhrman or to Harlow, except that, as administrator, etc., he, in common with others, claimed some interest in the mortgaged premises, which was averred to be subsequent and subject to the lien of the plaintiff's mortgage, and should be foreclosed. Harlow denied that the lien of plaintiff's mortgage was prior to his, as above set forth. This was all there was in the complaint for him to deny. Having set out the mortgage of his testator, and asked for its foreclosure, he was entitled to make proof, as was done, of its due execution, etc. There was neither allegation nor proof that he had notice of plaintiff's mortgage. When Harlow's mortgage was recorded, it was constructive notice to the world; and as against the prior mortgage of plaintiff, which had before that time been discharged of record, it is, in the absence of proof of actual notice, to be deemed prior in lien. If there was actual notice of plaintiff's mortgage imparted by Harlow, it was an affirmative matter, the proof of which devolved upon plaintiff; failing in which, he cannot complain. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

Jackson ORR.

('.....Colo.....')

1. The power of the governor over the fire and police board of the city of Denver, in respect to orders of appointment and removal, depends entirely upon the terms of the charter, as amended by the legislature in 1893; and it is the province of the courts to construe such legislative act, in cases of actual litigation arising thereunder.

2. "The several departments of the government are equal in dignity, and of co-ordinate authority, and neither can subject the other to its jurisdiction, or strip it of any portion of its constitutional powers; but the judiciary is the final authority in the construction of the constitution and the laws, and its construction should be received and followed by the other departments."

3. The decision in Trimble v. People, 19 Colo. —, approved.

4. The limitation clause in the charter of 1893, forbidding the governor to remove members of the fire and police board for political reasons, was intended to promote efficiency in the fire and police departments, and to prevent their being used to advance the interests of any political party or individual; but, as the charter now stands, practical effect cannot be given to such limitation, except as it may operate upon the conscience of the executive, and so control his official conduct.

5. It is a presumption of law that every public officer does his duty, and this presumption is especially strong in the case of the governor,—the chief executive officer of an independent state.

6. Under the charter of 1893, when the governor makes an order for the removal of a member of the fire and police board, and states the cause therefor in writing, such written statement by the governor must be held the exclusive and conclusive proof of the cause for making such order.

PETITIONS for writs of quo warranto to oust defendants from the offices of excise and fire commissioners of the city of Denver. Judgments of ouster.

*Headnotes by ELLIOTT, J.

Statement by Elliott, J.:

The above-entitled cases are considered together in the opinion. They were argued and submitted together, the pleadings being substantially the same, except as to the names of the parties and offices. The informations show, inter alia, that respondent Martin was excise commissioner; that respondent Orr was fire commissioner, and that, as such, they were members of the fire and police board of the city of Denver when the controversy herein arose; and that they have ever since continued to act as such officers. In January, 1894, while respondents were so holding said offices, the governor preferred charges against them for misconduct. Upon a hearing before the governor, evidence was introduced, and the parties were heard in their own behalf; and upon the conclusion of the hearing the following findings were made, and stated in writing, by the governor: "I therefore find from the evidence in this case that—First, the defendants, as members of the fire and police board, in knowingly sending special policemen to the gambling houses of Denver for the protection of said houses by the city police, were guilty of malfeasance in office, and, second, that, in failing to cause to be arrested persons whom they knew to be in open violation of the law, they were guilty of neglect of duty. It is therefore, for the causes hereinbefore specified, ordered, this 7th day of March, 1894, that Jackson Orr be, and he is hereby, removed from the office of fire commissioner of the city of Denver; and D. J. Martin be, and he is hereby, removed from the office of excise commissioner of the city of Denver. Davis H. Waite, Governor of Colorado." A copy of the order of removal was on March 7, 1894, duly served upon said Orr and Martin. On March 8, 1894, the said Davis H. Waite, governor aforesaid, at the executive office in the city of Denver, and under his hand, as governor aforesaid, in writing, appointed one Samuel D. Barnes excise commissioner of said city of Denver, vice D. J. Martin, removed, and Dennis Mullins to be fire commissioner, vice Jackson Orr, removed. Said appointments, in writing, were in words and figures as follows:

"Executive Order. March 8th, 1894. Ordered, that Samuel D. Barnes, of 126 Lincoln avenue, Denver, be, and he is hereby, appointed excise commissioner of the city of Denver for the unexpired term ending on the second Tuesday of April, 1895, vice D. J. Martin, removed. [Signed] Davis H. Waite, Governor of Colorado."

Note.—The decision in the above case which practically denies effect to the provision that officers should not be removed for political reasons has an added interest by reason of the extrinsic facts as to the disturbed condition of public affairs which is merely mentioned by the court, but which constituted one of those dangerous and disgraceful conditions of authority which courts have been called upon in a considerable number of recent cases to settle.

As to summary removal of officers, see Trainor v. Wayne County Auditors (Mich.) 15 L. R. A. 66, and note; also State v. Johnson (Fla.) 18 L. R. A. 410; Speed v. Detroit (Mich.) 22 L. R. A. 842.

"Executive Order. March 8, 1894. Ordered, that Dennis Mullins, of 3050 Larimer street, Denver, be, and he is hereby, appointed fire commissioner of the city of Denver for the unexpired term ending on the second Tuesday of April, 1895, vice Jackson Orr, removed. [Signed] Davis H. Waite, Governor of Colorado."

The answers of respondents contain, among other things, the following: That respondents, as members of the fire and police board, "were not guilty of sending special policemen to the gambling houses of Denver for the protection of said houses by the said police, but, on the contrary thereof, the said special policemen were sent to the gambling houses of the city of Denver for the purpose of preserving the public peace; preventing riots and disturbance; preventing minors, intoxicated persons, or others under disability, from frequenting such houses; to apprehend persons guilty of any disturbance or breach of the peace, and for the purpose of giving information as to the presence and whereabouts of suspicious characters; to ascertain the names of persons frequenting such houses and carrying them on, and the places where gambling was carried on at the said city of Denver, with a view to restricting and controlling the said evil and vice, in order to its eventual suppression. Avers, howsoever, that the said assumed, attempted, and pretended removal of this defendant from the said office was for political reasons, and no other, for that this defendant had refused, before that time, to remove from their positions and places members of the police force and of the fire department of the city of Denver who were, and long had been, faithfully serving in their said positions and places, at request of the said Davis H. Waite, solely because the said persons were not of the same political faith and affiliation with the said Davis H. Waite, and had refused to appoint, in the stead of the said persons, those of the same political party, faith, and affiliation of the said Davis H. Waite, which said removals and appointments so requested by the said Davis H. Waite, this defendant avers, were, and would have been, in violation of the provisions of the charter of the city of Denver; and the defendant avers that the said attempted and pretended removal of this defendant by the said Davis H. Waite, for political reasons, only, as aforesaid, was in violation of the forty-fifth section of the third article in the certain act of the general assembly of the state of Colorado entitled 'An act to revise and amend the charter of the city of Denver,' approved April 8, 1893."

Sess. Laws 1893, p. 172: "Sec. 45. Immediately upon the passage of this act, and biennially thereafter, the governor of the state of Colorado shall, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, appoint the fire commissioner, the police commissioner and the excise commissioner for the term of two years, who shall in 1893 take the places, and shall exercise the powers and perform the duties of the fire and police board of the city of Denver. The governor may in vacation of the senate, fill vacancies by appointments in writing filed with the secretary of state; and all appointments by the governor shall be made with power of suspension or removal at any time for cause, to be stated in writing, but not for political reasons. The fire commissioner shall be the president of said board. Not more than two (2) members of said board shall be of the same political party, and all of said appointments shall be made to expire on the second (2d) Tuesday in April."

The informations show that Mullins and Barnes, having qualified, demanded possession of the offices, and that Orr and Martin refused to vacate. Thereupon, these proceedings were instituted.

The remaining facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. J. Warner Mills, Platt Rogers, Robert W. Steele, Eugene Engley, and Thomas Ward, Jr., for plaintiffs.

Elliott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The taking of original jurisdiction of these proceedings must not be understood as establishing a precedent. If this court were to take cognizance of every application within its original jurisdiction, there would be little time remaining to devote to appellate business. We have felt constrained to entertain these original proceedings because of the disturbed condition of public affairs incident to the fire and police board controversy. In so doing, we have yielded to the fears of others, rather than to any serious apprehensions of our own. While we have been constrained by a desire to speedily allay public anxiety by avoiding the delays of nisi prius trials, and probable appellate proceedings, it should not be overlooked that the delays, thus far, have not been confined to the courts. From the informations filed herein, it appears that on January 17, 1894, the governor cited Messrs. Orr and Martin to appear before him to answer the charges preferred against them; that two days afterwards the evidence was taken upon said charges; and that seven weeks thereafter, March 7, 1894, the orders of removal were made. During the three weeks following, there were legal proceedings in the courts, in various forms; but not until Saturday, March 31, was any application made to this court, by which the controversy could be settled and determined. On the Monday following, this court indicated its willingness to take original jurisdiction. It is true a question was presented by the governor on March 17, 1894, asking this court to determine, upon an ex parte statement, what persons were entitled to the offices of fire and excise commissioners. To that question, and the matter stated in connection with it, this court gave a clear and explicit opinion, indicating the remedy, based upon the assumption that the facts stated were true. See recent opinion of Mr. Justice Goddard in Re Fire & Excise Comrs. (Colo.) 86 Pac. Rep. 284. But it could not be assumed that such ex parte statement could not be controverted, nor that an opinion based thereon might not require modification, when the other side should present their cause in court, as they had a right to do. It would have been highly improper to have given an unqualified opinion upon such ex parte statement. No opinion based upon such statement could have been made to bind the parties contending for official place upon the fire and police board. While the constitution requires this court to "give its opinion upon important questions upon solemn occasions when required by the governor," it does not require, nor does the constitution permit, this court to render judgment in connection with such opinion. The court may give its opinion upon the law, based upon the facts submitted by the executive, but it cannot render judgment thereon, nor can it, upon such questions, undertake to determine questions of fact. Re Appropriations by General Assembly, 13 Colo. 822. In Re Senate Resolution on Irrigation, 9 Colo. 620, speaking of executive and legislative questions, it was said: "It could not have been the intention to authorize an ex parte adjudication of individual or corporate rights by means of a legislative or executive question. Parties must still litigate their rights in the ordinary and regular course of judicial proceedings." It is manifest that no decision or judgment affecting the rights or claims of contending parties can be rendered upon an ex parte question without violating that fundamental principle of our jurisprudence which guarantees to every person his day in court before judgment is rendered against him. Every lawyer, and all intelligent citizens, understand this principle. As was said by Chief Justice Marshall, of the Supreme Court of the United States, more than three quarters of a century ago, "It is a principle of natural justice, which courts are never at liberty to dispense with, unless under the mandate of positive law, that no person shall be condemned unheard, or without an opportunity of being heard." Mende v. Deputy Marshal of Virginia Dist. 1 Brock. 328, Fed. Cas. No. 9,372.

1. In argument, counsel expressed much solicitude lest this court should trespass upon the executive rights and powers of the governor. There is no occasion for such anxiety. This court has always been careful not to encroach upon the province of other departments of the government. It has always recognized them as co-ordinate, and independent in their respective spheres, under the constitution and laws of the state. In the present controversy, no constitutional rights of the executive are involved. Neither the power of appointing nor of removing commissioners of the fire and police board is in any manner vested in the governor by the constitution. His power to make such appointments and removals depends entirely upon a statute enacted by the legislature, and it certainly is the proper province of the judiciary to construe and apply statutes, in case of actual litigation arising under such statutes. Cooley, Const. Lim. pp. 108, 118. This controversy affords a practical illustration of the workings of our governmental system. The legislature makes the law providing for the appointment and removal of members of the fire and police board, vesting the power of appointment and removal in the governor. The governor selects and appoints the officers. He makes orders of removal, and appointments to fill the vacancies. The courts have nothing to do with making the law, nor with making the orders of appointment and removal. But when such orders are questioned, and there arises a controversy, resulting in actual litigation, concerning conflicting claims to such offices, then the courts, which have had nothing to do with making the law, or with making the orders of removal and appointment, are the proper tribunals to construe the law made by the legislature, and apply the same to the orders made by the governor, and thus pass upon and determine between the rival claimants to such offices. Thus, by a division of governmental powers, the interests of the public, and the claims of the contending parties, are more thoroughly and impartially considered than as though the whole power were lodged in a single department, and thus there is a peaceable solution of the controversy.

2. Mr. Justice Cooley clearly states the American doctrine upon this subject as follows: "The several departments of the government are equal in dignity, and of co-ordinate authority, and neither can subject the other to its jurisdiction, or strip it of any portion of its constitutional powers. But the judiciary is the final authority in the construction of the constitution and the laws, and its construction should be received and followed by the other departments. This results from the nature of its jurisdiction. Questions of construction arise in legal controversies, and are determined by the courts, and, when determined, the courts have power to give effect to their conclusions."

Within the sphere of his authority under the constitution, the executive is independent, and judicial process cannot reach him. But when he exceeds this authority, or usurps that which belongs to one of the other departments, his orders, commands, or warrants protect no one, and his agents become personally responsible for their acts. The check of the courts therefore, consists in their ability to keep the executive within the sphere of his authority, by refusing to give the sanction of law to whatever he may do beyond it, and by holding the agents and instruments of his unlawful action to strict accountability. The executive can have no corresponding authority to pass upon the validity of either legislative or judicial action. His judgment of proposed legislation may be expressed in his veto, but if that is overruled the executive is as much bound as is any private citizen. He is also equally concluded by the judgment of a competent court; and it may become his duty, as executive, to assist in enforcing a judgment he believes erroneous should enforcement by the ordinary process of the court, and by its own officers, become impossible." Cooley, Const. Law, pp. 139, 157. See also 1 Story, Const. § 521; and 1 Bl. Com. pp. 146, 269; also Greenwood Cemetery Land Co. v. Routt, 17 Colo. 156, 15 L. R. A. 369, and authorities there cited.

The power of appointing and making changes in the membership of the fire and police board was conferred upon the governor by the charter of the city of Denver, as amended in 1898. The legislature was not obliged to confer such power upon the governor. It might have conferred the power upon the mayor, the city council, or some other body, or it might have provided that the people should elect the members of the fire and police board. The power conferred upon the governor being purely statutory, its extent and limits are to be ascertained, and judicially determined, by a careful consideration of the terms of the statute. Mechem, Pub. Off. §§ 447-456.

3. In Trimble v. People, 19 Colo. —, Chief Justice Hayt, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Under the statute, the cause that may be sufficient to warrant removal is to be determined by the governor." The same opinion further declares: "In considering removals under this act, we must assume that the lawmaking body was of the opinion that the requirement that the cause of removal should be stated in writing was the only check necessary to prevent an arbitrary and oppressive abuse of the power." The opinion in the Trimble Case is authority, also, for the doctrine that the sufficiency of the cause of removal is a matter to be determined by the governor, and that the cause need not be such as would have weight with the courts; in short, that the governor is at liberty to remove for any cause to which he gives the sanction of his name in writing, provided such removal be not made for political reasons. The opinion in the Trimble Case concludes thus: "It is the duty of the courts to uphold the executive power as it has been conferred by the legislature." After much argument and consideration, our confidence in the correctness of the views expressed in the Trimble Case remains unshaken. We are aware now, as we were when that case was decided, that there are judicial decisions which, if followed, would have led to the conclusion that the removal of Phelps was invalid; but we chose to follow what we then considered, and what we now consider, the better-reasoned opinions. By pleadings duly filed, the parties have set forth their respective claims to the offices of fire and excise commissioners, respectively. It is not denied that in making the orders of removal the governor stated the cause therefor in writing. Respondents do not question the regularity of the acts of the governor in making such orders, but, by their answers, they do question his good faith. Without antagonizing the Trimble Case opinion, respondents claim that it is still open to them to show that the orders for their removal were made for political reasons, and for no other cause. By their answers they allege, in substance that all that they did or omitted to do in respect to gambling houses (the cause stated in writing for their removal) was done "with the knowledge and approval" of the governor. They allege further, in effect, that the motive which prompted the governor to order their removal was not their action in respect to the offense of gambling, but that he made such orders for political reasons. They allege, in substance, that the governor had requested respondents to remove members from the police force and from the fire department of the city who had been for a long time faithfully serving in such positions; that they were thus requested to remove such members because they were not of the governor's political faith and affiliation; and that they were requested to appoint, in the place of the members thus to be removed, persons who were of the same party faith and affiliation as the governor. Respondents allege, further, that they refused to comply with the governor's requests because such requests were in violation of the charter of the city, and that because of their refusal the governor made the order for their removal, and for no other reason. The answers are sworn to by respondents. It must be admitted that the matters set forth in the answers of respondents are of a serious nature. The truth of the matters alleged in the answers is not denied in these proceedings, but motions are interposed in behalf of the new appointees, claiming that the matters and things thus alleged are immaterial, irrelevant, and insufficient in law. The motions pray judgment that respondents, Orr and Martin, be ousted, and that the new appointees, Mullins and Barnes, be declared entitled to hold the offices of fire and excise commissioners, respectively. Thus, an issue of law is presented, and the jurisdiction of the court is invoked to determine what persons are entitled to hold and exercise the powers and duties of said offices.

Stated in plain language, the question to be determined is, Have respondents the legal right to allege and prove, in these proceedings, that the real cause of the orders for their removal was other and different from the cause stated in writing by the governor; that is, have they the right to show that the orders for their removal were really made for political reasons, and for no other cause? The question is not free from difficulty. It is a question that respondents had a right to have judicially determined, in an action to which they themselves should be parties. The matters set forth in respondents' answers are especially forcible in view of the words of limitation inserted in the charter of 1893, forbidding the governor to remove "for political reasons." These words were not in the former charter. The language of the charter of 1891 was, "The governor shall at all times have power and authority to revoke the appointment of any member of said board for good and sufficient causes to be specifically stated in such revocation." Sess. Laws 1891, p. 65.

It is contended that some effect must be given to these additional words in the Act of 1893, forbidding the governor to remove for political reasons. It is insisted that such words were added for a purpose; and this, according to well-settled rules of statutory construction, cannot be denied. That the additional words were inserted for a purpose is plain, and what that purpose was is also plain. The purpose was that the fire and police department of the city should not be used to advance the interests of any political party, or the political ambition of any individual, or set of individuals. The fire and police departments should be maintained for their efficiency in protecting the interests of the people, and for no other purpose. But, while it is easy to perceive the purpose of the additional words in the charter of 1893 forbidding removals for political reasons, it is not so easy to determine how to give practical effect to such additional words. It is a presumption of law that every public officer does his duty. This presumption is especially strong in the case of the governor,—the chief executive officer of an independent state. If any court should attempt to institute an inquiry into the reasons or motives which have controlled the official action of the governor, great difficulties would be encountered. These difficulties are all the greater in cases where improper political motives are charged, and this for the reason that the persons making such charges may themselves be actuated by improper political motives. Charges of improper motives are easily made, are often untrue, and are always hard to prove. When such charges are made in respect to an act not wrong in itself; an act expressly authorized for cause to be determined by the officer performing the act; an act which is wrong only when prompted by an improper reason or motive,—it is practically impossible to determine judicially that the act done was illegal, on the sole ground that it was prompted by an improper motive or unlawful reason; and this is especially true where the officer is required by law to state in writing the cause for his act, and his written statement shows no unlawful reason.

There are other reasons which make against the claim of respondents to have the order for their removal declared invalid upon evidence other than the written statement made by the governor. When the legislature provided that the governor might remove members of the fire and police board for cause to be stated in writing, but not for political reasons, it was doubtless considered that such removals might be required to be summarily made. In reason, it could not have been contemplated that the cause for removal stated in writing might be overthrown by other evidence showing that such order was made for political reasons, and not for the written cause stated by the governor. Such a course would involve much delay,—perhaps, a trial by jury, with right of appeal,—and thus the wheels of municipal government would be blocked in a manner entirely inconsistent with the control of the police and fire department of a great city. If the legislature had intended such a course to be pursued, a different wording of the statute would undoubtedly have been adopted. If it was contemplated that the cause of removal should remain an open question, to be litigated and determined upon evidence in pais, why did the legislature require the governor to preserve written evidence of it? It being shown by the information herein, and not denied, that the governor made the orders for the removal of respondents, as members of the fire and police board, and stated in writing the cause for such orders, our conclusion is that it is not a sufficient answer to the informations to allege, and offer to show by evidence other than the written statement of the governor, that the real cause for making such orders was other and different from the cause so stated in writing; in other words, that an order of removal under section 45 of the charter, and the cause therefor stated in writing by the governor, when regularly made, must be held the exclusive and conclusive proof of the cause for making such order. It follows that when the proceedings before the governor, including the written statement showing the order and cause for removal, are regular and valid upon their face, the words of limitation forbidding removals "for political reasons" cannot, as the statute now stands, be given practical effect, except as they may operate upon the conscience of the executive, and so restrain and control his official conduct.

We have examined the many authorities cited by counsel for the respective parties. Unfortunately, none of them are based upon statutes exactly like ours; but the better-reasoned decisions, based upon statutes somewhat analogous, support the conclusion at which we have arrived. In addition to the authorities cited in the Trimble Case, we cite the following (in citing authorities, it is not to be understood that all the views expressed therein are necessarily approved): Mechem, Pub. Off. chap. 6; Throop, Pub. Off. § 396; Cooley, Const. Lim. *187; State v. Board of Public Works of Jersey City, 51 N. J. L. 240; State v. Lamantia, 33 La. Ann. 448; State v. Watertown, 9 Wis. 254; State v. Camden, 48 N. J. L. 433; State v. Newark Police Comrs. 49 N. J. L. 170; Dullam v. Willson, 53 Mich. 392, 51 Am. Rep. 128; People v. Therrien, 80 Mich. 187; State v. Smith, 35 Neb. 18, 16 L. R. A. 791, 25 Am. L. Rev. 228.

The informations do not pray that any fine be imposed upon respondents for unlawfully holding the offices in question. Hence, we need not determine whether section 295 of the Code, in respect to fines, is applicable to original proceedings in this court.

The answers of respondents cannot be held sufficient in law, or available as a defense, in these proceedings. Judgments will therefore be entered that respondents be excluded from the offices of fire and excise commissioners, respectively, and that they deliver possession of such offices, together with all the books, records, papers, and paraphernalia of said offices, and other property pertaining thereto, to the new appointees, Mullins and Barnes, respectively, on or before 12 o'clock noon, Tuesday, April 17, 1894, and that respondents pay the costs of these proceedings, respectively, to be taxed, and that writs of ouster and execution may issue therefor at or after the time last specified.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

James S. BROWN, Appt.,
v.
FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF COLUM-BUS, Indiana.

(....Ind....)

1. The fact that a justice of the peace has, in reality, no jurisdiction of the case will not prevent a contract by him to secure the arrest of a person against whom a prosecution has been instituted before him from being against public policy, where the extent of his compensation is contingent on the recovery of property from the defendant.
2. The principle of estoppel by receiving benefits does not apply to prevent a defense that a contract is void as against public policy.

(April 19, 1894.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Bartholomew County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover a reward which had been offered by defendant and which plaintiff alleged that he had earned. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hord & Emig for appellant.

Messrs. Stansifer & Baker, for appellee:

The contract is against public policy. There is no principle of law better settled, more frequently applied, and more preservative of the integrity of the law and the good order of society than that embodied in the maxim, ex turpi causa non oritur actio.

Dailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action by the appellant against the appellee in the court below to recover a reward upon an alleged contract made and entered into by the parties, wherein the appellee agreed to pay the appellant a reward for the capture of one William H. Schreiber, who was the appellee's bookkeeper, and who had embezzled about $100,000 in money and bonds belonging to the appellee, and fled to Canada. Schreiber was arrested by the appellant, and the money and bonds restored.

The complaint is as follows:

Goodrich v. Tenney (Ill.) 19 L. R. A. 371, and note on validity of contracts to procure testimony; Bowman v. Phillips (Kan.) 8 L. R. A. 631.

"(1) The plaintiff James S. Brown, complains of the First National Bank of Columbus, Indiana, defendant, and says that the plaintiff was at the time of the facts herein after averred, and prior thereto, a citizen and resident of the city of Columbus, in the state of Indiana; that the defendant was then, and for a long time prior thereto, and is now, a corporation duly organized under the acts of congress in such cases made and provided for the purpose of carrying on a national bank at the city of Columbus, in Bartholomew county, state of Indiana. Plaintiff avers that the defendant, as such corporation, was carrying on and conducting a banking business in the said city, and had in its employ as bookkeeper one William H. Schreiber, and while acting as such employé of the defendant the said Schreiber, at the county of Bartholomew and state of Indiana, did steal, take, embezzle, and take away from the defendant money and property of the defendant, and appropriate the same to his own use, as follows, to wit, the sum of fifty thousand dollars ($50,000) in money, and bonds, promissory notes, and books of defendant of the value of one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000), and said Schreiber fled and escaped to Canada and beyond the limits of the United States. And, the defendant being desirous of capturing and arresting said Schreiber, the plaintiff and defendant made and entered into a contract in writing, duly signed by Francis T. Crump, vice-president, L. K. Ong, cashier, and W. O. Hogue, director, of said defendant, for the defendant, which is now in the possession of defendant, and plaintiff files a copy thereof with this complaint, who were duly authorized thereto by said defendant, wherein and whereby the plaintiff agreed to engage actively in the capture of said William H. Schreiber, and arrest or cause to be arrested the said Schreiber. The defendant agreed to pay to plaintiff the sum of forty dollars ($40) per month, and his fare to and from the city of Detroit, in the state of Michigan, and his board while there, and, if the plaintiff secured said Schreiber's arrest, the defendant agreed to and with the plaintiff to pay him one fourth or twenty-five (25) per cent of all the money or property restored to defendant by said Schreiber. If plaintiff was unsuccessful in such arrest, the defendant agreed to pay to plaintiff forty dollars ($40) per month and his board and fare while engaged in an effort for his capture. The plaintiff avers that he immediately entered upon the performance of said contract, and was actively engaged in the attempt to capture and arrest said Schreiber from the 15th day of April, 1890, until the 28th day of September, 1890, when said Schreiber was arrested, and returned to the city of Columbus, in the state of Indiana. The plaintiff, on the — day of September, 1890, arrested and caused to be arrested the said Schreiber at the said city of Detroit, in the state of Michigan, and thereafter, at defendant's request, he was immediately transferred to the county of Bartholomew, in the state of Indiana, where said crime was committed, and delivered to the sheriff of said Bartholomew county; and thereafter said Schreiber was duly indicted by the grand jury in the Bartholomew circuit court for his said crime, and thereafter, on the 10th day of October, 1890, he was tried and convicted in said court, and sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for the term of twelve (12) years, and he is now in the penitentiary serving out his term under such conviction. The plaintiff avers that the said defendant received and recovered of said money and property stolen and embezzled as aforesaid, from said Schreiber, the sum of fifty thousand dollars in money, and notes, stocks, bonds, books, and other personal property of the value of one hundred thousand dollars, all of which was restored to defendant and is in its possession. The plaintiff avers that he has fully performed said contract on his part, and the defendant has failed and refused to pay to plaintiff for the time expended by him in his said effort to arrest said Schreiber, and has failed and refused to pay him the said sum of twenty-five per cent of the value of said money and property restored to defendant, although requested to do so, and the defendant is indebted to plaintiff under said contract in the sum of thirty-seven thousand and five hundred dollars ($37,500), which is due plaintiff from defendant, and remains wholly unpaid; and the plaintiff has no knowledge of any legitimate expense for which defendant is entitled to a reduction, and plaintiff denies that there are any other expenses to be deducted. Wherefore plaintiff demands judgment for thirty-seven thousand and five hundred dollars, and for all other proper relief. Hord & Emig, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

"(2) The plaintiff, for second and further paragraph of complaint herein, says that the plaintiff was at the time of the facts herein after averred, and prior thereto, a citizen and resident of the city of Columbus, in the state of Indiana; that the defendant was then, and for a long time prior thereto, and is now, a corporation duly organized under the acts of congress in such cases made and provided, for the purpose of carrying on a national bank at the city of Columbus, in Bartholomew county, state of Indiana. Plaintiff avers that during all of said time the defendant, as such corporation, was carrying on and conducting a banking business in said city of Columbus, and had in its employ as bookkeeper one William H. Schreiber, and while acting as such employé of the defendant the said Schreiber, at the county of Bartholomew, and state of Indiana, did steal, take, embezzle, and carry away from the defendant money and property of the defendant, and appropriated the same to his own use, as follows, to wit, the sum of fifty thousand dollars in money; also bonds, promissory notes, stocks, and books of the defendant to the value of one hundred thousand dollars; and the said Schreiber fled and escaped beyond the limits of the state of Indiana and the United States into the dominion of Canada. And, the defendant being desirous of capturing and arresting said Schreiber and recovering said money and property so stolen and embezzled, the plaintiff proposed in writing, duly signed by him, to engage actively in the capture of said William H. Schreiber, and arrest, or cause to be arrested, the said Schreiber, and cause him to be delivered to the Detroit police or any person or place the defendant might select; and said defendant was to pay to the plaintiff forty dollars per month and his fare to and from Detroit, in the state of Michigan, and his board while there, and, if plaintiff should secure the arrest and delivery as aforesaid, defendant was to pay to plaintiff one fourth, or 25 per cent, of all the money or property restored to defendant by said Schreiber, after deducting all expenses that defendant may have incurred; the said per cent to be paid only out of such restored funds, and after it was clearly and fully in defendant's possession. If plaintiff was unsuccessful, the board and fare of plaintiff and forty dollars per month was to be plaintiff's only charge, and the plaintiff's work was to cease at defendant's command; and said defendant accepted said proposition, and caused said acceptance by the defendant to be written on said offer and proposition of plaintiff for and on behalf of the defendant, and to be signed by L. K. Ong, cashier of defendant, Francis T. Crump, vice-president, and W. O. Hogue, director of defendant, for and on behalf of the defendant. A copy of said contract is filed herewith, and made a part hereof, the original of which is in defendant's possession. Plaintiff avers that he immediately entered upon the performance of said contract, and was actively engaged in an effort to capture and arrest Schreiber from the 15th day of April, 1890, until the 28th day of September, 1890, when said Schreiber was arrested, and, at the request of defendant, returned to the city of Columbus, in the state of Indiana. The plaintiff, on the — day of September, 1890, arrested and caused to be arrested the said Schreiber, at the city of Detroit, in the state of Michigan; and thereafter, at the request of defendant, he was immediately transferred to the county of Bartholomew, in the state of Indiana, upon a warrant duly issued by the governor of the state of Michigan, upon requisition made by the governor of the state of Indiana upon him for the arrest and apprehension of said Schreiber, and said Schreiber was duly delivered to the custody of the sheriff of said Bartholomew county, in said state of Indiana; and thereafter said Schreiber was duly indicted by the grand jury in the Bartholomew circuit court for his crime; and thereafter, on the 10th day of October, 1890, said Schreiber was tried and sentenced by said court to imprisonment in the penitentiary for the term of twelve years, and he is now in the penitentiary at the city of Jeffersonville, in said state, serving out his time under said sentence. The plaintiff avers that the said Schreiber restored to defendant the said sum of fifty thousand dollars in money, and said notes, bonds, stocks, books, and other personal property of the value of $100,000, and turned over to said defendant money, real estate, and personal property in full payment and satisfaction thereof, which said defendant has sold and reduced to cash and received by the defendant, and said property so stolen and embezzled was fully restored to the defendant, and the said defendant now possesses and holds the same, and the plaintiff has no knowledge of any legitimate expenses to which defendant is entitled as a reduction upon this contract, and plaintiff denies that he has paid out any legitimate expenses to be deducted from said one fourth of money and property restored to be paid to plaintiff. And plaintiff avers that he has fully performed said contract on his part, and the defendant has failed and refused, and still fails and refuses, to pay to plaintiff anything for his said time expended by him in his said effort to apprehend said Schreiber, and has failed and refused, and still fails and refuses, to pay to plaintiff the said sum of twenty-five per cent of the value of said money and property restored to defendant by said Schreiber, although requested to do so, and the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff under said contract in the sum of $37,500, which is due and wholly unpaid. Wherefore plaintiff demands judgment for $37,500 and all proper relief. Hord & Emig, Attorneys for Plaintiff."

"Copy. No. 1,066. First National Bank of Columbus, Ind. Wm. J. Lucas, President. F. T. Crump, Vice-President. L. K. Ong, Cashier. Columbus, Ind., April 15th, 1890. L. K. Ong, Cashier: I make the following proposition: I will go to Detroit, Michigan, and vicinity, prepared to engage actively in the capture of Wm. H. Schreiber, your defaulting bookkeeper, and deliver to the Detroit police, or any person or place you select. My compensation to be as follows: You pay me forty dollars per month, my fare to and from Detroit, and my board while there. If I secure Schreiber's arrest and delivery, as above you are to pay me one fourth (1/4) (or 25 per cent) of all the money or property restored to you, after deducting all expenses you may have incurred. This 25 per cent to be paid only out of such restored funds, and after it is clearly and fully in your possession. If unsuccessful, my board, my fare, and forty dollars per month my only charge. Work to cease at your command. James S. Brown.

"Accepted for the bank. L. K. Ong, F. T. Crump, W. H. Hogue, Com."

The appellee filed the following answer:

"(1) The defendant in the above-entitled cause, for answer to plaintiff's complaint herein, says that at the time of the execution of the contract sued on herein, and for a long time prior and subsequent thereto, the plaintiff, James S. Brown, was an acting justice of the peace, duly elected and qualified, in and for Columbus township, in Bartholomew county, in the state of Indiana; and, further, that at the time said contract was executed, and prior and subsequent thereto, there was filed and pending before said plaintiff, as justice as aforesaid, an affidavit charging the said William H. Schreiber, mentioned in plaintiff's complaint, with the larceny of certain money and property alleged in plaintiff's complaint to have been stolen by said Schreiber from the defendant therein. That the apprehension and capture contemplated and mentioned in the contract sued on herein was of and concerning the said William H. Schreiber, and on account of the matters and facts charged in said affidavit. Wherefore, and by reason of the foregoing, defendant says said contract was and is null and void. Stansifer & Baker, Attorneys for Defendant.

"(2) For second paragraph of answer herein defendant denies each and every material allegation contained in plaintiff's complaint. Stansifer & Baker, Attorneys for Defendant."

The appellant filed a demurrer to the first paragraph of answer, which was overruled, and appellant excepted thereto. He thereupon filed his reply to the first paragraph of answer as follows:

"The plaintiff, James S. Brown, for reply to defendant's first paragraph of answer, says that said Schreiber committed said crime set forth in the complaint and answer on the 26th day of November, 1888. He avers that said Schreiber immediately fled from the state of Indiana and the United States of America to the dominion of Canada. He avers that on or about the 12th day of July, 1889, after said Schreiber had fled, and while in Canada, which defendant well knew, one L. K. Ong, the cashier of defendant's bank, made an affidavit charging said Schreiber with the commission of said crime, and filed the same with plaintiff as a justice of the peace. He avers that he never issued any warrant on said affidavit for the arrest of said Schreiber. He avers that said Ong, cashier, and the president and officers of defendant, and the counsel representing the defendant, and the prosecuting attorney in and for Bartholomew county, immediately after the filing of the same, took and carried away said affidavit, and the same was never at any time thereafter on file with plaintiff as a justice of the peace, or in his hands, or in his possession, and the plaintiff made no record thereof in his office. He avers that said Schreiber was never brought before plaintiff upon said charge, and the plaintiff never understood that said Schreiber was to be brought before him as such justice of the peace on said charge. He avers that said contract was made between plaintiff and defendant on the 15th day of April, 1890, while said Schreiber was still at large, and residing in the dominion of Canada, and outside of and beyond the limits of the state of Indiana and the United States of America, which defendant well knew. Said Schreiber had never theretofore been arrested on said charge, and at the time of making said contract said affidavit was not on file with the plaintiff as a justice of the peace, and the same had never been returned by defendant's said officers, or by any one, and the plaintiff supposed and believed that said Schreiber had been indicted for said crime by the grand jury of Bartholomew county, in the state of Indiana, whereas said crime was committed, and the plaintiff supposed and believed that said indictment was pending against said Schreiber, and have no knowledge to the contrary up to and until after the time of his arrest and return to Bartholomew county, Indiana; and upon his return to said county said Schreiber was never brought before plaintiff to answer for said crime, or any charge whatever. He avers that said Schreiber was returned to the city of Columbus, in Bartholomew county, Indiana, under arrest upon said charge, on the 28th day of September, 1890, and the defendant procured and caused said Schreiber to be held in jail in the custody of the sheriff of said county until defendant caused an indictment to be found against him, and said sheriff held said Schreiber upon the request of defendant until indictment was found against him, and on the 9th day of October, 1890, the grand jury of said Bartholomew county returned an indictment in the Bartholomew circuit court against him for said crime, and thereafter said Schreiber was held in custody by the sheriff of said county on said indictment until he was convicted of said crime and sentenced to the penitentiary of the state of Indiana; and the plaintiff never at any time took, assumed, or had jurisdiction of said Schreiber as a justice of the peace on the charge of said crime, and did not know or understand that he could or was to take jurisdiction of said Schreiber upon any prosecution for crime at the time of making said contract or the rendition of said services by him. Hord & Emig, Attorneys for Plaintiff."

The appellee filed a demurrer to the reply, which was sustained by the court, to which ruling the appellant excepted at the time. The appellant failing and refusing to reply, further judgment was rendered against him, from which he prosecutes this appeal.

The errors assigned are as follows: "(1) The court erred in overruling the demurrer filed by the appellant to appellee's first paragraph of answer. (2) The court erred in sustaining the demurrer filed by appellee to appellant's reply to appellee's first paragraph of answer, and rendering judgment against appellant for refusing to reply further."

The first paragraph of the answer above set out, taken in connection with the complaint, presents this state of facts: The appellant, then a justice of the peace, before whom an affidavit was at the time filed charging one William H. Schreiber with the crime of larceny, entered into a contract with the appellee by which the appellant agreed to go to Detroit, Mich., and arrest and deliver said Schreiber, for $40 per month, fare to and from Detroit, and board while there, and a contingent fee of 25 per cent of all money or property restored to the appellee, after deducting all expenses the appellee may have incurred. By the terms of the agreement on which recovery is sought a judicial officer engages to doff the judicial ermine, and for a stipulated price assume the role of a detective in a cause pending before him for judicial consideration. It places the liberty of the accused at the mercy of a court, subject to a fee of 25 per cent in the event of his success in causing the arrest of the accused. If such undertaking is permissible in a justice of the peace, and constitutes a binding obligation, it is equally so in a circuit, federal, or other judicial officer. The moral turpitude of the transaction would be the same in either instance. To preserve the integrity of the law and the good order of society, public policy forbids this class of contracts. It has long been established that a contract against public policy will not be enforced. Elkhart County Lodge v. Crary, 98 Ind. 238-240, 49 Am. Rep. 746. An agreement of this character shocks the moral sense of the people, as being grossly wrong and injurious. In Greenhood on Public Policy (page 387) it is said: "Any contract by one acting in a public capacity, which restricts the free exercise of a discretion vested in him for the public good, is void." The same author, on page 388, says: "The policy of the law will not allow an officer to do more than his official duty with a view to increase his fees and emoluments. It cannot change the principle because it happens that he has made a bad bargain. The rule is intended to keep public officers within the line of their duties, and not allow them to take advantage of their official position to make money by entering into engagements which tempt them to abuse the process of the courts, and oppress those who are affected by their official proceedings." In Collins v. Blanton, 2 Wils. 841, on page 850, Wilmet, Ch. J., said, in speaking of an illegal contract: "This is a contract to tempt a man to transgress the law, to do that which is injurious to the community. It is void by the common law, and the reason why the common law says such contracts are void is for the public good. You shall not stipulate for iniquity. All writers upon our law agree in this: No polluted hand shall touch the pure fountains of justice." In line with this expression, Elliott, J., speaking for the court in Stropes v. Greene County Comrs., 72 Ind. 42, on pages 43 and 44, said: "There is neither a more wholesome nor sounder rule of law than that which requires public officers to keep themselves in such position as that nothing shall tempt them to swerve from the straight line of official duty. Officers ought not to be permitted to place themselves in a position in which personal interest may come in conflict with the duty which they owe to the public." In Elkhart County Lodge v. Crary, 98 Ind. on page 241, 49 Am. Rep. 746, the court says that contracts which may tend to the injury of the public service are void, and contracts which will tend to subordinate the public welfare to individual gain are not enforceable in any court of justice. It follows, to state the rule comprehensively, that all agreements relating to proceedings in the courts, civil or criminal, which may involve anything inconsistent with the full and impartial course of justice therein, are void, though not open to the charge of actual corruption. 3 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, pp. 879-881; Bishop, Cont. § 549. And this is true regardless of the good faith or intent of the parties at the time the contract was entered into, or the fact that no evil resulted by or through the contract. This proposition finds expression in the words of Judge Elliott in Elkhart County Lodge v. Crary, 98 Ind. on page 242, 49 Am. Rep. 746, as follows: "It is not necessary that actual fraud should be shown, for a contract which tends to the injury of the public service is void, although the parties entered into it honestly, and proceeded under it in good faith. The courts do not inquire into the motives of the parties in the particular case to ascertain whether they were corrupt or not, but stop when it is ascertained that the contract is one which is opposed to public policy. Nor is it necessary to show that an evil was in fact done by or through the contract. The purpose of the rule is to prevent persons from assuming a position where selfish motives may impel them to sacrifice the public good to private benefit."

In Pollock's Principles of Contracts (page 286) it is said: "But an agreement which has an apparent tendency that way, though an intention to use unlawful means be not admitted, or even be nominally disclaimed, will equally be held void." All agreements for pecuniary considerations to control the regular administration of justice are void as against public policy, without reference to the question whether improper means are contemplated or used in their execution. The law looks to the general tendency of such agreements, and it closes the door to temptation by refusing them recognition in any of the courts of the country. Providence Tool Co. v. Norris, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 45, 56, 17 L. ed. 868, 871; State v. Johnson, 52 Ind. 197; Clippinger v. Hepbaugh, 5 Watts & S. 315, 11 Am. Dec. 519; Oscanyan v. Winchester Repeating Arms Co. 103 U. S. 261, 26 L. ed. 539.

Greenhood on Public Policy (page 5) thus lays down the rule: "The question of the validity of the contract does not depend upon the circumstance whether it can be shown that the public has in fact suffered any detriment, but whether the contract is, in its nature, such as might have been injurious to the public. It matters not that any particular contract is free from any taint, or actual fraud, oppression, or corruption. The law looks to the general tendency of such contracts." The evil tendency of the contract in suit is clearly manifest. The mere statement of it shocks the sense of justice and fair play. By virtue of the contract, appellant assumed a position where selfish motives might have impelled him to sacrifice the public good for private gain, for there is no greater public good than the right of every person charged with the commission of a crime to have a fair and impartial hearing, and there is no higher security for that right than the preservation of the courts free from corrupting influences. While there is no imputation of actual wrong committed in this case, it may be properly claimed that a contract of this character puts it in the power of a corrupt and designing official, in the event the property and money out of which to get his per cent should not willingly be turned over, to compel payment after arrest, through fear of commitment, though the accused might be innocent, or, if the accused were guilty, the temptation would be presented to acquit for a like reason. The wrong of such a contract consists in the fact that the influence of the compensation—the contingent fee of 25 per cent—does not necessarily stop with the arrest of the accused, but continues until the property and money shall be restored. High contingent rewards may lead to improper means and the use of undue influence. The duties of appellant, as counsel suggest, terminated with the arrest, but not his interest and power. The contract in suit did not require appellant to do any act injurious to the interest of Schreiber, but it allowed and induced it. As shown by the authorities, judicial officers are not permitted to place themselves in a position in which personal interest may come in conflict with the duties which they may owe to the public. They are prevented from even assuming such a position. It is the tendency of the contract, and not its binding obligation to wrong, which the courts consider. No design need, therefore, be manifest; the motive is not inquired into. It is true, as appellant's learned counsel contend, a justice may lawfully make an arrest out of his jurisdiction for an offense committed out of his presence. The thing which he undertook and contracted to do was in itself lawful, but it is only part of this case. We are now confronted with the question, Can a justice before whom an affidavit is filed, charging an individual with the crime of larceny, enter into a valid contract with the prosecuting witness to make an arrest of such person for a pecuniary consideration, when the recompense is contingent on the amount of property that may be recovered? What the law authorizes cannot be against public policy, but it may be the subject of a contract which is against public policy. The question is not, does the law authorize the arrest, but does it authorize the contract? It does not follow that a contract to do what is lawful within itself is not against public policy. It is lawful to petition the city council for the improvement of the street in front of one's property, but not to do so for a consideration moving from another. The affirmation of good faith and denial of fraud do not relieve the act of culpability. Courts will not aid either party to enforce such contracts, but leave them where they find them. Maguire v. Smock, 42 Ind. 1, 18 Am. Rep. 353; Elkhart County Lodge v. Crury, 98 Ind. 242, 49 Am. Rep. 746. A justice has control of his fees. He may tax them large or small, so they are not in excess of the amount provided for by statute. It is lawful for him to make no charge. But he cannot, in advance, enter into a valid contract binding him to make no charge for services to be rendered. A contract whereby a justice of the peace agrees to charge smaller fees in suits to be brought before him by a certain corporation than are prescribed by statute, and that such fees shall not be collected unless paid by the defendants to the corporation, is contrary to public policy and void. Hawkeye Ins. Co. v. Brainard, 72 Iowa, 180; Willemín v. Bateson, 63 Mich. 309.

When a candidate for the office of judge, in order to secure his election, pledges himself, if elected, to perform the duties of such office for a sum less than one half of the fees allowed by law, and voters are thereby induced to vote for such candidate, and he thus receives a majority of the votes cast for such office at such election, his election, secured by these means, is invalid as against public policy. State v. Collier (Mo.) 8 Cent. L. J. 495. The facts that the thing contracted for was in itself lawful, and that the defendant was benefited by the agreement, do not give the plaintiff any right of recovery. Gleason v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (Iowa) 48 N. W. Rep. 517. Numerous illustrations might be cited to sustain the doctrine. The argument that in cases like the present the justice sits merely as an examining court, and can commit only, while in other cases he may convict, and assess the penalty, has little force. The judicial function is the same in each instance. The judgment or discretion of the court, which may be improperly influenced, is exercised in each class with this difference as to results: in one case the finding is "guilty," and in the other "probably guilty." The contracts of police officers to make arrest beyond their territorial jurisdictions stand upon a different footing. They have no judicial functions to perform.

The contention of counsel that the appellee, having received the benefit of the contract, is estopped to defend against it on the principle that a corporation which has such benefit is estopped to assert that it had no power to contract, is unsound, as applied to the case at bar. The rule suggested applies to cases where private rights alone are concerned, while in contracts void as against public policy the public is interested. The public concern cannot be made a matter of private bargain. A number of maxims apply to interdict the enforcement of such a contract, and many decisions hold that the receipt of benefits and retention of property under such a contract give no right of recovery. If the contract has not been executed, it will not be enforced; if it has been executed, the law will not extend relief. It cannot be rendered valid by invoking the doctrine of estoppel. Hutchins v. Weldin, 114 Ind. 80; Perkins v. Jones, 28 Ind. 499; Dumont v. Dufore, 27 Ind. 263; Root v. Stevenson, 24 Ind. 115; Gleason v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. supra; Wheeler v. Wheeler, 5 Lans. 355; Snyder v. Willey, 33 Mich. 433; Greenhood, Pub. Pol. pp. 2, 3, 6, note 3; Broom, Legal Maxims, p. 729, § 780; 7 Wait, Act. & Def. 92.

The demurrer to the answer was properly overruled. The matters alleged in the reply by which it was sought to avoid the answer are: (1) Good faith on the appellant's part at the time the contract was entered into; (2) that the affidavit, after being filed, was taken away, and not returned; (3) that appellant made no record of the affidavit in his office; (4) that appellant issued no warrant upon the affidavit; (5) that Schreiber was never brought before appellant in said cause. The first and fifth points have been fully considered by the authorities heretofore cited. It is well settled that the validity of the contract cannot be tested by the good faith of the appellant, nor by anything occurring subsequent to its execution. It is equally clear that the case cannot be in any way affected by the taking of the affidavit from the office of the justice. The jurisdiction does not terminate with the absence of the papers from the court with or without leave. Nor does it matter that the justice had not copied the affidavit on the docket, and made no record of the affidavit. While the statute requires him to make entries in his docket, it has been held to be directory merely, and the omission in this respect is not a jurisdictional defect. Indianapolis & C. R. Co. v. Wiley, 20 Ind. 229. Especially should this be true when the officer seeks to take advantage of his own neglect of duty. The same reason applies to his failure to issue a warrant, if this act were in any sense material. He could not ask the court to enforce a contract which would only be valid because of his failure to discharge his duty as a justice. But the issuance of a warrant by him was not material. The pleadings show that Schreiber was a fugitive from justice, and that appellant's agreement was to go to Detroit, Mich., and arrest and deliver the accused there, or at any place appellee might select. If the undertaking was, as counsel insist, to do a lawful act, the warrant in such case would be issued at the end of a requisition. If the warrant were issued without the state, it would be without avail. But, aside from all this, the question is, not had the justice jurisdiction in fact, not what should have been decided had the prisoner been brought before him, but, might the temptation of a possible fee of 25 per cent influence a justice's judgment in such an event, he having placed himself in a position where such a contingency could occur? If so, the contract is void. The purpose of the rule is to prevent persons from assuming a position where selfish motives may impel a wrongful act.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Kansas

v.

A. D. CULLINS, Appt.

(.....Kan.....)

"The purchaser of intoxicating liquor, which is sold in violation of law, is not a participant with the seller, and therefore is not guilty as the principal offender.

(March 10, 1894.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Marion County convicting him of participating in an illegal sale of intoxicating liquors. Reversed.

*Headnote by HOBSON, Ch. J.

Statement by HORTON, Ch. J.:

On the 12th day of July, 1893, an information was filed in the district court of Marion county against A. D. Cullins, charging him with selling intoxicating liquor without first taking out and having a permit as required by law. The information contained five counts. Upon the trial, William Dannenfelser testified as follows: "Q. How much [whiskey] did you get? A. Well, I got a fourth of a pint. Four of us got a pint. Q. Who were the four of you? A. Why, there

NOTE.—Liability of purchaser on illegal sale of intoxicating liquors.

The rule has been quite uniform to refuse to recognize any liability on the part of the purchaser at an illegal sale of intoxicating liquor. The reasons for this ruling are somewhat different but the general trend is in the same direction. A remarkable fact is that notwithstanding the numerous expressions of opinion on the subject the cases in which the question was the point at issue are very few.

In State v. Bonner, 2 Head, 136, it is held that one who buys liquor from a slave is guilty of an offense.

But in the subsequent case of Harney v. State, 8 Lea. 112, in which it was held that the purchaser could not be convicted, the Bonner Case is distinguished on the ground that in making a sale by a slave unlawful, it must be presumed to have been intended that it would also be an offense to tempt the slave to sell.

The buyer cannot be held liable as an aider or abettor. Reg. v. Heath, 13 Ont. Rep. 471.

In Com. v. Kostenbauder, 17 W. N. C. 303, a judgment quashing an indictment against several persons for conspiring to procure the violation of the Sunday liquor law was confirmed by a divided court, where it appeared that they visited several saloons on Sunday for the purpose of procuring a violation of the law, and then informed against the violators with the intention of sharing in the penalty.

In Campbell v. State, 79 Ala. 271, the prosecution was against one who procured the liquor for the 24 L. R. A. consumer, and it was said his guilt could not be greater than that of the buyer, and it would not be pretended that he either sold or aided in the sale provided.

In a case in which it was held unnecessary to name the buyer in the indictment, the court says the statute is "intended to punish those who sell and not those who buy." State v. Hickerson, 3 Helsk. 375.

An indictment for selling is not supported by evidence of a purchase. State v. Miller, 26 W. Va. 106.

But under a statute punishing any person found illegally dealing in intoxicating liquors, the words "illegally dealing" must be taken to include the purchasing as well as the selling; and a person purchasing must be punished for an offense under the statute. McKenzie v. Day [1893] 1 Q. B. 293.

Assisting purchaser.

The general rule is that an agent of the purchaser is subject to no greater liability than the purchaser himself. But there are a few cases in which a special protection is intended to be given to the purchaser by the statute in which aid given to the purchaser has been punished.

Thus in Foster v. State, 45 Ark. 361, it was held that one who purchases liquor for a minor is liable as a seller.

So one who procures liquor for another may be guilty under a statute providing punishment for the sale, furnishing, or giving away of intoxicating liquor. State v. Hassett, 64 Vt. 44.

But passing the money from a slave to the seller was me, and I think George Ray, and Ed. Winters was one, and I think he was the other. Q. Who was the other? A. Cullins. Q. Did you pay anything for it? A. I paid twenty-five cents for my share, and I think the others paid theirs. Q. To whom did you pay it? A. Cullins. Q. What did you call for? A. We didn't call for anything in particular. Cullins spoke up, and said, 'Let's get a pint of whiskey,' and we chipped in and got a pint of whiskey. Q. To whom was that money given? A. Cullins. Q. You say that Cullins went and got this whiskey? A. Yes, sir. Q. How long was he gone? A. Well, I suppose, something like five minutes. Q. Did you inquire where he went? A. No, sir." The defendant, A. D. Cullins, testified as follows: "Q. You heard Mr. Dannenfels's testimony, didn't you? A. Yes, sir. Q. You did go and get some whiskey for him and yourself and some other fellows, didn't you? A. Just as much for myself as for them. Q. Well, did you get that at one of the joints, too? A. I got in a joint, sir. Q. Didn't get it at a drug store? A. No, sir. Q. You can tell what joint you got it at? A. I went to Wolf's, on the John Hess corner. Q. Is that on the east side of Main street, right next to the depot? A. Yes, sir." The court instructed the jury, among other things, as follows: "If you believe from the evidence in the case, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, A. D. Cullins, under either of the counts in this case, did himself sell intoxicating liquor, within two years prior to the filing of the information in this case, without having a permit so to do, within the county of Marion, state of Kansas, or if you believe from the evidence in the case, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, A. D. Cullins did aid or abet in the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors,—that is, by going into a place where intoxicating liquors are sold unlawfully; places spoken of by the witnesses by the name of 'joints,' and known to the defendant as a place where intoxicating liquors are unlawfully sold,—and then and there buy intoxicating liquors with money furnished to him by parties for that purpose, he would be guilty of aiding and abetting in the unlawful sale, and he could be convicted, the same as the principal offender." The jury returned a verdict finding the defendant guilty as charged in the second count. The motion for a new trial was overruled, and exceptions taken. The defendant, upon the verdict, was sentenced to pay a fine of $100 and costs, taxed at $99.25, and to be imprisoned in the jail of Marion county for a period of thirty days. He appeals.

Messrs. Keller & Dean for appellant.

Messrs. John T. Little, Atty-Gen., and C. M. Clark, for appellee:

Whoever purchases liquor at a place where the same is unlawfully sold is guilty of aiding, assisting, and abetting in such unlawful sale, and may be convicted as for making the sale. Logically there is no escape from this conclusion. The vendee solicits the sale, accepts the liquor and pays for it; except for these contemporaneous acts no offense could be committed. He is such a voluntary party to the crime that without him there can be no offense consummated.

State v. Bonner, 2 Head, 136.

Horton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question in this case is whether the purchaser of liquor which is sold in viola-and the liquor from the seller to the slave does not constitute an indictable offense. State v. Hopkins, 49 N. C. 305; State v. Wright, Id. 303.

How far purchaser disqualified as a witness.

Many of the rulings upon this subject have been made in reference to claims on the part of the buyer to be exempt from testifying on the ground that the evidence might tend to criminate him, or objections to the testimony of the buyer as being that of an accomplice, so that the cases are not direct authority as to the liability of the buyer, but may be considered valuable as showing the tendency of the judicial thought in reference to them.

In State v. Rand, 51 N. H. 361, 12 Am. Rep. 127, and Wakeman v. Chambers, 69 Iowa, 169, 58 Am. Rep. 218, it was held that the purchaser cannot be excused from testifying.

A purchaser of liquor cannot be regarded as aiding and abetting the crime so as to be entitled to be relieved from testifying as to the seller's guilt, on the ground that it would tend to criminate himself. State v. Teahan, 50 Conn. 52.

In Com. v. Willard, 22 Pick. 476, it is held that the purchaser may be compelled to testify, and in Ex parte Barker, 30 N. B. 406, and Page v. State, 11 Lea, 302, it is held that for refusal to testify, he may be committed for contempt.

While in State v. Baden, 37 Minn. 212, it is held that the fact that the prosecuting witness was in pursuit of evidence against the seller does not make him an accomplice so as to exclude his evidence, and in Com. v. Downing, 4 Gray, 22, it is 24 L. R. A.

held that, although the liquor is purchased for the express purpose of prosecuting the seller, it is not sufficient to make the buyer an accomplice whose testimony cannot be received.

Upon trial for selling liquor to a slave, who had been sent to buy by his master, who remained in the street outside to see if the seller would violate the law, in which testimony of the master was objected to as that of an accomplice, the court says the statutory offense consists in the act of selling, not in that of buying, and that neither the purchaser nor one participating in the purchase can be made the accomplice of the seller. Harrington v. State, 36 Ala. 236.

Collateral rulings.

As illustrating the policy of the law it has been held that—

A mortgagee of liquors is not so far particeps criminis as to avoid the mortgage and defeat his title. Cobb v. Farr, 16 Gray, 598.

So one who has given the seller credit on account for liquors sold illegally, and settled the account on that basis, may maintain an action to recover back the price. Walan v. Kerby, 99 Mass. 1.

Although the statute merely provided for the recovery back of money paid. Adams v. Goodnow, 101 Mass. 81.

In Yerteau v. Bacon, 65 Vt. 515, a recovery back of the amount paid for liquor was permitted on the ground that it was authorized by statute, although it was intimated that, in the absence of the statute, it could not be done. H. F. F.

tion of law is guilty of unlawfully selling the same; that is, whether, by purchasing, he counsels, aids, or abets in the unlawful sale, and may be convicted in the same manner as if he were the principal. The precedents are against the conviction of the purchaser, although he knows that the circumstances will render the sale of the liquor illegal. 1 Bishop, Crim. L. § 657; Black, Intoxicating Liquors, § 381, and cases cited; State v. Rand, 51 N. H. 361, 12 Am. Rep. 127; Com. v. Willard, 22 Pick. 476. In the last case, Chief Justice Shaw observed: "We know of no case where an act which, previously to the statute, was lawful or indifferent, is prohibited under a small, specific penalty, and where the soliciting or inducing another to do the act by which he may incur the penalty is held to be itself punishable. Such a case, perhaps, may arise, under peculiar circumstances, in which the principle of law, which in itself is a highly salutary one, will apply; but the courts are all of opinion that it does not apply to the case of one who, by purchasing spirituous liquor of an unlicensed person, does, as far as that act extends, induce that other to sell in violation of the statute." In that case a distinction is drawn between cases which are usually considered mala in se, or criminal in themselves in contradistinction to mala prohibita, or acts otherwise indifferent, than as they are restrained by positive law. State v. Bonner, 2 Head, 186, is cited in support of the instruction of the court. In that case it was held to be an offense for a white man to purchase liquor from a slave without a written permit from his master; but that case has been distinguished in Harney v. State, 8 Lea, 113, where it is held that a person who buys liquor sold contrary to the provisions of the statute is not equally as guilty as the seller. It is insisted, however, that as the sale of intoxicating liquors is forbidden in this state by the constitution, excepting for medical, scientific, and mechanical purposes, the purchaser is a participant with the seller in the offense. Notwithstanding the amendment to the constitution prohibiting the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors, the offense of selling intoxicating liquors in violation of the constitution and the statute is an offense mala prohibita, and is not of the class which are considered mala in se. In Iowa, which has adopted a statute prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors similar to our own, it was recently said by the court of that state: "As the prohibitory statute does not provide that the purchaser is guilty of any crime, it seems to us this fact, practically, ends the inquiry. If such had been the intent, it would certainly have been so provided, in express terms. So far from this being so, the implication is clearly the other way. The prohibitory statute does not regard the purchaser an aider and abettor in any criminal act." Wakemsn v. Chambers, 69 Iowa, 169, 58 Am. Rep. 218.

It is further insisted, as the statute expressly provides that the person to whom intoxicating liquors are unlawfully sold shall be a competent witness, and that no person shall be excused from testifying touching any offense committed against the statute tending to criminate himself, but that such testimony shall in no case be used against him, these provisions tend to sustain the argument that a purchaser is equally guilty with the seller. We think otherwise. The first provision adopts the ruling of the courts that the purchaser of intoxicating liquors cannot excuse himself from testifying on the ground that his testimony would tend to criminate himself. The other provision relates to members or shareholders of clubs or associations where intoxicating liquors are kept for the purpose of use or sale as a beverage, making every person directly or indirectly keeping or maintaining such a club or association alike guilty. Sess. Laws 1881, chap. 123, §§ 16, 21; Gen. Stat. 1889, pars. 2536-2540.

Finally, it is insisted that the defendant, upon his own testimony, is guilty of taking or receiving an order for intoxicating liquors, under section 12, chap. 149, Sess. Laws 1885; paragraph 2550, Gen. Stat. 1889. The testimony does not show that the defendant took or received any order for intoxicating liquors, within the provisions of the statute. At most, according to his testimony, he was a purchaser of liquor for himself, and acted as the agent or intermediary of his associates or the other buyers. If the defendant had sold the liquor himself, or if he had acted as agent or clerk for the seller, upon proper instructions to the jury he could have been convicted. If this court should determine that, in prosecutions against parties for the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors, the purchaser is equally guilty with the seller, the statute would be much more difficult of enforcement. Most of the convictions, in prosecutions of this kind, are sustained by the testimony of purchasers; and, if purchasers and sellers are equally guilty, prosecutions will be less successful than heretofore, even if the testimony of the purchasers cannot be used against them.

The judgment of the District Court will be reversed, and cause remanded.

All the Justices concur.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT.

J. M. POLING, Admr., etc., of Charles Swain, Deceased,

v.

OHIO RIVER R. CO., Plff. in Err.

(38 W. Va. 645.)

- *1. A declaration for negligence is good if it contains the substantial elements of a cause of action, the duty violated, the breach thereof, properly averred, with such matters as are necessary to render the cause of action intelligible, so that judgment according to law and the very right of the case can be given.
2. An ex parte map or diagram made by a witness, and shown by him to be correct, may be given in evidence for the consideration of the jury, not as independent evidence, but to be considered by them in connection with other evidence, so as to enable them to understand and apply it.
3. To make an objection made during the trial to the admission of evidence available in the appellate court, the point must be made and properly saved by bill of exception. It is not enough to note the objection in the certificate of evidence.
4. As a general rule, a railroad company is not responsible for the negligent acts of United States postal clerks or agents upon its trains.
5. A railroad company has a platform and mail crane near a postoffice at which the mail train does not stop, but the postal clerk from the mail car, with a "catcher," takes in from the crane the mail pouch suspended thereon, without the train slackening speed. A person who stations himself on the company's land, near the mail crane, for the purpose of witnessing the catch, or for some other purpose of like kind, as a mere voluntary licensee, is subject to the concomitant risks and danger of injury thus assumed, and the company does not owe him the duty of keeping the mail crane in suitable and safe condition. The railroad company is only liable for such wanton injury as may be done to such licensee by the gross negligence of the company, its agents and servants.
6. A defendant who, after the plaintiff has given in his evidence in chief, and rests, then moves the court to instruct the jury to render a verdict for defendant, but, the motion being overruled, goes on with his case, will be held to have waived his exception taken to such ruling of the court.
7. The road surveyor may change any county road in his precinct with the consent of the owner of the land (Code, § 21, chap. 43); and, when any road is altered, the former road shall be discontinued to the extent of such alteration, and no further, and the new one established. Chap. 43, § 32.
8. When the verdict of a jury, viewed according to the ordinary rules of considering the evidence on motion for a new trial, is plainly against the law of the case upon the facts proved, the court, on motion of the party aggrieved, will set the same aside and award a new trial; but not more than two new trials can be granted to the same party in the same cause.

9. A case in which the foregoing rules are applied, and various instructions and rulings are considered and discussed.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Jackson County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the death of his intestate alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mrs. V. B. Archer and D. H. Leonard, for plaintiff in error:

Negligence is the doing of something which, under the circumstances, a reasonable person would not do, or the omission to do something in discharge of a legal duty which, under the circumstances, a reasonable person would do, and which act of commission, or omission, as a natural consequence, directly following, produces damage to another.

Washington v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 17 W. Va. 190.

Negligent omission is the omission to do something in discharge of a legal duty which, under the circumstances, a reasonable person would do, and which act of omission as a natural consequence directly following produces damages to another.

However great the defendant's negligence, if it was committed without violating any duty which he owed either directly to the plaintiff, or to the public, in a matter whereof he had the right to avail himself, there is nothing which the law will redress.

The plaintiff must show a breach of some duty owing to him, or which was imposed for his benefit.

The right of the public in a highway crossing a railroad, is simply a right of passage across the railroad. The public, and no individual thereof, have the right to commit a trespass upon the railroad company's property within the limits of the highway crossing. #### Reargument.

The cause of an injury in the contemplation of law is that which immediately produces it as its natural consequence; and therefore if a party be guilty of an act of negligence, which would naturally produce an injury to another, but, before such injury actually results, a third person does some act which is the immediate cause of the injury, such third person is alone responsible therefor, and the original party is in no degree responsible therefor, though the accident could never have occurred but for his negligence.

Washington v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 17 W. Va. 190.

The action of the mail clerk was an independent action absolutely, wholly, and totally outside the operation of the train, or any part thereof, and he is disconnected with any agent of the company or any of its servants in charge of said train, and absolutely beyond the reach and control of any person connected with the railroad company.

Messrs. N. C. Prickett, James H. Couch, Jr., Charles E. Hogg, for defendant in error:

It is neither usual nor necessary to specify the acts or omissions of the defendant which

To render a railroad company liable for injuries caused by its negligence, it is only necessary that the person injured shall have been free from fault, and that the company shall have failed to perform an obligation which it owed to the public generally, and thereby caused the injury. It is not necessary that the company shall have been guilty of negligence, particularly in its relations to the person injured.

Pennsylvania Co. v. Langendorff, 13 L. R. A. 190, 48 Ohio St. 816.

By placing the crane at a public crossing and on the side of a public highway, it became the duty of the defendant at all times and under any and all circumstances to see that it did not render the highway near thereto and the crossing thereat less safe to the public than before; and whether it did become less safe to the public by reason of its location at such crossing, or by reason of the manner of its construction as a crane, or by reason of its being in bad repair, are all questions for the jury.

Ordinarily the injury of a person at a railway highway crossing raises no presumption that the company has been negligent. Number 4 was instruction properly refused by the court because it assumes, in the main, to settle the very question in controversy by treating it as matter of law, thus drawing from the jury the determination of the facts constituting the negligence, if any, in this case; and further, because it seeks to create a distinction between active and passive negligence, a distinction, if it ever did obtain, that cannot be upheld upon sound principles of law or reason.

It is not for the court to tell the jury what facts constitute negligence.

Where a highway is shown to exist pursuant to law, the burden of showing discontinuance, vacation, or abandonment thereof is upon him who asserts that the public have lost their rights therein.

Elliott, Roads & Streets, 658.

Whether the surveyor accepted this road is wholly immaterial. It was the highway as restored by the railroad company, and it cannot be heard to say in an action like this that this left-hand road—the road offered by it as the restored highway—is not the public highway. If the defendant failed to do its whole duty in the matter of restoring this road to such state as required by law then it was indictable under section 45, chapter 43, of the Code.

State v. Monongahela River R. Co. 87 W. Va. 108.

Where the decedent was standing, whether there was a public road leading from the crossing, on the left, to the river, and whether he was in the line of this road, are properly questions for the determination of a jury.

Wells, Questions of Law and Fact, §§ 255, 261, 267; Kelly Nail & Iron Co. v. Lawrence Furnace Co. 5 L. R. A. 652, 46 Ohio St. 544.

Here the defendant built the left-hand road as and for the public road, and from the time of the construction of the railroad in 1886 until some time in 1887 it was the only road that could be used, and this highway never having been shut up, but kept open and used at all times by foot passengers and by persons traveling on horseback to the river, did not the defendant, under all these circumstances, impliedly extend an invitation to the public to make use of this road? If so, the defendant, when standing therein, was neither a trespasser nor a licensee in the proper sense of the term.

Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Bridges, 74 Tex. 520; Beeman v. Boston & A. R. Co. 147 Mass. 495; Stewart v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (Ind.) 14 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 679; *Taylor v. Delaware & H. That the defendant had ample and full notice of this crane being dangerous by reason of its mal construction there cannot be a shadow of doubt.

If the defendant had notice, or what was equivalent thereto, then it is liable to the plaintiff's decedent, although he may have been on the defendant's premises as a licensee, and not in the public road.

Beach, Contrib. Neg. 2d ed. p. 71, note.

It is wholly immaterial what decedent was doing in the road. Even though he had been engaged in an illegal act the defendant could not interpose this as a defense to its own negligence.

The company must so construct, repair, and improve the crossing as to meet the increasing wants of the public.

Holt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of trespass on the case, brought in the circuit court of Jackson county on 22d March, 1892, by Poling, as administrator of C. Swain, against the Ohio River Railroad Company, for causing the death of his intestate, C. Swain, which resulted in a judgment for plaintiff for $3,000, from which defendant has obtained this writ of error. The assignments of error will be considered somewhat in the order made.

1. The court erred in overruling defendant's demurrer to the declaration. The declaration contains three counts, and the demurrer is to the declaration and to each count. In Hawker v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 15 W. Va. 628, 36 Am. Rep. 825, it is held that a declaration against a railroad company for negligently and wrongfully killing the plaintiff's cattle on its track need not state the acts of omission or commission which constitute the negligence and wrong. It is neither usual nor necessary in this state to specify the acts or omissions of defendant which constitute the negligence. This is matter of proof, and need not be specified in the declaration. It was not specified in the declaration in the case of Blaine v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 9 W. Va. 253, nor in Baylor v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. Id. 270; and the declarations in these cases were held good on demurrer. It is good if it contains the substantial elements of a cause of action; and the demurrer must be overruled, unless there be omitted something so essential to the action that judgment according to law and the very right of the cause cannot be given. But the declaration must set forth the duty which has been neglected, and aver the neglect. Flint & P. M. R. Co. v. Stark, 38 Mich. 714. The essential ground or principal subject-matter of complaint, with such matter of inducement as may be necessary to lead up to or render it intelligible, introduced and averred with time and place in the technical modes of expression suited to the action, was all that was ever necessary under the strictest forms of common-law pleading. The first count avers that plaintiff's intestate lost his life by reason of the negligence of defendant in failing to keep its mail crane in safe condition, decedent being at the time a traveler on the highway, and without fault on his part; giving the circumstances with great particularity. Necessary implications of fact and matters of law need not be averred. It avers that it was defendant's duty to keep at all times a proper and safe mail crane at Douglas station, and that by the neglect of such duty defendant caused his intestate's death; that is, defendant's duty to decedent as a traveler on the highway. The second count avers the duty of defendant to keep its said mail crane and appliances and railroad track safe and free from danger to the traveling public, and to all persons rightfully at or near said crane and railroad; that defendant neglected such duty; that in consequence thereof decedent lost his life while on and near the public road, and without fault on his part. The third count is substantially the same. The averments that the father Newman Swain, sustained damage by reason thereof, may be regarded as impertinent, and therefore may be disregarded as surplusage, as he is not the plaintiff. And the declaration concludes in the usual form: "And thereupon the said plaintiff says that by reason of the premises," etc., "and by force of the statute in such cases made and provided, an action hath accrued to him, as such administrator as aforesaid, to have and demand of and from the said defendant, for and by reason of the grievous wrongs and injuries in said three counts mentioned, damages to the amount of ten thousand dollars, for the uses and purposes in said several counts mentioned, and therefore he brings this suit."

By the statute of this state giving the right of action in such cases, the action is brought by and in the name of the personal representative of such deceased person, and the amount recovered in any such action shall be distributed to the parties and in the proportions provided by law in relation to the distribution of personal estate left by persons dying intestate (Code, §§ 5, 6, chap. 108); damages given not to exceed $10,000, and barred in two years. See Statute of Descents and Distributions, chap. 78. It will be seen by section 10 that to the state shall accrue all the personal estate of any decedent of which there may be no other distributee. It may be that the state would not take; in which event it would certainly not be improper to aver that there are distributees, but not necessary, because it must be assumed that kindred exist, and it need not be averred. Cooley, Torts (2d ed.) top p. 817. The demurrer was properly overruled.

In this case the court has certified all the evidence under section 9, chap. 131, Code, from which the material facts appear to be as follows: In 1886 the defendant company built its road along the Ohio river, through the county of Jackson, where the death of Charles Swain, the subject-matter of this suit, took place. There was an old county road of long standing leading from Douglas landing, in Grant district, on the Ohio river, back to Murrayville, on the turnpike. By order of 18th April, 1886, the county court of Jackson county "granted its consent to the said company to construct, maintain, and operate its railroad across any highway or public road in said districts of Ravenswood, Grant, or Union, in this county, when necessary to do so, but upon the following conditions: That if said railroad company shall, by the building of its said road or otherwise, obstruct any public road in this county, it shall put the road obstructed in as good condition at every crossing of said railroad as it was before the obstruction, and in all other respects according to law." In the fall of 1886 the construction company building the railroad along the Ohio river, at the point called "Lone Cedar," or "Douglas Landing," changed to the old county road, moving it down about 100 feet, made a crossing over the track 16 feet wide, and graded the road from there to Douglas landing, at the river; but the road surveyor refused to receive that part of the road from the railroad to the river. In the winter of 1886-1887 the river washed away the new road next to the river. The road surveyor then had a new road made from the crossing into the old road, on the river side of the railroad, which has been used and worked as the public road, under the direction of the road surveyor, ever since. The land between the railroad and the river at Douglas landing is lying open, unfenced; and the road made by the construction company is also used as a foot path, and for horsemen, but is not worked or recognized as the highway, and, if it had ever been a part of the county road, it had in the spring of 1887 been abandoned, and thenceforward was a mere private path, used by tacit permission of Hall, the landowner. The road made by the construction company, turning to the left, and the new road, turning to the right, separate at the railroad crossing, and come together at the landing on the beach; the distance being only 75 yards. The crossing over the track is 15 feet wide. On the river side of the track, and 8 feet below the 16-foot crossing, the railway company erected a platform and mail "crane," but no other building, called "Douglas Station," where by means of a "mail catcher" on the car, mail pouches could be taken on without stopping or slackening the speed of the train. The mail pouches and the mail catchers attached to the postal cars for taking up mails without stopping the trains are furnished by the United States government mail-equipment division of the postoffice department; but the mail cranes are constructed, erected, and are to be kept in good order by the railroad companies, at their expense. The store where the Lone Cedar postoffice was kept was on the hill side from the railroad, about 180 or 190 feet distant. The deceased, Charles Swain, was an intelligent, sober, industrious, strong, healthy young man; twenty years old, lacking three months; living with his father, Newman Swain, about one and a half miles back in the country from the station in question. Father and son were at the station together on the morning of the accident. The mail train came in about noon, and, not wishing to return until they should get their mail, young Swain, with the consent of his father, went hunting with a young man named George Pickering, who sometimes acted as deputy postmaster at that place. They were hunting near by, on the land of Mr. Hall. Near noon they quit hunting; came down to the railroad, about 75 or 100 feet down the river, below the station; walked up the track to the platform; stayed there five or ten minutes; heard the coming south-bound mail train whistle when a half or three fourths of a mile away; saw the train come in sight about 600 yards off; young

Swain saying, "That is engine No. 16." The two young men then walked across the platform back of the crane, next the river, and stepped on a rise or bank 15 feet from the upright of the mail crane. The mail sack was hanging on the crane when they came up, and they knew that the mail clerk on the approaching train would attempt to catch the sack. The lower arm had been struck by the catcher, and knocked off, about two weeks before. When the mail car came up, the postal clerk caught the mail pouch hanging on the crane, the train running twenty or twenty-five miles per hour, but, on making the catch, struck the lower arm of the mail crane with the hook of the catcher, knocking off the upper part of the lower arm, and hurling it forward, and around against the left breast of young Swain with such force that he took a few steps, fell, and died in a few seconds. The piece of the lower arm broken off, and thrown around and back against young Swain, was large at one end, tapering to a feather edge at the other, which was the explanation given by a witness of the direction in which the blow by the catcher threw it. The decedent had no business with the train; was there simply as a looker-on at the passing mail train. He was not traveling on, or in any way using, the county road. But one of the questions of fact, about which a considerable part of the testimony was given, was whether the point, 15 feet behind the upright part of the crane, to which he walked as the train approached, and where he was standing by the side of Mr. Pickering when he (Swain) was struck and killed, was in the county road or not. It was within the railroad company's right of way. There is a diagram in evidence which shows with great precision where the decedent stood when killed, with reference to these two roads. He was not within the 80 feet of the road running from where the road crosses the rails to the right to the landing at the river, but was within the 80 feet of the road turning to the left, and running to the river at the same point, being 11 feet from the center of the 80-foot right of way, but was not within the 80-foot right of way of the road turning to the right. There is also a diagram showing the location of the mail crane, and also a great deal of evidence as to whether it was a safe and proper appliance. In the present attitude of the case, taking it most strongly for plaintiff, and confining it to plaintiff's evidence, after the verdict of the jury, we must regard it as not an appliance in complete and proper order, to the full measure of what was required on behalf of any one to whom the company owed the duty to see that such appliances under their own control were in full and complete and proper order; otherwise, it would not have been possible to strike the lower arm of the crane with the hook of the catcher. The thing itself speaks, and shows that if the distance between the arms had been greater, or the catcher had been shorter, it would have been impossible for the catcher, no matter at what angle raised, to have struck the lower arm; but it cannot in any proper sense be called a nuisance. It is also shown that if the catcher on the mail car is raised to a horizontal position, or anything near that, it passes through without danger. This is also shown by the very many times it was successfully used without accident, although the lower arm had been struck about two weeks before. The mail agent who made the catch was a young man without experience, who commenced on October 8, 1888, eighteen days before the accident happened; and in the second week of his running on the train the accident occurred. The evidence also shows that the mail crane was on the concave side of a curve, and that there was a loose joint, and there had been a slight wash-out under the track at that point; both having a tendency to swing the train towards the crane.

But one instruction was asked by and given for plaintiff, and to this defendant excepted. For defendant the court gave instructions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 6, 7, and 8, but refused to give defendant's instructions Nos. 4 and 5, and defendant excepted. Plaintiff's instruction is in the words and figures following: "The jury are hereby instructed that if they believe, from the evidence in this case, that the decedent, C. Swain, at the time that he was struck by the piece of the arm of defendant's mail crane, was on the highway leading from a point called 'Douglas Landing' to another point on the Murrayville road, then at the time said Swain was so struck he cannot be considered or held to have been a trespasser on defendant's premises." Defendant's instructions given: "No. 1. The jury are instructed that it is the duty of the plaintiff to make out his case by a preponderance of the evidence. No. 2. The jury are further instructed that negligence is the doing of something which, under the circumstances, a reasonable person would not do, or the omission to do something in discharge of a legal duty which, under the circumstances, a reasonable person would do, and which act of commission or omission, as a natural consequence directly following, produces damages to another. No. 3. The jury are further instructed that if they believe, from the evidence, that the deceased, C. Swain, was using the railroad track or its right of way as a foot path for his own convenience, and that he was not so using said track or right of way at a lawful crossing, and that the said C. Swain received his injury, while he was so using said track or right of way at a place other than a lawful crossing, by the breaking of a mail crane belonging to the Ohio River Railroad, that the plaintiff cannot recover in this case, unless they believe, from the evidence, that the defendant was guilty of wanton or gross negligence." "No. 6. The jury are further instructed that the defendant is not responsible for the negligence of the postal clerks on its postal cars on its road. No. 7. The jury are further instructed that if they believe, from the evidence, that the breaking of the lower arm of the defendant's crane was caused by the failure of the postal clerk to properly adjust the mail catcher on the postal cars for the purpose of catching the mail sack, then the defendant is not liable, and they should find for the defendant. No. 8. The jury are further instructed that if they believe, from the evidence, that the deceased, C. Swain, was a person in the full possession of his senses of seeing and hearing, and also in the full possession of his mental faculties; and if they further believe, from the evidence, that at the time of the accident the said Swain knew that there was danger in standing about the mail crane; and if they further believe, from the evidence, that said mail crane, with the mail sack adjusted thereon, was in plain view, and seen by said Swain; and if they further believe, from the evidence, that the defendant knew that a train of cars was approaching, or would soon approach, the place where said crane was standing; and if they believe, from the evidence, said Swain knew the mail sack would be caught, or an attempt would be made to catch it, by the mail clerk on the train; and if they further believe, from the evidence, that said C. Swain visited the vicinity of said mail crane from curiosity, or for personal convenience, without any reasonable duty calling him there,—that in such case, even although they may believe, from the evidence, that at the time of the accident the deceased was standing in a public road, yet he was guilty of contributory negligence by so standing near a known place of danger, and the jury should find for the defendant." Defendant's instructions refused: "No. 4. The jury are further instructed that if they believe, from the evidence, that the death of C. Swain was caused by the breaking of the lower arm of the mail crane of the defendant; and that if they further believe, from the evidence, that the breaking of the crane was the result of the lower arm being too near to the upper arm,—that in such case the failure to construct such crane with the lower arm further from the upper arm, if it was a duty devolving upon the defendant to so construct, such failure to construct it is only an omission of duty, and, if it is such omission of duty, the plaintiff cannot recover, under the evidence in this case. No. 5. The jury are further instructed that if they believe, from the evidence, that the deceased, C. Swain, was at the time of his death on and about the defendant's platform and mail crane, not as a passenger, or upon any business connected with the railroad company, but merely there for his own convenience or curiosity, or for personal enjoyment, the defendant owed to him no active duty to look out for his protection; and hence, if he was killed by the breaking of a mail crane caused by a passing train, the plaintiff cannot recover on the theory that the defendant has been guilty of negligence by a failure to discharge towards him a legal duty."

The order of the county court of Jackson, as we have seen, permitted the railway company to construct, maintain, and operate the railroad across this public road on condition that, if they obstructed it, it should put the public road in as good condition at the crossing as it was before. But the road made by the company from the crossing down to the landing at the river was not accepted; but Mr. Peters, the road surveyor of the district, notified the parties making it that he objected to it at that place, and would not receive it; nor was it ever received or assented to by him or the county authorities; and after it washed away next to the river, in a few months thereafter, the road from the crossing turning to the right, and going down to the landing, was made by Mr. Hall, the land owner, with the sanction of the road surveyor, and has been worked and used and kept in order by the county as the public road ever since, which includes the time of the accident. By section 21, chap. 43, Code, the surveyor may change any county road in his precinct with the consent of the owner of the land, and, "when any road is altered, the former road shall be discontinued to the extent of such alteration and no further, and the new one established." Code, § 82, chap. 43. So that, if the road turning to the left from the crossing, and running to the river, had ever been a part of the Murrayville and Douglas Landing road, it had been changed by the road surveyor, and thereby discontinued, by the alteration; and the road turning to the right had been thereby established, and was the public road at the time of the accident. Yet the left-hand road was still used by horsemen and footmen, and where the young man stood when struck was on it, giving it a width of 30 feet, and was only 11 feet from the edge of the true public road,—the one turning to the right. Under this state of the evidence, the court cannot say that plaintiff's instruction should have been refused as being abstract, and wholly without evidence on the point; for the two roads coincide at the crossing, and coincide in part opposite where the decedent was standing.

Second error assigned by plaintiff: In admitting the parol evidence of Dr. Davis and others to prove that deceased was in the public road at the time of the accident. It is true that mere user of a road will not make it a public road, under Code, § 31, chap. 43. The user must be accompanied either by an order of the county court recognizing it in some way as a road, or the road must be worked by the road surveyor as such. Still, there was an attempt in this case to show a recognition in both these ways; and I do not think it was error to permit witnesses to testify that it was made by the construction company as a substituted part of a public road, and was used by the public as such for some time.

Third error assigned by plaintiff: In permitting the witnesses D. R. King and others to testify from the plat, Exhibit A, with the record. This was a map or diagram of the place of the accident, showing the relative positions of the railway mail crane, roads, and crossing, and the place where the accident happened, where the young man stood. Though ex parte, it was shown to be correct by a witness who made it, and must have been useful for the understanding of the testimony, and almost indispensable to many of the witnesses in making their testimony readily intelligible to the court and jury. It was used by the witness who made it, in order to explain and apply his own testimony, and make it capable of being understood. It was not offered or used as independent evidence, but for this purpose, and no other. Such use is common in practice, and clearly legitimate. Curtiss v. Ayrault, 3 Hun, 487; Brown v. Galesburg Pressed Brick & Tile Co. 132 Ill. 649. "It was received for the consideration of the jury, so far as it was shown to be correct, in connection with other evidence, and to enable them to understand and apply it, and not as independent evidence." See also Hoge v. Ohio River R. Co. 35 W. Va. 562-564. It is one of the appropriate methods of bringing before the eye of the jury a representation of the things and scenes in which the fact took place, and as an aid in understanding and applying the evidence. See 1 Greenl. Ev. 15th ed. § 82, note.

Fourth error assigned by plaintiff: In admitting illegal evidence, and excluding competent evidence, against the objections of defendant, "as noted in the transcript of the evidence." Under section 9, chapter 131, all the evidence, and not the facts, is certified. The transcript of the evidence is voluminous, and it shows many exceptions "noted" to evidence during the progress of the trial; but no bill of exceptions was taken to such rulings, and the exceptions are therefore taken as waived. It would involve great labor, indeed, to go over a verbatim report of all the evidence as given in, and pick out and consider all exceptions "noted" to questions asked and answers given, permitted, or overruled. The law does not contemplate so easy and compendious a mode of bringing up for review all such rulings of the lower court, nor one so general and indefinite in specification, and involving so much labor on the part of the appellate court. See Gregory v. Ohio River R. Co. 37 W. Va. 606. It must in some way be so set out as to be capable of being easily found and identified.

I have already given the main facts of the case with some fullness of detail, and, because the plaintiff comes to us with a verdict in his favor, from his evidence alone, except where the defendant's evidence is not contradicted. On one point,—a vital one, as the counsel regard it,—Where did decedent stand with reference to a public road when killed?—there is perhaps some evidence tending in a very slight degree to prove the plaintiff's claim in that respect. So, at least, I have regarded it. The principles and rules of law to be applied are involved in the question, Did the railway company owe to decedent any duty of which the violation by the company was the direct and immediate cause of his death, and what points of law, with reference to the rulings complained of, spring up out of the application to the facts of such principles and rules? The principles may be said to be few and simple (the common principles of right and wrong, public policy, and general convenience of that day); but the rules based upon them, and formed by generalizing, more or less, the points decided in the very many cases, are quite numerous and complex. These rulings relate to the instructions asked by defendant, and refused; its motion for a verdict on plaintiff's evidence, and for a new trial, both overruled. These, as far as may be, will be considered together.

The postal clerk who made the catch from the running train was in the service of the United States government; was not in the employ of defendant. He was not the servant or agent of the company; not hired or paid by them, nor subject to their control. A postal clerk is not an employé of the railroad company (Mellor v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 105 Mo. 455, 10 L. R. A. 36), and a railroad company is not responsible for the negligent acts of postal clerks or agents upon its trains (Muster v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 61 Wis. 325, 50 Am. Rep. 141), except under circumstances which need not now be discussed (see Snow v. Fitchburg R. Co. 136 Mass. 552, 49 Am. Rep. 40), and the reason is, the postal clerk is neither the servant nor the agent of the railway company; they had nothing to do with his selection or employment, have over him no supervision or control, and have no power to discharge him; so in no sense could his act be said to be the act of the company. The decedent was a voluntary licensee, one without invitation standing on the side of the defendant's right of way as a trespasser or licensee, for some purpose of his own,—most likely to see the catch made by the passing mail train, or to wait for his companion to get the sack thrown off; evidently not as a servant of the company, for he was in no wise in their service; not as an expectant passenger, for the train did not stop; not to get the sack, for he had nothing to do with the postoffice or mail business; not as using the county road for any purpose, for he was not in it, and had not been using it there that day, and the place to get his mail for which he was waiting, and his direction of travel, was on the other side,—the postoffice, 180 feet away; not as a mere trespasser, unless in a technical sense, for it is fair to infer that he was there with the tacit consent of the company though it does not appear that it was with their knowledge. In Woolwine v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co., 36 W. Va. 329, 16 L. R. A. 271, it was held that such a licensee subjects himself to the risks and perils incident to the place he is in as such licensee, and that no duty is imposed upon the owner or occupant to keep the premises in safe and suitable condition for such person; and the owner is only liable for such willful or wanton injury as may be done to the licensee by the gross negligence of the railroad company, its agents or employes. Was there gross negligence on the part of the company in this case? For such contention there is no foundation that I can see, unless the mail crane was of such a character as to be a common nuisance to those using, or waiting to use, the highway at the crossing. We have already seen that such was not his business there. He was not in the road at the time, had not used it, and the only evidence—that of his companion—shows that they stepped back there 15 feet from the mail crane, to what was evidently supposed to be a safe place, to see the mail train go by, and, we may reasonably infer, to see the catch made of the mail pouch. But, from this evidence, can we fairly say that the mail crane, which it was the duty of the company to put up properly and keep in repair, was a common nuisance? Gross negligence having been branded as an unmeaning, vituperative epithet, the modern tendency is to discard its use, and treat everything under the head of ordinary care, and its correlative, simple negligence. But it would be remarkable to find a few simple and useful gradations in almost all things, and yet none in negligence. It may not be generally useful in practice in the present day; but that is because of the multiplicity of the degrees of negligence, and the unevenness of the grades and subdivisions, and not because there is no such thing as gross negligence. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Arms, 91 U. S. 489, 23 L. ed. 374; Wabash R. Co. v. McDaniels, 107 U. S. 454, 27 L. ed. 605. To say that it is but the violation of the duty of ordinary care required in the case is putting two things of different degrees in one class, by using "ordinary care" as a generic term; and the term "ordinary care" has still to be graded and divided by the jury by the conduct of the prudent man under the circumstances putting themselves in his place, and measuring what is required of him by such circumstances, before it can be applied. Thus supplemented by a sliding scale, and thus made adaptable to measuring in such practical, but indefinite, way, the care required, it is found, no doubt, to be more useful and convenient in the vast majority of modern cases. Nevertheless, this broad and simple classification is, with us, still regarded as useful and convenient in two or more classes of cases. The terms "utmost care" and "slightest negligence," "slight care" and "gross negligence," are still applied, especially in two classes of cases: The former, to common carriers of passengers, as in Farish v. Reigle, 11 Gratt. 697, 62 Am. Dec. 666 (decided in 1854, forty years ago); Virginia Cent. R. Co. v. Sanger, 15 Gratt. 230,—both still leading authorities with us. In this class of cases the common carrier owes to the passenger the duty of exercising more than ordinary—the utmost—care. The latter, to voluntary licensees and trespassers. Woolwine v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 86 W. Va. 329, 16 L. R. A. 271; Spicer v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 84 W. Va. 514, 11 L. R. A. 385. In this class of cases the owner and occupant does not owe the duty of exercising ordinary care; but slight care, so as not to cause wanton injury, and thereby be guilty of gross negligence, discharges the only duty he owes. Where one is liable for the slightest negligence,—for example, to a passenger,—he must take the greatest care. He will be liable for such injury from negligence as the most thorough and conscientious diligence could not have foreseen and prevented. Carrioco v. West Virginia Cent. & P. R. Co. 85 W. Va. 389-399. When one inflicts upon a voluntary licensee a wanton, reckless, heedless injury, he is guilty of gross negligence, and is liable. See Woolwine v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. above. A mere sightseer, on no other business, goes into any one of the large modern factories in operation throughout the civilized world. It requires great care and watchfulness on his part, unfamiliar as he is with such places and things, to avoid danger and escape injury, although the place is reasonably safe and fit, and everything is carried on with due ordinary care; but unless there is wanton injury, the result of gross negligence, the owner is not liable. Why? The owner has set no trap for him; he did not induce, but only permitted, him to come; he is not there on business; the place and appliances belong to the manufacturing company; it was fixed for them and their employees; it suits them; by their knowledge and skill they avoid danger, though to those unskilled and unfamiliar it may be dangerous,—dangerous to any one in fact; but it was not made for, and is not carried on for, any purpose with which the licensee has anything to do; if the injury is not wanton, the negligence is not gross, and the company is not liable, for it owed him no other duty, and that one has not been violated. As appears by the event, a step or two further to the right would have put this unfortunate young man in the highway, and, as it happened, out of harm's way. But I do not see how he can be charged with contributory negligence, except in a very technical or artificial sense. No one would have been likely to anticipate or foresee the danger. He merely assumed the risk, whatever it might be. The risk, perhaps, was not less of his being struck by lightning at that place during a thunder storm; so that I do not see how it can be said that he was guilty of contributory negligence in any proper, or at least natural, sense. If he had been a traveler at that place, just a step or two on the company's right of way, and off the public road, and perhaps a technical trespasser, but a traveler, waiting to cross the track at the crossing, I am not prepared to say that the company would not have been liable, because they would then have owed him the duty of ordinary care. See Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 254; Sanders v. Reister, 1 Dak. 151; Murray v. McShane, 52 Md. 217, 36 Am. Rep. 367. Or if he had been in the highway, where he had a right to be, without business, at a safe distance from the passing train, and the mail crane was so imperfect and dangerous as to be a common nuisance, being so close to the public road, then they would be guilty of gross negligence, and liable; but in our view this case is neither of these. Besides, it may be said that there was in this case an intermediate efficient cause of the injury between it and the having there the imperfect, and in some degree dangerous, mail crane.

Did this mail crane unlawfully obstruct or render dangerous this highway and crossing to the extent of making it a nuisance? The only description made of it, and criticism made upon it, on the part of plaintiff's witnesses, is made by Mr. Vosburg, evidently a correct and very intelligent man, a civil engineer by profession, who was on the ground, and examined and made his measurements thirteen months after the accident happened, who says, in constructing cranes:

"I have no experience at all." "What do you know about them?" "Not anything at all." He had observed others, but this was the only one he ever measured or directed his attention to particularly. That you could not change the distance between the arms, and keep them parallel, without changing the length of the mail pouch. The post-office department made the specifications for both sacks and arms, and furnished the pouches and the catcher. That if the sack is changed, and made longer, the outer end of the lower arm must be lowered, and the fastened end ought to be. In answer to the question, "Is it possible for the mail clerk to make these catches in the condition in which you found it?" answered, "Possibly; yes, sir; because the evidence is that he made them for a long time while in that condition." And the evidence on the side of defendant on this point is that, with ordinary skill,—and it took but little,—the catcher can be raised parallel with the floor of the car, with the rod that runs between the doors from side to side; that, when brought to about that position, there is no danger of striking either the lower or upper arm of the mail crane, but, if the mail clerk should delay elevating this catcher into proper position until he was too near the crane, then he would be liable to strike the lower arm in putting it into position. For diagram of mail crane, see Postal Laws and Regulations 1887. By change in length of mail pouches, we may infer the lower arm was dropped at the outer end about 18 inches out of a line parallel with the upper arm; and this made the striking of the lower arm with the catcher possible. I do not think this crane could be pronounced a nuisance; but, if it were such, the decedent was not in the highway, but on the defendant's right of way,—a place he selected with his eyes open, with all his faculties unimpaired and in full play, for the purpose of seeing the catch made, or for some purpose of like kind.

Defendant's Assignments of Error Nos. 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9. Exception No. 7, to the giving of plaintiff's one instruction, has already been considered. It cannot be said that there was absolutely no evidence tending in any appreciable degree to show that the decedent was not a trespasser or voluntary licensee on defendant's premises; for he was standing in a place that had once been dug and used as a road, though afterwards altered by the road surveyor, and thus discontinued. For a still stronger reason, defendant's motion to direct the jury to return a verdict for defendant was properly overruled. Where the party is guaranteed the right of trial by jury, especially in cases of negligence, which are, for the most part, peculiarly cases of fact, and therefore such cases are peculiarly within the province of the jury, such direction is only proper in a few cases so plain that there is no room for two opinions. It stands on ground wholly distinct from a motion for a new trial; though the latter, in one of its reasons, often comprehends the former,—as where the case is wholly without evidence as to some essential fact. It saves time, trouble, and expense, is sometimes all that can be said in this favor. But here the defendant waived this exception by going on with his case. If he intends to save it, he must submit his case to court or jury without further evidence. He (the defendant) has appealed to the court to end the case, as matter of law, then and there, for defect of proof. He can go to the jury at that stage, his motion being overruled, or he can waive his exception, and go on with the case, take his chance before the jury, and, if losing, move for a new trial, which is more comprehensive; but is not permitted to take all these chances, and, in addition, skip his own evidence, which may have supplied the defect in plaintiff's case, put himself back where plaintiff rested, and he made his motion as if he had taken the hazard of submitting his case at that point. The six instructions given for defendant he cannot complain of, and they need not be considered, except as to any bearing they may have upon the question of the refusal of instructions Nos. 4 and 5. As a general rule, it may be affirmed that omissions, unless when involving the nonperformance or malperformance of a positive duty, are not the subject of suit. Wharton, Neg. § 83. But otherwise, when the omission is the defect in the discharge of a legal duty; for it is of the essence of negligence to omit to do something that ought to be done. Id. § 83. Instruction No. 4 was properly refused. If the negligence of the defendant in failing to construct a proper crane was the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff, and it owed the decedent the duty to see that it was a safe appliance, it is of no consequence whether it be omission or commission. See Harriman v. Pittsburgh, O. & St. L. R. Co., 45 Ohio St. 11, and other cases cited; Bench Contrib. Neg. § 25, note 2. It depends on the question whether defendant owed decedent any duty or not, under the circumstances; and although the thing complained of may help to determine that question by reason of its nature, as that it was an omission, yet that does not furnish the true criterion of liability, and the plaintiff might still be entitled "to recover under the evidence in this case." No hypothetical state of facts being stated, this instruction treats the question of negligence as a question of law, to be determined by the court "under the evidence in the case," or as a question of law and fact, to be thus determined by the court, and for that reason also is bad. Plaintiff's instruction No. 5 was also properly refused. While apparently putting the fact of decedent being on or about defendant's platform and mail crane as the hypothetical fact, inter alia, out of which the court is to tell the jury the given legal point arises, such fact is really assumed; and the fact that he was not there as a passenger, etc., but for his own curiosity, etc., is the real hypothetical fact of the instruction. "About defendant's platform and mail crane?" Where is that? The counsel on both sides have made a difference of 10 or 12 feet in the location of the county road, near and about the platform and mail crane, the crucial point in the case; and both locations are equally comprehended in the fact assumed by the court, and may be said to be the one controverted fact. In such a case, "around and about" is also too indefinite. If the instruction was intended to raise the point that it made no difference whether the place where the young man stood was on the company's right of way, and not in the county road, or in the county road, and not on the right of way, then it is obscure and confusing, and should have been framed differently. Baltimore v. Poulinney, 25 Md. 34; Bellevue v. R. Co. v. Snyder, 24 Ohio St. 678. See also Morse v. Gilman, 18 Wis. 385; Hughes v. Monty, 24 Iowa, 501,—all cited to sections 466, 467, Wells, Questions of Law & Fact. And an indirect assumption of this fact, as in this case, is condemned on the same principle; for it also throws the weight of the case upon a part of the evidence or facts, instead of putting it upon all. See Wells, Questions of Law & Fact, § 477; Roots v. Tynor, 10 Ind. 87, cited.

These things being believed from the evidence, the jury is told the defendant owed decedent no active duty to look out for his protection. Then it adds, "And hence, if he was killed by the breaking of a mail crane caused by a passing train, the plaintiff cannot recover on the theory that the defendant has been guilty of negligence by a failure to discharge towards him a legal duty." I think the instruction, as a whole, calculated to confuse and mislead the jury, and, if not argumentative, it suggests the implication that plaintiff may be entitled to recover on some other ground than that of being guilty of negligence. It also involves the question of active duty, which has already been considered. The defendant might be liable for an injury to one traveling in a highway, directly caused by a nuisance close by, without reference to the character of the duty, whether active or passive. He may put up some structure so near as to render the lawful use of the public road dangerous. He, it may be said in the first place, owed the passive duty not to put it up, and when he put it up he violated that duty by an act of commission. Second. Being up, he owed the active duty to look out for and guard against the party's injury from such nuisance. Besides, instructions No. 8 and No. 8 covered the same state of facts in all material points, and were given, being based on the law as laid down in Spicer v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 34 W. Va. 514, 11 L. R. A. 385.

I regard this case as ruled by the law as laid down in the case of Woolwine v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co., 36 W. Va. 329, 16 L. R. A. 271, and the case, just cited, of Spicer v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co., and do not think it can be distinguished as to the controlling elements of law and fact, or withdrawn from their decisive influence.

I need scarcely add, from what has already been said, that the facts, taken at their strongest, according to the rules in such cases, do not justify the verdict. The evidence of plaintiff, taking it all as true, with all fair and reasonable inferences, together with the uncontradicted evidence of defendant, proves nothing from which the jury could reasonably infer that defendant had violated any duty which it owed to plaintiff's intestate, or was guilty of any negligence for which plaintiff is entitled to recover, but is plainly insufficient to warrant such finding. The verdict is against the law of the case upon the facts proved, and must therefore be set aside. Judgment and verdict set aside, and new trial awarded.

Reversed and remanded.

On Rehearing.

This unfortunate young man, when so unexpectedly struck by the sliver from the lower arm of the mail crane, was standing 15 feet from and back of, the upright supporting the arms, and not in any road, but on the land or right of way of defendant. The left-hand road running from the railroad crossing to the landing on the Ohio river was made by the construction company, was not only not received or adopted as a part of the county road by the road surveyor, but on the contrary, was expressly refused and repudiated, and soon after was washed away at the river. The land owner, by the sanction and direction of the road surveyor, made what is called the "right-hand" road, which was adopted and worked as the only road leading from the crossing to the river in existence at the time of the accident; and in this he was not standing, but on the land of the defendant. He was not there on the invitation of defendant, or on business of any kind with it; not to become a passenger, for the train did not stop; and he was not in defendant's employ. He was there simply as a looker-on, to see the mail train go by, and the mail agent make the flying catch of the mail pouch. Therefore he was a mere trespasser, or, at best, a voluntary licensee. The company made no change to endanger him after he came. It owed him no duty that was violated. For although, in the present attitude of the case, I take for granted that the mail crane was not of the best construction, but must have been in some respect defective, yet it was not a public nuisance; for it had been frequently used with safety, and successfully, both before and immediately after this accident, without harm or danger to any one, unless it was dangerous to the one using it. It was a case in which the unexpected happened, and its liability to happen could not be foreseen, and is only proved by the actual happening (see Richards v. Rough, 53 Mich. 212; Sjogren v. Hall, 53 Mich. 274; Cooley, Torts, 92, note 1), and therefore a case of damage without injury; at least, so far as defendant is concerned. Moreover, the one who made the catch, knocking the sliver off the lower arm of the mail crane, was the mail agent of the United States government, not in the employ or subject to the orders or under the control of defendant, and, if there was any negligence at all, it was his intervening and breaking the usual connections; for, in law, it is not the remote, but the proximate, cause which is looked to and regarded as the real cause. See Washington v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 17 W. Va. 190.

That these are the facts as they indisputably appear in this record, there is, in my opinion, no sort of doubt, and, from the application of the appropriate principles and well-settled rules of law, it is equally clear that the defendant did not appear to be liable, and a new trial should have been granted; for it has long been as much the duty of the court, in certain cases, to set verdicts aside, as it is the duty, in general, of juries to find them. Verdicts like this include legal propositions, as well as propositions of fact, and the power must reside somewhere to grant new trials; for it is absolutely essential to justice that there should, on many occasions, be opportunities of reconsidering the cause by a new trial. See Bright v. Eynon, (1757), 1 Burr. 391, 394. Here the verdict is against the law of the case upon the facts proved, and is therefore set aside, and a new trial awarded.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

Maggie RAINES, Admx., etc., of John D. Raines, Deceased, Plff. in Err.,

v.

OHESAPEAKE & OHIO R. CO.

(.....W. Va.....)

- *1. Each case must depend upon its own facts in determining what shall constitute ordinary care or reasonable prudence in the running of a railroad train.
2. When a given state of facts is such that reasonable men may differ upon the question whether there was negligence or not, the determination of the matter is for the jury.
3. But, when the facts are such that all reasonable men must draw from them the same conclusion,—when there is no room for two reasonable opinions about it,—then it becomes a question of law for the court.
4. If an apparently capable person, and one apparently in the possession of his faculties, is seen walking on a railroad track, the servants of the company running the train, having given such signals as are required, have a right to act on the presumption that such person will step aside in time to remove himself from danger.
5. If those running a railroad train discover a trespasser in imminent danger on the track, they must use all reasonable exertions to avoid inflicting injury; otherwise, the company will be responsible.
6. But, if they omit no duty after becoming aware of his danger, the railroad company will not be responsible for such injury.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Kanawha County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful killing of plaintiff's intestate by reason of the negligence of defendant's servants. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. Willis Wilson, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Simms & Enslow and J. E. Chilton, for defendant in error.

Headnotes by Holt, J.

Holt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of trespass on the case, brought in the circuit court of Kanawha county in February, 1892, by Maggie Raines, administratrix, against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company, for negligently causing the death of her husband and intestate, John B. Raines, which suit resulted in a judgment for defendant from which she has obtained this writ of error.

The declaration contains two counts, both good, and the demurrer of defendant was therefore properly overruled. The issue was joined on plea of not guilty. A jury was impaneled and sworn, and having heard the evidence of plaintiff in full, the court on motion of defendant, struck out plaintiff's evidence, and the jury, by direction of the court, returned a verdict for defendant. The plaintiff excepted to the ruling of the court excluding her evidence, and moved the court to set aside the verdict and grant her a new trial; but the court overruled the motion, and gave judgment and certified the evidence, as required by our present statute. Code 1891, p. 884, chap. 181, § 9.

Seven witnesses were examined on behalf of plaintiff, none for defendant, and the facts are in substance as follows: The town of Montgomery, where the accident happened, contains from 1,500 to 2,000 people; is about one mile long on each side of defendant's railway, where the company has a station, a yard for storing cars, and five tracks running from the station west to the lower end of the town, with spaces between wide enough to put a footman out of danger, and a county road running along near by on either side,—the one on the south side at a distance of about 150 yards. The one on the north side of the tracks is quite close, and is the main street of the town, being about 50 feet from the track where Raines was killed. The track is straight there, and a footman on it could be seen for a long distance by the train going east. No houses were along the track where Raines was killed. Adjoining the town above and below are the coal valley and the coal mines; and for some fifteen years or more footmen have been accustomed to use the track and travel along it without objection, it being often thus used in dry weather as well as when it is muddy. On September 25, 1891, about 5-o'clock in the evening, No. 2, the east-bound passenger mail train, with four or five cars, being on schedule time, and running at its usual speed,—at about twenty miles per hour at that point,—came in sight and hearing at the lower or west end of the town, blowing one prolonged whistle for the crossing, and one for the station. As it entered the railway yard at the west end, the steam was shut off, and it ran on at a speed of fifteen or twenty miles per hour by its previous momentum. Raines, the decedent, was walking slowly on the main track in the railway yard about 200 yards east of the lower or western limit of the town, and 400 to 500 yards west of the station, about 600 yards above Morris creek bridge, 200 yards above a crossing at the lower end of the town, with his back towards the coming train, and a paper in his hand, as though he were reading or looking at it. When the coming train got within 20 or 30 feet, or some other short distance, the engineer blew the alarm,—four or five quick whistles,—put on brakes and steam, reversed the engine, and at once did all he could to save him. "The engine checked considerably," but passed on about a length of the train before stopping, but struck and killed Raines, who was walking in front, towards the depot.

NOTE.—For limitation of the rule that engineers may presume that persons on railroad track will get off in time to avoid injury, see Clark v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. (N. C.) 14 L. R. A. 749. See 24 L. R. A.

"The fact that pedestrians are accustomed to travel on a railroad track at a particular place makes it the duty of the servants of the company to exercise greater caution and prudence in the operation of its road at that place." Nuzum v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. 30 W. Va. 228. This point of law arose out of the following facts: The servants of a railway company having in charge of one of its engines and trains running within the corporate limits of Wheeling, to and over a public wharf therein, failed or neglected to give notice, at least sixty rods before its approach to the wharf, by ringing the bell or blowing the whistle of the locomotive for a sufficient time to give notice of its approach thereto. It was in fact what is called a "flying switch" of the freight train, which ran down and killed the deceased on the track. And the court in the same case further holds, "that if such company permit a train of its cars to be moved at that place without having some of its servants in position to give warning of its approach and to control its movements, these facts are of themselves acts of negligence." Ibid. "A person using a railway track as a footpath for his own convenience elsewhere than at a lawful crossing, and injured while so doing, cannot recover damages of the railway company unless it be guilty of wanton or gross negligence." Spicer v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 34 W. Va. 514, 11 L. R. A. 885. A railway company running its train is bound, for the safety of such train, to keep a reasonable lookout for trespassers on its track, and is bound to exercise such care as the circumstances require, to prevent injury to such trespasser; but having given the signal required by law, it has a right to presume that the trespasser, apparently a capable person, will exercise his senses, and seasonably remove himself from danger,—that he can, and will protect himself,—so it need not diminish its lawful speed, and, if they omit no duty after becoming aware of his peril, the road will not be responsible for a resulting injury; but if they know him to be deaf or helplessly drunk, or otherwise specially in danger, or if the person be a child too young to appreciate or avoid the danger, and if they neglect a reasonable warning, but keep on and inflict damage, the road will be responsible for an injury to such trespasser if it be guilty of willful or wanton or gross negligence. See Spicer v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. supra; Bishop, Non-Cont. L. § 1037; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Sherman, 30 Gratt. 603-629; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Harman, 83 Va. 554, citing with approval 2 Wood, Railway Law, 1267. See 2 Wood, Railway Law (Minor's ed. 1894) § 320.

Trespassers on railroad tracks are of various kinds, differing in the character of the trespasser, as one having his full senses, one deaf or blind; differing in intent, as intentional or accidental; differing in place or in time or in other material circumstances, as being at a remote place where the trespass is not to be anticipated, or in cities or towns or at other thronged places, where they occur as of course, sometimes under allurements which the road itself has held out, or with its silence, amounting to a quasi consent, if the trespasser is willing to take the risks, but creating no right in the public to so use it, and creating thereby no obligation of special care or protection other than what the special circumstances may require. It has long been settled as a qualification of the general rule making contributory negligence a bar in defense that the contributory negligence of the party injured will not defeat the action if it appear that the defendant might, by the exercise of reasonable care and prudence on his part, have avoided injuring the plaintiff, notwithstanding the plaintiff's own contributory negligence, and, as a corollary, the same doctrine has been applied in cases of trespass. Both are but applications of the common-law doctrine that every one must so conduct himself, and so use his own, as not to injure another. Hence, "if those running a train discover a trespasser in danger, they must use all reasonable care, and all reasonable exertions, to avoid inflicting injury, and to avert from him the impending harm, or the road will be responsible for whatever injury follows." See Bishop, Non-Cont. L. § 1036, and cases cited. In Butterfield v. Forrester (1809) 11 East, 60, Lord Ellenborough, Ch. J., says, delivering the opinion: "A party is not to cast himself upon an obstruction which has been made by the fault of another, and avail himself of it if he do not himself use common and ordinary caution to be in the right. In cases of persons riding upon what is considered to be the wrong side of the road, that would not authorize another purposely to ride up against them. One person being in fault will not dispense with another's using ordinary care for himself,"—which is a statement of the rule by giving an illustration, and impliedly of the principle which underlies it. The railroad sounded the whistle for the crossing just at the lower end of the town, and for the station in the town 200 yards below where Raines was killed. It was on schedule time, running on the main track at the usual speed. Wheth. &

the engineer saw Raines on the track or not there is no direct evidence; but as this case is presented, we may presume that in such a place, the engineer and fireman being on the lookout for the safety of the train, if not for his safety, did see him, for the track was straight for three-fourths mile. But to all appearances he was an adult man, capable of using his senses, and they had a right to suppose that he would, in proper time, get off the track out of danger,—that he would reasonably step aside,—so that they are not called upon to and need not stop the train or diminish their speed. This seems to me to be the plain dictate of common sense. I do not see what other fair rule could be adopted, and it is supported by all the authorities without exception, as far as I have been able to examine them. That he had at same time a paper in his hand looking at it, or reading it, holding it in front of him, was not likely to be noticed by the engineer, or if noticed was of no special significance; and when they came near enough to see that the man might not be aware of his danger, then they did all that could be done to notify and alarm him, and to stop the train, but to no purpose; and this might readily happen under such circumstances without any want of proper care on their part. Witnesses of some distance speak of the quickly repeated alarm whistle being blown when the train was within a distance of 20 or 30 feet, the air brakes being put on, and the engine reversed, and the "engine considerably checked."

There is in every case a preliminary question for the judge to determine, and that is, assuming the truth of the testimony and all the inferences that can be fairly drawn from it, would the jury, as reasonable men, be justified in finding a verdict for the party on whom rests the burden of proof? Would the verdict be against the law? That is, would a verdict for plaintiff be against the law of the case on the facts proved? Would the verdict be wholly without proof of some essential fact? Or is the evidence plainly insufficient to warrant the finding of a verdict for the plaintiff? There are certain physical facts which are to my mind conclusive that the statement that Raines was only 20 or 30 feet ahead of the train when the engineer commenced to blow the alarm whistle and stop the train is only a mere conjecture, meaning only that the distance was very short. Five witnesses saw it. The first one was 800 yards away. The train could go 20 feet while the sound of the whistle was reaching him. They whistled three or four times. Witness No. 2 on this point was about 100 yards away. He saw the train running at its usual speed at that place—15 or 20 miles an hour—with four or five cars. When within 20 feet of Raines they sounded the alarm whistle four or five times, put on the brakes, reversed the engine, and checked it considerably before it struck the man. The engineer did all he could to save him, but Raines was too close. The train ran on 65 steps—195 feet—beyond the place where Raines was struck before it stopped. He blew the whistle, turned on the air brakes, and reversed the engine before it struck him, and then went sixty-five steps. Witness No. 3 was 120 feet 24 I. R. A.

away. Heard the whistling. Turned his head immediately, and looked towards the train, and saw the man going over about four times. He gives no distance except that measured by the time of turning his head after he heard the whistle. In all likelihood the air brake was put on and the engine reversed first. Witness No. 4 gives no distance except that it was short,—so short that he could not escape. She was but a short distance away. She is the one who speaks of Raines having a paper in his hand, but refused absolutely to say whether it was large or small. Witness No. 5 was about 100 yards away. Heard the whistle blow three or four times in quick succession, which attracted his attention to it. Raines was a very short distance from the train; cannot make it more definite. He saw nothing in his hand. His head was down. He looked something like a drunken man. He saw him walking on the track after the train whistled. All this means that he was too close for the train to be stopped before it would strike him. As to anything like the accurate distance, this evidence, as a whole, leaves it uncertain. The train was going 50 or 60 feet in three seconds. It is not at all probable that Raines was only 20 feet ahead of the train when they commenced applying the air brake, reversing the engine, and blowing the alarm. Raines had lived in that place at least three years. The train was on schedule time, running through the train yard at its usual rate of speed. There were safe walking ways on either side. He had but to step right or left to be out of danger. He was possessed of sight and hearing; nothing unusual in his appearance. The prolonged whistle had sounded twice a short distance below,—once for a crossing, and once for the depot. The engineer had a right to presume that he would seasonably step out of danger, and not until he got quite close did he become aware that the man was insensible of his peril. Then he did all he could to save him, but to no purpose; he was too close. I know of no rule, and can find no case, making it the duty of the engineer, under such circumstances, not to approach a man walking on the track nearer than the distance within which the train can be stopped,—say 200 feet in this case. See Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Miller, 25 Mich. 279; 2 Wood, Railway Law (Minor's ed. 1894) § 320, p. 1465. Under such circumstances, to exact of the engineer nice estimates of distance, based on the supposition that the man walking on the track may not be sensible of his danger, and will not step off, seems to me to be unreasonable.

The action of the court in striking out the evidence has been held to be an indirect mode of directing the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, the plaintiff not being willing to suffer a nonsuit. Here it was accompanied by an express direction to return a verdict for defendant. I can discover but the one question involved. Does the evidence tend, in any fairly appreciable degree, to make out plaintiff's case? I am of opinion that it does not; that it was what is termed in law "an inevitable accident;" and although the question of negligence is generally one of fact for the jury, yet "when the facts are such that all reasonable men must draw the same conclusion from them, then it becomes a question of law for the court." See Grand Trunk R. Co. of Canada v. Ives, 144 U. S. 408, 36 L. ed. 485, and cases cited. There is no room for two fair-minded, reasonable opinions about it. See Corcoran v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 105 Mo. 399. The evidence in this case is plainly insufficient to warrant the finding of a verdict for the plaintiff, and the court could not have hesitated to have set it aside. See Gruyson's Case, 6 Gratt. 712-724.

On rehearing.

The evidence in this case, explained and qualified, as it must be, by certain well-known physical laws, shows to a high degree of probability, at least, that the engineer commenced applying the air brakes, reversing the engine, and blowing the alarm before the train reached a point 20 or 30 feet distant from the footman on the track. As to anything like the accurate distance, this evidence, as a whole, leaves it uncertain, but it does show clearly that the train was then much too close to be stopped before striking him; but I take the distance to have been 20 or 30 feet, for they are the figures used by some of the witnesses. So, also, I take the fact to be that footmen at that place were accustomed, with the knowledge of defendant, to use the track as a walkway; and the rule of law (pro hac vice) to be that in such case it was the duty of the engineer or fireman to keep on the lookout along the track, and that the engineer was on the outlook, and did see decedent walking on the track towards the depot for a long distance. John B. Raines, the decedent, had lived in town about three years. About 5 o'clock in the evening of the 25th of September, 1891, he was walking eastward on the track, using it as a footpath for his own convenience, as many persons are in the habit of using it. He had in his hand a piece of paper, looking at it now and then. The size of the paper does not appear. He was in fact an adult, in the full possession of all his faculties, or so, on this occasion, he was in appearance. Defendant's east-bound passenger train, consisting of locomotive, tender, and five cars, running on schedule time at its usual rate of speed—of about 20 miles an hour—at that place, came in sight and hearing at the lower end of the town, and whistled for a crossing at that point, heard by the witnesses. Again, about 150 yards from decedent, it gave a prolonged whistle for the depot. The steam was turned off for it to run by momentum to the station. There was nothing at that time to indicate to the engineer that decedent was unaware of the approaching train, and would not in due time step off the track. This the engineer had a right to presume he would do. But, still making no motion to get off, the engineer sounded the alarm, put on the air brakes, and reversed the engine,—did all that could be then done to save him; but he was only 20 or 30 feet ahead, and, although the train was perceptibly checked, Raines was struck and instantly killed.

Common sense and common justice, applied to the practical affairs of managing railroads and running trains, require that there must be left to engineers some margin for forming their judgment, which may still be discreet, and some latitude of conduct which may, in either event, be held to be prudent. He will not, on pain of conviction of negligence in a matter involving life and limb, be held to make, on the spur of the moment, a nicely accurate estimate of the probability that one walking on the track is insensible of his danger, from the mere fact that he is on the track within a distance within which the train cannot be stopped; for common observation shows that persons fully aware of the approach of the train cross the track, or fail to step off, although the train may be within such distance, for one second or a half second in time, and two steps or three in distance, will put him out of danger. In this case the footman was a grown man, apparently in the use of his faculties, physical and mental. He had a signal of danger beneath his feet. The train was on time. A signal had been sounded half a mile away. The depot was in plain view in front. A prolonged signal for the depot had just been sounded 500 feet in his rear. He is presumed to look back as well as forward, and that he will act on the instinct of self-preservation and step out of the way. Under such circumstances, negligence of the engineer cannot be reasonably inferred. It was a case of unavoidable accident, such as no degree of foresight and care on the part of the engineer could reasonably be expected to anticipate in time to avoid. How was he to know that the footman was unconscious of his approach? There was nothing to indicate it. On the contrary, he presumed, as he had a right to do, that the footman would step off in time. Nor was there anything as yet to require the engineer to change his opinion, and act thereon in time to stop the train before collision. These facts, as I read the evidence, are not doubtful, nor are the inferences of fact to be drawn from them. I concur in the opinion of the circuit court that they do not tend in any fairly appreciable degree to convict the engineer of want of ordinary care. The case therefore passed from the domain of fact, in the sense of a thing to be found by the jury, into the domain of law, to be determined by the court. A verdict for the plaintiff would have been against law; that is, against the law of the case upon the facts proved. Therefore the circuit court did not err in refusing to submit the case to the jury.

Dent, J., dissenting:

The facts in this case are as follows, to wit: The deceased was a trespasser on the track of the defendant within the corporate limits of the town of Montgomery (1500 population) at a place the people were in the habit of using as a walkway. It was about 5 o'clock P. M.,—the time for the regular passenger train. An engine had but a few moments before passed over the track. Deceased was walking with his head down, apparently absorbed in studying some paper. He was going east with his back to the approaching train. The train whistled for the station from 100 to 200 yards from deceased. The engineer, if looking, could have seen deceased from the time he sounded the whistle for the station until the engine struck him, as the track was straight, the view unobstructed, and it was broad daylight.

The bell was not rung, nor the whistle sounded, from not less than 100 yards away until the engine was within less than 80 feet of deceased and about to strike him,—too late for him to step out of danger as the train was going at the rate of 20 miles per hour. Did the engineer see deceased? It was his duty to see him. Others saw him who were not bound to see him, and not occupying as good a position to see him as the engineer. The law will presume that the engineer discharged the duty to and did see him, unless the contrary appear. At least the jury, in the light of the evidence, from the facts and circumstances, would have the right to infer that he, being a man of ordinary intelligence, attentive to his duties, did see him. Such being the case, what was his duty,—to wait until it was too late, or sound the alarm whistle and ring the bell in time to arouse the deceased, and enable him to avoid the threatened danger? In 2 Rorer on Railroads, 1027, the law is stated to be as follows, to wit: "The servants in charge of a train have a right to presume that a man on the track is of sound mind and good hearing, and will get off in time to avoid danger, . . . and that, therefore, the train is not obliged to stop, but is only bound to the ordinary care of warning by whistling and bell ringing, if the person is seen by persons in charge of it, which are due to all persons on general principles. This done in time for avoiding the danger, the company is not liable." And in Finlayson v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 1 Dill. 579, Fed. Cas. No. 4,798, the law is stated to be: "A railroad company whose train is approaching a man walking lengthwise upon its track, must ring its bell and sound its whistle in time to enable him to get off the track; otherwise it is liable." (The italics are mine.) "If they, being aware of his presence, delayed to ring the bell and sound the whistle until he could not have stepped aside and saved himself, in that case there was negligence on the part of these employees, for which the railroad company is liable." "If they rang the bell and blew the whistle in such time as any reasonable man of good hearing could have heard it, and got off instantly, then the defendants are not liable." "This man had no right to be there, and he should not have been there. It does not follow, however, because he was there unlawfully, that the other party could run him down." Numerous, nay all the cases examined by me, present the law in the same way, even including the fourth syllabus in this case, which is in these words, to wit: (4) "If an apparently capable person, and one apparently in the possession of his faculties, is seen walking on a railroad track, the servants of the company running the train having given such signals as may be required, have a right to act on the presumption that such person will step aside in time to secure himself from danger." What signals were required? The court does not state, but presumes they were given. The law quoted says the bell must be rung and whistle sounded in time to warn the deceased of his danger, and enable him to step aside to avoid it. That this was not done, the evidence plainly establishes; but the servants of the defendant, having the deceased in plain view for over 100 yards, bore down upon him until it was too late, and then, as a wild animal sure of its prey, rushed upon him with the whistle sounding, as if to make his death the more horrible when it was too late to save him. My conclusion, supported by reason, justice, and authority, is that it was the duty of the engineer, under the circumstances, on discovering the deceased on the track 100 yards away, to begin sounding the alarm whistle and ringing the bell, and continue the same until the attention of the deceased was attracted or he was struck. In not doing so he was guilty of wanton sacrifice of human life, amounting to gross negligence. He disregarded the ordinary rule of all railroad companies: "In all cases of doubt, take the side of safety." It may be a hardship on the company to impose damages on them in such cases; but there is no other way to reach its negligent employees, and enforce a due regard for the law and the lives of citizens, except through the company. The first, the highest, and most important duty of all law is the protection of human life from unnecessary destruction; and he who destroys it should be prepared and required to show that he used all available and lawful means at his command, and, after doing so, the destruction was unavoidable. While the law regards a railroad track to be the private property of the company, and the use thereof as dangerous and perilous, yet it lies open to the commons, and affords a dry, smooth, even, level, and convenient walkway for pedestrians, especially in populous communities, and is therefore a source of great temptation to the public. The law, in permitting railroad companies to rush their trains through the country at a great rate of speed, requires them to adopt the necessary means to warn trespassers out of their way in time for them to escape death. The ringing of the bell and sounding of the whistle are not matters of much exertion; neither do they in any way interfere with or impede the running of trains. In this case there is a powerful and wealthy corporation on the one hand, with numerous and influential friends, and a bereaved widow and fatherless children on the other, and my deep sympathies for the appeals of the helpless and needy may cause me to hold the scales of justice unequally between them; but it is my sincere judgment that the evidence should not only have been submitted to the jury, but, as it now stands, is plainly sufficient to warrant a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. My convictions may appear unreasonable to others; yet, while I highly esteem the more mature judgment of my associates, an approving conscience can be the only arbiter that a judicial officer can recognize in discharging his individual duties.

Where the employer without cause prevents full performance, the employé may recover upon the common counts for the work and labor performed. Udpike v. Ten Broeck, 33 N. J. L. 105; Mitchell v. Scott, 41 Mich. 108; McQueen v. Gamble, 33 Mich. 344; Raken v. Harrison, 4 McCord, L. 249; Canada v. Canada, 6 Cush. 15; Wilhelm v. Caul, 3 Watts & S. 26; Preston v. Finney, Id. 53; Blood v. Enos, 12 Vt. 625, 36 Am. Dec. 393.

But an employé discharged for cause cannot recover for the time of his actual service on the indebitatus count, where he was bound to give a whole year's service before earning any wages and broke his contract by leaving service before the year's end. Lilley v. Elwin, 11 Q. B. 742, 17 L. J. Q. B. 122, 12 Jur. 622.

On a contract for a year determinable at a month's notice, a servant improperly discharged cannot recover on a count for entire year, but must declare on the contract and not declare as for a year absolute. Archard v. Horner, 3 Car. & P. 349.

Where a clerk is wrongfully dismissed, he may treat the contract as rescinded and sue for actual service, or sue on the contract for wrongful dismissal, but if he sues for broken contract he cannot then sue on the contract. Goodman v. Pocock, 15 Q. B. 576, 19 L. J. Q. B. 410, 14 Jur. 1042.

d. Quantum meruit.

Where the employer without cause prevents full performance, the employé may recover upon a quantum meruit for the value of his services. Clark v. Manchester, 51 N. H. 594; Wilkinson v. Black, 80 Ala. 329; Caldwell v. Meyers (S. Dak.) Feb. 17, 1892; Gardenhire v. Smith, 39 Ark. 280; Sugg v. Blow, 17 Mo. 369; Brent v. Shelley, 5 Mo. App. 580; Colburn v. Woodworth, 31 Barb. 351; Green v. Hulet, 23 Vt. 188; Hill v. Green, 4 Pick. 114; Sher-

Cooper, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

If we were authorized to make the law, instead of announcing it as it is already made, we would unhesitatingly hold that one contracting to render personal service to another for a specified time could, upon breach of the contract by himself, recover from that other for the value of the service rendered by him, and received by that other, subject to a diminution man v. Champlain Transp. Co. 31 Vt. 162; Dover v. Plimmons, 38 N. C. 23.

But the mere failure to pay money before completion is not such a prevention that the contractor could recover on a quantum meruit. Cox v. McLaughlin, 54 Cal. 605.

Where employé is ordered by employer not to complete the contract but does, he can only recover on quantum meruit for work done prior to notice. Goodwin v. Kirker, 3 Hilt. 401.

A suit by a servant on quantum meruit for wrongful discharge is a bar to an action on the breach of contract. Keedy v. Long, 5 L. R. A. 759, 71 Md. 385.

e. Assumpsit.

An employé discharged without cause during term may recover in assumpsit. Williams v. Byrne, 7 Ad. & El. 177 & Nev. & P. 139, 1 Jur. 573, W. W. & D. 535; Jacquot v. Bourra, 7 Dowl. P. C. 343, 3 Jur. 773; Fillieul v. Armstrong, 7 Ad. & El. 557, 3 Nev. & P. 406, 1 Jur. 921, W. W. & D. 616.

And an action of covenant may be maintained by an apprentice against his master for wrongful discharge during the term. Winstone v. Linn, 1 Barn. & C. 460, 3 Dowl. & R. 465.

But a servant discharged during the term for cause cannot recover in assumpsit for wrongful dismissal. Turner v. Mason, 14 Mees. & W. 112, 3 Dowl. & L. 595, 14 L. J. Exch. 311.

Accord and satisfaction, and consent.

In Mortlock v. Williams, 76 Mich. 565, it was held error to direct the jury that the acceptance of a check sent in full settlement is a discharge of all indebtedness, where the employé was discharged without cause during the term, as this was a question for the jury—as to whether it was intended to be accepted as full satisfaction.

But in Hutton v. Stoddart, 83 Ind. 539, it was held that an employé discharged before the end of the term accepting a check in payment as settlement cannot recover for the balance of the term, on the ground of compromise of doubtful claim.

Neither of the above cases refers to any authorities.

And where the contract of service is dissolved by mutual consent, no recovery can be had, although on a prior suit default had been taken for two months' salary. This default does not preclude defendants from showing discharge by consent. Van Alstyne v. Indiana, P. & C. R. Co. 34 Barb. 23.

An employé quitting by mutual consent cannot recover thereafter. Southmayd v. Watertown F. Ins. Co. 47 Wis. 517; McGehee v. Roberts, 30 Ala. 534.

So where a note is given in settlement, where an employé leaves service, the employer cannot thereafter claim that the employé left before the term of service had expired. Thorpe v. White, 13 Johns. 53.

Where an employé quits before expiration of the term, a tender by the employer will be held to be an acquiescence, but the laborer cannot recover more than the contract price. Patenote v. Sanders, 41 Vt. 65, 36 Am. Dec. 554.

Forfeiture.

On a question of forfeiture of wages on a part performance there is a slight conflict of authority. The most of the cases hold, however, that forfeiture clauses in contracts must be strictly construed and that the employé may recover for wages earned notwithstanding the forfeiture clause. Heber v. United States Flax Mfg. Co. 13 R. L. 303; Chicago 24 L. R. A.

City R. Co. v. Blanchard, 35 Ill. App. 451; Schietenger v. Bridgeport Knife Co. 54 Conn. 64; Schriumpf v. Tennessee Mfg. Co. 38 Tenn. 219.

But in Naylor v. Fall River Iron Works Co. 119 Mass. 317, and Preston v. American Linen Co. 119 Mass. 400, it was held that an employé quitting service without giving the required notice, forfeits the previous wages where the contract so provides.

Infants.

An infant quitting before the end of the term may recover from his employer the value of his services. This is based upon a theory largely that an infant may at any time disaffirm his contracts. Jenkins v. Walker, 17 Me. 33, 35 Am. Dec. 229; De-rocher v. Continental Mills, 58 Me. 317, 4 Am. Rep. 236; Moses v. Stevens, 3 Pick. 333; Whitmarsh v. Hall, 3 Denio, 373; Thomas v. Dika, 11 Vt. 273, 34 Am. Dec. 690; Wheatly v. Miscal, 5 Ind. 142.

A contrary doctrine was stated in Weeks v. Leighton, 5 N. H. 343, but this was overruled in Lufkin v. Mayall, 25 N. H. 52, and a contrary doctrine was also stated in McCoy v. Huffman, 8 Cow. 84, and overruled in Medbury v. Watrous, 7 Hill. 110; but in Harney v. Owen, 4 Blackf. 337, 30 Am. Dec. 603, it was stated if a minor rescinds a contract which is fair, he cannot sue for labor performed under that contract, but this is overruled in Wheatly v. Miscal, supra.

In an action for services by an infant a defense that the defendant had taken plaintiff from the managers of the state industrial school under an agreement and that the plaintiff left defendant's service without just cause, was a defense to the action. Patterson v. Kelly, 37 N. Y. S. R. 463.

Where an infant contracted to work for a year and worked until he reached his majority and quit before the end of his term, he could not recover for his services as remaining after he became of age was a ratification. Forsyth v. Hastings, 37 Vt. 646.

In Shurtleff v. Millard, 13 R. L. 373, 34 Am. Rep. 640, it was stated that a minor quitting work before the expiration of the term may recover what his services are reasonably worth, taking in consideration the injury of the other party; but that was not the question involved in this case.

Time for payment.

On partial performance an action cannot be maintained until the time for payment has expired. Hartwell v. Jewett, 9 N. H. 249; Diefenback v. Stark, 55 Wis. 463, 43 Am. Rep. 719; Powers v. Wilson, 47 Iowa, 666; Bradshaw v. Branan, 5 Rich. L. 465.

No recovery can be had on a contract for service during the whole season if brought before the season expired. Blodgett v. Berlin Mills Co. 53 N. H. 215.

Slaves.

The owner of a slave cannot recover for his services, if he is hired for a fixed period to be paid at the end of that time and he is taken away before the contract of service is ended. Caldwell v. Dickson, 26 Mo. 80, 17 Mo. 575.

Where slaves are hired in pairs as sawyers and the time in which they are to commence work is several and at a rate of so much per pair although the whole price is payable at the end of the year, if there is a failure to deliver one pair, the hirer may recover for the services of those tendered and used. Johnson v. Dunn, 51 N. C. 123.

A hirer of a slave is entitled to abatement of the of his demand to the extent of the damage flowing from his breach of contract. In Britton v. Turner, 6 N. H. 481, 26 Am. Dec. 718, Judge Parker demonstrates, in an admirable and powerful opinion, the equity of such a rule; and it was held in that case that such was the rule of the common law. The courts of some of the states have followed or been influenced by that opinion, and have overturned or mitigated the vigorous rule of the common law.

hire where the slave is hired for a year and dies before the end of the year without fault on the part of the hirer. Townsend v. Hill, 18 Tex. 422; George v. Elliott, 2 Hen. & M. 5.

In Lennard v. Boynton, 11 Ga. 109, it was held that a party hiring a slave for a year, the price of hire is not abated by death of slave before year is terminated, not following the decision of Virginia but adopting the law of liability of landlord and tenant.

"Abandonment by employé" without cause.

Upon the question of abandonment by the employé without full performance and without cause for abandonment, there is much conflict as to the right to recover. The tendency of the latter cases is toward allowing an employé to recover the value of services rendered. The leading case upon the subject being Britton v. Turner, 6 N. H. 482, 26 Am. Dec. 718, which holds that where an employer actually receives benefit from the labor performed on a contract for a term over and above the damages occasioned by failure to complete, he should pay the reasonable worth for what has been done for his benefit.

And this has been followed in many other cases. Elliott v. Heath, 14 N. H. 181; Clough v. Clough, 26 N. H. 24; Parcell v. McComber, 11 Neb. 200; McMillan v. Malloy, 10 Neb. 223, 35 Am. Rep. 471; Duncan v. Baker, 21 Kan. 99; Bjerlee v. Mendel, 39 Iowa, 383; Pixler v. Nichols, 8 Iowa, 106, 74 Am. Dec. 238; Riech v. Bolch, 68 Iowa, 523; Riggs v. Horde, 25 Tex. Supp. 456, 73 Am. Dec. 384.

Other cases hold the same on the ground of benefit received by the employer. Byrd v. Boyd, 4 McCord, L. 246, 17 Am. Dec. 740; McCline v. Pyatt, 4 McCord, L. 23; White v. Gray, 4 Ill. App. 223.

Others on the ground that the wages are payable on installments. Matthews v. Jenkins, 80 Va. 463; Chamblee v. Baker, 95 N. C. 98; Davis v. Preston, 6 Ala. 83; Taylor v. Laird, 1 Hurst. & N. 206, 26 L. J. Exch. 329.

And in Ricks v. Yates, 5 Ind. 115, the same was held which seems to squarely overrule DeCamp v. Stevens, 4 Blackf. 24, which holds that a party contracting to work a year at so much a month, and quitting at the end of three months, cannot recover for work done.

And a recovery may be had where the contract makes no stipulation that a full performance shall be a condition precedent to recovery and it does not appear that the employé refused to perform it. Scotfield v. Grow, 68 Vt. 233.

So where a dispute arose as to the contract before completion. Beader v. Carnie, 44 N. J. L. 208.

So where an army substitute was prevented by the close of the war from fully performing the service. Leas v. Patterson, 38 Ind. 465.

So where a shipwright had agreed to put a ship in thorough repair and demanded his pay before completion, a recovery was had on the ground that the contract was of general employment. Roberts v. Havelock, 3 Barn. & Ad. 404.

On the other hand, many cases, like TIMBERLAKE v. THAYER, refuse to allow a recovery on part performance of an entire contract where the employé quits without cause, some on the ground of entirety of contract, some on the ground that a recovery cannot be had on a contract where the condition precedent is unperformed. Mather v. Brokaw, 43 N. J. L. 537; Morgan v. Shelton, 28 La. Ann. 332; Badgley v. Heald, 9 Ill. 64; Hansell v. Erickson, 23 24 L. R. A.

Ill. 257; Eldridge v. Rowe, 7 Ill. 91, 43 Am. Dec. 41; Kopits v. Powell, 56 Wis. 671; Jennings v. Lyons, 39 Wis. 553, 20 Am. Rep. 57; Denmead v. Coburn, 15 Md. 29; Davis v. Maxwell, 13 Met. 286; Stark v. Parker, 2 Pick. 267, 13 Am. Dec. 425; Olmstead v. Beale, 19 Pick. 523; Nelichka v. Esterly, 29 Minn. 146; Kohn v. Fandel, 29 Minn. 470; Posey v. Garth, 7 Mo. 96, 37 Am. Dec. 183; Sehnerr v. Lemp, 19 Mo. 40; Aaron v. Moore, 34 Mo. 79; Earp v. Tyler, 73 Mo. 617; Ervig v. Ingram, 24 N. J. L. 520; McMillan v. Vanderlip, 12 Johns. 165, 7 Am. Dec. 299; Lantry v. Parks, 8 Cow. 63; Monell v. Burns, 4 Denio, 121; Clark v. Smith, 14 Johns. 328; Reab v. Moor, 19 Johns. 337; Sickles v. Pattison, 14 Wend. 237, 28 Am. Dec. 527; Hair v. Bell, 6 Vt. 35; Philbrook v. Belknap, Id. 333; Brown v. Kimball, 13 Vt. 617; Ripley v. Chipman, 13 Vt. 268; Winn v. Southgate, 17 Vt. 358; Mullen v. Gilkinson, 19 Vt. 503; Kettle v. Harvey, 21 Vt. 301; Miller v. Goddard, 34 Me. 102, 56 Am. Dec. 638; Congregation of Children of Israel v. Peres, 3 Coldw. 620.

The main case of TIMBERLAKE v. THAYER denies the authority of Britton v. Turner, 6 N. H. 482, 26 Am. Dec. 718, and refuses to follow it, holding that no recovery could be had by the party guilty of a breach of contract; that he could not recover on the special contract, because he himself had not performed it, nor upon a quantum meruit because of the existence of the special contract. This is supported by the cases supra, but hardly any of them define it so squarely or emphatically as the main case.

So where the contract which the plaintiff had partly performed was not valid. Peck v. Burr, 10 N. Y. 297; Kruger v. Leppel, 42 Minn. 6; Swansey v. Moore, 22 Ill. 63, 74 Am. Dec. 134.

In Peck v. Burr, supra, the contract was rescinded as illegal by the party who attempted to recover for his part performance.

In Kruger v. Leppel, supra, the contract was an oral one and within the statute of frauds, but full performance was nevertheless held to be a condition of a recovery.

It was stated in Lowe v. Sinklear, 27 Mo. 309, that the employer of a servant employed for a certain period at a fixed sum was not liable on a quantum meruit where the service was incomplete though of value, but this was not the question involved in the case.

A teacher contracting for nine months teaching for $45 in full, teaching only eight and a half months, cannot recover on the contract; as to whether he could on quantum meruit is not decided. Hill v. Balkcom, 79 Ga. 444. See Charlestown School Twp. v. Hay, 74 Ind. 137.

Where an employé sues and says he worked part of the time and was willing to work the remainder of his term, but that the defendant failed on his part to pay plaintiff, it does not show such a performance as will authorize a recovery for work done. Weber v. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. of Maine, 5 Mo. App. 51.

And in Steeple v. Newton, 7 Or. 110, 33 Am. Rep. 705, it was held that a party who abandons a contract of work and labor before completion, except voluntarily, may recover on quantum meruit less damages.

In an action of covenant for two shillings for copying every quire of paper, and that he copied four quires and three sheets for which 8s and 3d was due him, there could be no apportionment or pro rata, but if he had averred 3d to be the usual fees for copying three sheets, it was said that he

Paxter v. Nichols, 8 Iowa, 106, 74 Am. Dec. 298; Coe v. Smith, 4 Ind. 79, 58 Am. Dec. 618; Riggs v. Horde, 25 Tex. Supp. 456, 78 Am. Dec. 584; Chomblee v. Baker, 95 N. C. 98; Parcell v. McComber, 11 Neb. 209. But the decided weight of authority is to the contrary. Lawson, Cont. Carr. § 470, note 4, and authorities there cited. And it was decided at an early day in this state that an entire contract of this character could not be apportioned, and that, under the circumstances named, no recovery could be had by the party guilty of the breach of contract; that he could not recover on the special contract, because he himself had not performed it, nor upon a quantum meruit, because of the existence of the special contract. Wooten v. Read, 2 Smedes & M. 585. In Hariston v. Sale, 6 Smedes & M. 684, and Robinson v. Sanders, 24 Miss. 891, it was held that an overseer's contract with his employer, though made for a definite time, was not an entire contract, and recoveries were allowed on the common counts. The cases relied on to support the rule announced in these decisions were Byrd v. Boyd, 4 McCord, L. 240, 17 Am. Dec. 740; Eaken v. Harrison, 4 McCord, L. 249; McClure v. Pyatt, Id. 26. Of these the leading case is Byrd v. Boyd; the others simply follow it. In Byrd v. Boyd the court evidently legislate the exception into the law, and so, in effect, declared; for, after referring to the rule of the common law, the court proceeds to say, "There is, however, a third class of cases for which it is necessary to provide," and then declares that these cases for which it is necessary for the court "to provide" are "those where the employer reaps the full benefit of the services which have been rendered, but some circumstance occurs which renders his discharging the overseer necessary and justifiable; and that, perhaps, not immediately connected with the contract, as in the present case." The South Carolina court put its decision expressly upon the ground of expediency, and confined its effect, by necessary implication, to the particular sort of contract under consideration. Since the abolition of slavery we have no such contracts strictly as those which formerly existed between employer and overseer; and the decisions in Wooten v. Read and Hariston v. Sale, supra, have no field of operation. The instructions for the plaintiff were properly given.

The defendant, who was the indorser of a promissory note executed by one Vandiver, introduced evidence to prove that, by an arrangement between Vandiver and Thayer, Thayer was to take up the note (which was then in the hands of a third person) for Vandiver, and Vandiver was to render service to him, by supervising his farm until the crop should be gathered, in payment of the note. On this evidence the defendant asked the court to instruct the jury that if such was the contract of the parties, and Vandiver failed to perform his contract, Thayer had a right of action against him for breach of contract but could not recover against the defendant, the indorser, on the note. The court refused the instruction as asked, but modified it by inserting therein the words, "and that Vandiver rendered the service as he contracted to do." The instruction as asked was correct, and should have been given; and the modification inserted by the court robbed it of all beneficial operation for the defendant. The defendant was only liable secondarily on the note; and if, by the arrangement between Thayer and Vandiver, Thayer's right of action against Vandiver, the maker, was suspended, if but for a day, the indorser was forever discharged, and the mere breach of the contract by which it was suspended could not revive the obligation of the indorser. Randolph, Com. Paper, §§ 707, 708; Case v. Hawkins, 53 Miss. 702.

There is no evidence that the maker of the note was a resident of this state, where the suit was brought. The question whether it was necessary for the plaintiff to have brought this action as prescribed by section 3516 of the Code is not presented. The defendant was so clearly a nonresident of the state, and therefore subject to attachment, that we decline to consider whether the instructions of the court given on the trial of the issue made on the attachment were or were not correct. No error of law would warrant the setting aside of the verdict on that issue, in the light of the testimony.

might have helped himself. Needler v. Guest, Aleyn, 9.

In Huttman v. Boulnot, 2 Car. & P. 510, it was said that a clerk quitting without cause is liable to a cross-action, but that was not the question involved in this case, as the plaintiff consented to receive fifteen pounds on the understanding that no cross-action should be brought.

In Galvin v. Prentice, 45 N. Y. 162, 6 Am. Rep. 58, it was held that an implied promise to pay for part performance for services can arise only when the party sought to be charged has had the benefit of part performance or has prevented full performance, but the question involved in this case was whether a void contract was prima facie evidence of the value of the services.

In this note cases in regard to impossibility of performance by reason of death are not included. See note to Parker v. Macomber (R. L.) 16 L. R. A. 868. L. T.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

COMMONWEALTH of Massachusetts
v.

James A. TREFETHEN et al.

(187 Mass. 180.)

1. Direct evidence of suicide is not

NOTE.—The present case is a notable one on the subject of evidence of declarations of intention when not a part of the res gestæ. As an authority in favor of such evidence, and especially as 24 L. R. A.

necessary to require the consideration of the correctness of the exclusion of evidence of intention to commit it, since that theory must be considered by the jury if the circumstances of the case afford evidence to support it.

2. Evidence locating the presence of very clearly separating this kind of declarations from the class of declarations as res gestæ, the case is probably the most valuable one upon the subject.

deceased at another place at the time of an alleged interview at which she is alleged to have declared an intention to commit suicide is not of itself sufficient to exclude evidence of the alleged declarations from the jury, in a murder case.

3. The trial judge cannot in his discretion exclude evidence of the alleged declaration of intention to commit suicide because of illegitimate pregnancy made the day before the death of the one making them, whose condition continued until her death, because of lapse of time between the declaration and the death.
4. Evidence of an intention to commit suicide is not immaterial in a murder case where deceased was found dead under circumstances not inconsistent with the theory of suicide.
5. Evidence of declarations by deceased of intention to commit suicide is admissible in a murder case if introduced solely to show the state of mind or intention of the one making them at the time they were made.
6. That deceased is a stranger to the proceeding will not exclude evidence of his declarations of intention to commit suicide, upon trial of an indictment charging one with murdering him.
7. Refusal to permit defendant's counsel to ask a juror on his voir dire to what extent he had read about the case in the newspapers after the statutory questions had been exhausted is not an abuse of discretion requiring reversal, if there is nothing to show what counsel had any reasonable expectation of proving.
8. It is not prejudicial error to admit against one on trial for murder the whole of a conversation in which some of his replies had a tendency to show guilt while others were explicit denials of guilt.

(October 20, 1892.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant Trefethen to rulings of the Superior Court for Middlesex County made during the trial of himself and William H. Smith upon an indictment for the murder of Delena H. Davis, which resulted in a verdict of guilty as to him. Verdict set aside.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John D. Long and William Schofield, for defendant:

The court erred in excluding the testimony of the witness Hubert.

There was other evidence to show that Tena Davis did drown herself, and this intention as an additional fact, might properly influence the jury in determining the question of suicide or murder. If so, it was a material fact. The test is whether the fact is, according to the general experience of mankind, capable of affording a reasonable presumption or inference as to the issue in dispute.

Com. v. Barnacle, 184 Mass. 215, 45 Am. Rep. 319; Lewis v. Mason, 109 Mass. 169; Higgins v. Andrews, 121 Mass. 298; Maggi v. Cutts, 123 Mass. 535; Com. v. Abbott, 180 Mass. 472; Com. v. Felch, 182 Mass. 22; Com. v. Fenno, 184 Mass. 217. See also Woodbury v. Obeare, 7 Gray, 467; Camp v. Camp, 59 Vt. 667. 24 L. R. A.

The question of materiality is not in this case a matter of discretion, but of law.

Maggi v. Cutts, supra. See also Lane v. Moore, 151 Mass. 87.

No special reason being assigned for the exclusion of the evidence, and there being other evidence in the case to support the theory of suicide, the proper construction of the bill of exceptions is, that the evidence was excluded as "incompetent in its nature and not admissible in any aspect of the case."

Howe v. Howe, 99 Mass. 89.

From the existence of the intention as a fact or circumstance, to be considered with the other evidence, the defendant argues that the theory of suicide is made more probable than if such intention did not exist. The state of mind or intention is therefore of itself the material fact. It cannot from its nature be proved by direct testimony of witnesses, but may be proved by the contemporaneous declarations of the party.

In petitions for the probate of wills, when the validity of the will is questioned on the ground of want of mental capacity, or of fraud and undue influence, declarations of the testator, oral and written, made before or after the execution of the will, are admissible to show the condition of his mind and his intention as to the disposition of his property.

So where a will has been lost, or destroyed, similar declarations of the testator are competent for the purpose of proving its contents, and of showing whether there was or was not a revocation.

If the language of a will or other written instrument, though plain in itself, applies equally well to more objects or persons than one, declarations of the testator's or maker's intention are competent, for the purpose of showing his intention, as a means of ascertaining the true meaning of the words of the will or other document.

Mr. A. E. Pillsbury, Atty-Gen., for the Commonwealth.

Field, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal exception is to the refusal of the court to admit the testimony of Sarah L. Hubert. The exceptions recite that: "Sarah L. Hubert, a witness called in behalf of the defendant, testified that her business, which she advertised in the newspapers, was that of a trance medium; that on December 22, 1891, in the forenoon, after 10 o'clock, a young woman called at her place of business in Boston for consultation. There was sufficient evidence to go to the jury of her identification as Delena J. Davis. Upon objection being made to the testimony of this witness, counsel for the defendants stated to the court, aside from the jury, that they offered to prove by this witness that at the interview on December 22, the young woman aforesaid stated to the witness that she was five months pregnant with child, and had come to consult as to what to do, and added later in the interview that she was going to drown herself. The court refused to admit the testimony, and the defendants duly excepted." The exceptions also recite that "the evidence offered in behalf of the commonwealth was wholly circumstantial, and tended to show that on December 23, 1891, Delena J. Davis left her home in Everett at about 7 o'clock in the evening, and was last seen on the corner of Ferry street and Broadway, which is near her home in said Everett, at about 25 minutes of 8, the same evening. On the 10th day of January, 1892, her dead body was found in the Mystic river, a short distance below the Wellington bridge, about three miles from her home. There were no marks of violence on the body when found, nor was there any evidence that poison had been administered, nor did her clothing show any signs of violence. . . . The physicians called in behalf of the commonwealth testified that the cause of death was drowning, and that, from the stage which digestion had reached, death occurred between two and one half and three and one half hours after the deceased had eaten her last meal. There was evidence that the deceased ate her supper about 5 o'clock on the evening of December 23, and that the partly digested food found in her stomach corresponded with that which it was testified she ate at that meal. The deceased was unmarried, and at the time of her death was pregnant with a male child, and was about five months advanced in the state of pregnancy. The defendants contended and argued, without objection, that all the evidence introduced in behalf of the commonwealth was reasonably consistent with the theory that the deceased came to her death by suicide. There was evidence in the case tending to negative the circumstances relied upon by the commonwealth, and to support the theory of suicide."

At the argument in this court the attorney-general asked that if the kind and amount of evidence tending to support the theory of suicide should be thought by the court to be important, the exceptions might be amended so as to show exactly what this evidence was; and he intimated that, in his opinion, this evidence was so slight as to be unworthy of serious consideration. We understand that by "evidence" the attorney-general meant direct evidence tending to prove suicide. Without considering what remedy, if any, is open to the attorney-general in a criminal case where there is a reason to suppose that the exceptions taken by the defendant and allowed by the court are not sufficiently full, we are of opinion that in the present case the facts are such that suicide would naturally suggest itself, as a possible explanation of the cause of death, and that, if it be true that the direct evidence tending to prove suicide is inconsiderable, yet the circumstances afforded evidence in support of the theory of suicide which must be considered by the jury. The amendment, therefore, if it were made, and were of the character suggested, would afford no aid to the court in determining the questions of law raised by the exceptions.

A few minor suggestions of the attorney-general may be briefly disposed of. There was evidence on the part of the commonwealth that the deceased did not leave her home on the 22d of December until 8 o'clock in the afternoon, and that she returned home between 8 and 9 o'clock, and the attorney-general argues that "this furnishes sufficient reason for the exclusion of the evidence" offered "in the discretion of the court." But the jury might have disbelieved this evidence of the commonwealth, or, if they believed it, might also have believed that the deceased had the interview with Sarah L. Hubert in the afternoon, rather than in the forenoon, of December 22. The attorney-general also argues "that the statement was so remote in point of time from the disappearance and death of Tena Davis that it was within the discretion of the court to exclude it for this reason." When evidence of declarations of any person is offered for the purpose of showing the state of mind or intention of that person at the time the declarations were made, the declarations undoubtedly "may be so remote in point of time, or so altered in import by subsequent change in the circumstances of the maker, as to be wholly immaterial, and wisely to be rejected by the judge." It has been many times said that "some limit must, of course, be had in applying practically the rules which govern the admission of this evidence." This subject is considered in Com. v. Abbott, 130 Mass. 472, and in the cases there cited. There is undoubtedly a discretion to be exercised by the judge or judges presiding at the trial in the admission or rejection of this kind of evidence; but it is not an absolute discretion, and the exercise of it, when the facts appear, may be reversed by this court. If the declaration, evidence of which was offered in the present case, had been made by the deceased two or three years before her death, when she was not pregnant with child, and did not know the defendant, it might well have been held by the presiding judges to have been of no significance in the case.

In the case at bar the evidence offered was that the declaration of the deceased was made the day before her death, and was made in a conversation concerning her pregnancy, which continued until her death. The declaration, therefore, was not made at a time remote from the time of her death, and there had been no change of circumstances which made it inapplicable to the condition of the deceased at the time of her death. It was clearly competent for the jury to find from the evidence recited in the exceptions that, if Delena J. Davis had an intention to commit suicide on December 22 she continued to have the same intention on December 23. If the evidence, in its nature, was admissible, the court, on the facts stated, could not exclude it on the ground that from the lapse of time or change of circumstance it had ceased to be material. It ought to be said that there is nothing in the exceptions indicating that the presiding judges refused to admit the evidence on the ground that it was in their discretion to admit or reject it. They probably considered the question presented as settled by the decision of this court in Com. v. Felch, 132 Mass. 22.

The main argument of the attorney-general is: First, that it is immaterial whether the deceased, at or before the time of her death, had or had not an intention to commit suicide; and, secondly, that, if she had such an intention, it could not be proved by evidence of her declarations that she was going to drown herself. The burden was on the commonwealth to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant killed the deceased, and to do this the jury must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that she did not kill herself. The nature of the case proved by the commonwealth was such that it was not impossible that she had committed suicide. If it could be shown that she actually had an intention to commit suicide, it would be more probable that she did in fact commit it than if she had no such intention. If it could be shown that during the week before her death she had actually attempted to drown herself, and had been prevented from doing it, it seems manifest that this fact, according to the general experience of mankind, would have some tendency to show that she might have made a second attempt, and accomplished her purpose. It may be true that an unmarried woman, pregnant with child, may sometime say that she will commit suicide when she has no serious intention of doing it; or, if she has such an intention, she may not carry it into effect, although she may have an opportunity; but it is impossible to say that the actual existence of such an intention does not tend to throw some light upon the cause of death of such a woman when found dead under circumstances not inconsistent with the theory of suicide. It is a question of more difficulty whether evidence of the declarations of the deceased can be admitted to show such an intention. The argument, in short, is that such evidence is hearsay. It is argued that such declarations are not made under the sanction of an oath, and that there is no opportunity to examine and cross-examine the person making them, so as to test his sincerity and truthfulness, or the accuracy and completeness with which the declarations describe his intention or state of mind; and that, even if such declarations would have some moral weight in the determination of the issue before the court, they are not within any of the exceptions, to the exclusion of hearsay, which the common law recognizes.

The counsel for the defendant concede that the declaration in this case is not, under our decisions, admissible as a part of what has been called the "res gesta," although they contend that some courts have admitted similar declarations on that ground. They concede that to make a declaration admissible on that ground it must accompany an act which, directly or indirectly, is relevant to the issue to be tried, and must in some way qualify, explain, or characterize that act, and be, in a legal sense, a part of it. They concede that if this declaration is a part of the act of visiting Sarah L. Hubert, and tends to show the nature or purpose of that visit, the fact of the visit is not relevant to the issue. It does not tend to show, directly or indirectly, that the defendant killed the deceased, or that she killed herself. They concede that if the evidence of this declaration is admissible, it is on account of the nature of the declaration, and not because it was made at this interview; and that, if made to anybody else under the same circumstances, it would have the same significance. They contend that the declaration is some evidence of the state of mind or intention of the deceased at the time she made it, and that the intention which it tends to prove is a material fact, which, in connection with other facts proved, tends to support the theory of suicide. They contend that the state of mind or intention in the mind of a person, when material, can be proved by evidence of his declaration as well as of his acts, particularly when that person has deceased, and cannot be called as witness, and the declarations were made before the controversy arose which is the subject of the trial.

The evidence that declarations were made must, of course, be of the same character as the evidence that the acts were done; that is, both must be proved by the testimony of witnesses under oath, and subject to cross-examination and in either case the examination may extend to all the circumstances which tend to show the significance of the declaration or of the acts as indications of the existing state of mind or intention of the speaker or actor. The fundamental proposition is that an intention in the mind of a person can only be shown by some external manifestation, which must be some look or appearance of the face or body, or some act or speech; and that proof of either or all of these, for the sole purpose of showing the existing state of mind or intention, may be inferred. For example, the exceptions recite that on the day when the deceased disappeared Trefethen called at the house of her mother "about 10 in the forenoon, and was there some time with Tena, and that Tena that day appeared bright and cheerful, and 'full of smiles,' but at times during the month prior thereto had been depressed in spirits." The only apparent object of this testimony was to show on the day she disappeared she was happy and, therefore, could not have contemplated suicide. Her bright and cheerful appearance might have been real or feigned, but this was for the jury. If the deceased at the same interview had said, "I was never so happy in my life as I am to-day," it is contended this declaration might be as significant of her state of mind as her cheerful appearance, and that speaking, as an indication of what is in the mind of the speaker, is as much an act as smiling or conduct generally. The only obvious distinction between speech and conduct is that speech is often not only an indication of the existing state of mind of the speaker, but a statement of a fact external to the mind, and as evidence of that it is clearly hearsay. There is, of course, danger that a jury may not always observe this distinction, but that has not availed to exclude testimony which is admissible for one purpose and not admissible for another, to which there is danger the jury may apply it. A common instance of this is when it is a material fact in the case whether a person at a certain time said a certain thing. The testimony of a witness who heard him say it is always admitted, although this is not evidence that what that person said was true. The present case discloses another instance. Many witnesses testified to conversations with the defendant about the disappearance of Tena Davis, and his connection with it. What they said to him, and his silence or his replies, were only admissible so far as his failure to make reply, or his replies to what was said to him, under the circumstances, tending to show that he was guilty, but the testimony of what was said to him was not, in and of itself, evidence that the statements made to him were true. Suppose that at the interview between the deceased and the witness Hubert, if there was such an interview, the deceased had said that Trefethen was the father of her child; evidence that the deceased said this is clearly hearsay, and is not admissible to prove that he was the father. But suppose that it had been denied at the trial that the deceased knew that she was pregnant, testimony that she had said that she was pregnant would be some evidence that she knew it. If, the day before her death, she had written a note, addressed to her mother, stating her condition, and declaring her intention to drown herself, and had left it in her desk when she went from home the following day, the admissibility of such a letter in evidence, after proof that she had written it, depends upon the same considerations as the admissibility of evidence of similar oral declarations. Such a written declaration differs from an oral declaration only in this: that writing is often a more deliberate act than speaking; but this affects only the weight of the evidence. It may also be thought that speech is a less trustworthy indication of what is really in the mind of the speaker than acts or appearance, but this, if it be so, also affects the weight of the evidence. Certainly, to confine the evidence to acts, appearance, or speech which is wholly involuntary, would be impracticable and unreasonable, for almost every expression of thought or feeling can be simulated; and although evidence of the conscious declarations of a person as indications of his state of mind has in it some of the elements of hearsay, yet it closely resembles evidence of the natural expressions of feeling, which has always been regarded in the law not as hearsay, but as original evidence,—1 Greenl. Ev. § 102, 5th ed.; and when the person making the declarations is dead, such evidence is often not only the best, but the only, evidence of what was in his mind at the time. On principle, therefore, we think it clear that when evidence of the declarations of a person is introduced solely for the purpose of showing what the state of mind or intention of that person was at the time the declarations were made, the declarations are to be regarded as acts from which the state of mind or intention may be inferred in the same manner as from the appearance of the person, or his behavior, or his actions generally. In the present case the declaration, evidence of which was offered, contained nothing in the nature of narrative, and was significant only as showing the state of mind or intention of the deceased.

But it is argued that this is not the law, and that it is not competent for this court to change the established rules of evidence. We have been shown no case exactly like the present, but there are decisions closely analogous, and while they are not uniform, yet we think the weight of modern authority is in favor of admitting evidence like that offered in the present case for the purpose stated. The latest decision on the subject is Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Hillmon, 145 U. S. 285, 36 L. ed. 706, and many of the cases are cited in the opinion. See also Furyear v. Com. 88 Va. 51; Blackburn v. State, 23 Ohio St. 146; Boyd v. State, 14 Lea, 162; Goersen v. Com. 99 Pa. 388; Jumperts v. People, 21 Ill. 375; Reg. v. Jessop, 16 Cox, C. C. 204; Com v. Fenna, 134 Mass. 217.

It is argued that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Travelers Ins. Co. of Chicago v. Mosley, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 397, 19 L. ed. 437, shows that that court is somewhat more liberal than our decisions warrant in admitting declarations as a part of the res gesta, and that, therefore, this court will not follow the decision in Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Hillmon, supra. But, without considering whether we should follow Travelers Ins. Co. of Chicago v. Mosley on the subject of res gesta, we are aware of no difference in the decisions of the two courts on the admission of declarations to show the existing condition of the mind of the declarant, if we except our decision in Com. v. Felch, supra, which we will consider hereafter. This court admits exclamations and declarations as evidence of existing pain in case of injuries. In the case of wills, upon the issue of sanity or undue influence, this court has always admitted evidence of declarations which tend to show the condition of the mind of the testator, his intention with regard to the disposition of his property, or his fear of the person alleged to have exercised undue influence. Shailer v. Bumstead, 99 Mass. 112; Lewis v. Mason, 109 Mass. 169; May v. Bradlee, 127 Mass. 414; Potter v. Baldwin, 138 Mass. 427; Woodward v. Sullivan, 152 Mass. 470; Pickens v. Davis, 184 Mass. 252, 45 Am. Rep. 822. Upon an issue whether there was an intentional gift or gift causa mortis the same rule prevails. Whitney v. Wheeler, 116 Mass. 490; Whitwell v. Winslow, 132 Mass. 307; Lane v. Moore, 151 Mass. 87. In Lane v. Moore this court says: "Where the mental condition of a person at a particular time is in issue, his appearance, conduct, acts, and declarations, after as well as before the time in question, have been held admissible in evidence if sufficiently near in point of time, and if they appear to have any tendency to show what that mental condition was. The question has usually arisen in cases involving the validity of wills, but the principle is the same where the validity of a gift is questioned, and where responsibility for crime is to be determined." See also Hove v. Hove, 99 Mass. 88. It is to be noticed that in all these cases the person, evidence of whose declarations was admitted, was dead at the time of the trial. In actions by the husband for seducing his wife and alienating her affections from him the declarations and statements of the wife, made before the alleged seduction, indicating the state of her affections towards her husband, have uniformly been admitted upon the question of damages. Palmer v. Crook, 7 Gray, 418; Jacob v. Whitcomb, 10 Cusb. 255. In the last case the court says: "Whenever the mental feelings of an individual are to be proved, the usual expressions of such feelings are original evidence, and often the only proof of them which can be had." At common law the wife could not be a witness in such a case. In Com. v. Abbott, supra, the defendant, who was not the husband, being on trial for the murder of a married woman, for the purpose of showing "the existence of motive on the part of the husband of the deceased to commit the crime," offered evidence that the husband and wife quarreled some years before the homicide; that about six years before the homicide the husband was seen entering his own house with an axe in his hand, and that he then uttered threats against his wife and a man not named; and also offered to show the ill-feeling of the husband towards the wife, by statements not in the nature of threats, made by the husband to a witness. The evidence offered was confined to acts done or statements made on or before the year 1877. The homicide was in January, 1880. The reputation of the wife for chastity between the years 1878 and 1877 had been bad. There was uncontroverted evidence that from May, 1879, the reputation of the deceased was not questioned, and that the husband and wife continued to live together until her death. The justices trying the case excluded the evidence, and the defendant excepted. In that case this court says: "The existence of a criminal motive is an element which it is often necessary to establish in order to give character to the acts and conduct of a party charged with or suspected of crime. In such case the conduct or declarations of a party, both before and after the principal fact in issue, are admissible, provided they are sufficiently near in point of time, and sufficiently significant of the motive or intent to be proved. The rules which govern human conduct are to be reasonably applied in these cases, as in all other investigations of fact. They are to be so applied in all cases where the inquiry is as to the mental or moral condition of a person at the time a particular act was done. The intent or disposition, when it constitutes an element of crime, can only be ascertained, as all moral qualities are, from the acts and declarations of the party." This court, after saying that a certain discretion must be left to the justices trying the case, held that it did not appear that the court erred in excluding the evidence offered because of its remoteness, and of a subsequent change in the relations of the husband and wife. The court also says, what has been said many times in criminal cases where it was contended that some other person than the defendant committed the crime, that "the existence of ill-feeling as a motive for the commission of crime will not alone justify submitting to a jury the question of the guilt of a person entertaining such feeling. It becomes material only when offered in connection with other evidence proper to be submitted, showing that the person charged with such ill-feeling was in fact implicated in the commission of the crime." There is no intimation anywhere in the opinion that if the evidence had related to a time very near the homicide, and if there had been evidence implicating the husband in the commission of the crime, evidence of his threats against the wife, and of his statements showing ill-feeling towards her, would not have been admitted; and the language of the opinion implies that they would have been. The admission of evidence of declarations in Elmer v. Fessenden, 151 Mass. 359, 5 L. R. A. 724, and in actions involving the question of domicile, — Kilburn v. Bennett, 3 Met. 199, — and in bankruptcy cases, — Bateman v. Bailey, 5 T. R. 512, — may perhaps be supported on the ground that the declarations were a part of the res gestæ; but, if these cases were not decided on this ground, they must be considered as applicable to the present case.

It is also argued that the deceased, with reference to the indictment, is not a party; and the question whether her declarations should be received as evidence is the same as if they were the declarations of any other person than the defendant, and that evidence of a confession by a third person that he killed the deceased, or threats to injure the deceased, made by him, cannot be received. The decisions appear to be uniform that confessions of third persons cannot be received as evidence that they committed the crime, and that the defendant did not; and this for the plain reason that they are hearsay. They are strictly narratives of past transactions, not made under oath, and are only competent as admissions against the persons making them. The decisions are not uniform whether evidence of threats made by third persons to injure the deceased should be admitted or not as evidence for the defendant. In most of the cases where the evidence of such threats by third persons have been rejected in trials for murder, the threats were made too long before the homicide to be significant, or they were made under very different circumstances than those existing when the deceased was killed, or there was no other evidence tending to implicate these persons in the commission of the crime, and the evidence was rejected on one or all of these grounds. Evidence of threats of the deceased against the defendant have been admitted when the question was whether the defendant or the deceased made the first assault, and whether the defendant acted in self-defense. Wiggins v. Utah, 93 U. S. 465, 23 L. ed. 941. If, on a trial for murder, the defendant proved that another person had ill will towards the deceased, and had an opportunity to commit the murder, and was found on the day when the murder was committed near the place of the murder, under suspicious circumstances, with a weapon which might have been the instrument with which the deceased was killed, and that the conduct of this person after the murder was such as to indicate that he had committed it, it would seem that evidence that this person, on the day before the murder, had threatened to kill the deceased if he could find him, and said that he was searching for him that he might kill him, would be significant of an intent to kill him, and ought to be admitted; and we find no well considered case where, on this state of facts, such evidence has been rejected. See State v. Beaudet, 53 Conn. 536, and cases cited; Holt v. State, 9 Tex. App. 571; Cluverius v. Com. 81 Va. 787, 826; Walker v. State, 63 Ala. 105; Howard v. State, 23 Tex. App. 266; Purveyer v. Com. supra; Worth v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 51 Fed. Rep. 171.

In Com. v. Felch, supra, the defendant was charged with attempting to procure the miscarriage of Mary Ann Finley on July 2, 1881, by the use of some instrument to the jurors unknown, in consequence of which she died on the same day. He contended at the trial "that the operation was performed by Mary on herself; and there was evidence tending to show that it would have been possible for her to perform the operation on herself, considered as an operation, using for the purpose an ordinary lead pencil." He offered to prove by one Hughes "that in the month of June next preceding the time of the alleged offense Mary told her that she was pregnant by one Edward Titcomb, and that if Titcomb did not perform an operation to procure a miscarriage, or get some one to do so, she should perform the operation on herself with a lead pencil. It appeared that said declarations neither accompanied nor were explanatory of any act then done by her." The evidence was excluded, and the defendant excepted. This court, in the opinion, treats the evidence as hearsay, and says: "Such evidence is generally inadmissible. There are, however, several exceptions to this rule, and it is contended by the defendant that this evidence may properly be brought within some one of them. The only exception particularly designated is that relating to pedigree. This is, indeed, one of the well recognized exceptions to the general rule. That which is technically hearsay evidence is competent evidence upon a question of pedigree." An examination of the original papers shows that one of the contentions of the defendant was that the evidence that Mary said that Titcomb was the father of the child was some evidence in the case that he was the father, on the ground that it was a declaration in relation to the pedigree of the child; and the argument was that, if Titcomb was the father, and the defendant was not, it was improbable that the defendant would attempt to procure a miscarriage. The decision of the court that no question of pedigree was involved in the case, and that for the purpose of proving that Titcomb was the father of the child the evidence was hearsay, and inadmissible, is undoubtedly correct. But the counsel for the defendant in that case also contended that evidence of this declaration was admissible to show an intention in the mind of the deceased to perform the operation, in connection with the evidence that the operation was one which she might have performed. There are some passages in the latter part of the opinion which perhaps tend to show that this argument did not wholly escape the mind of the justice who wrote it, but this particular aspect of the evidence is certainly not considered, and no cases are cited, and the whole discussion in the opinion is that this point in the consideration of the case might not have received the attention it deserved. Upon a re-examination of the question, we are of opinion that under the circumstances shown in Com. v. Felch a part of the evidence should have been admitted for the purpose of showing the intention in the mind of the deceased, and that to this extent that decision must be overruled. It is not necessary, in the present case, to determine what limitations, if any, in practice must be put upon the admission of this kind of evidence, because all the limitations exist which have ever been suggested as necessary. The person making the declaration, if one was made, is dead. She had an opportunity to commit suicide, and it was competent for the jury to find that she had a motive to commit it; and the declaration, if made, was made under circumstances which exclude any suspicion of an intention to make evidence to be used at the trial. We cannot know whether the jury would or would not have found that the deceased was the person who had the interview with the witness, or whether they would have believed the witness, or whether, if they did believe her, they would have found that the deceased had really the intention which the declaration indicated, or whether the testimony, in view of all the evidence, would have affected the minds of the jury. We can only say that on the facts recited in the exceptions the evidence cannot be considered as immaterial or unimportant. We are of opinion that the presiding judges erred in refusing to receive this evidence, and that, for this reason, the verdict against Trefethen must be set aside.

The remaining exceptions may be noticed, although it is not absolutely necessary to decide them. The first exception is to the refusal of the court to permit the counsel for the defendant to ask Charles E. Ray, one of the jurors, who was under examination by the court upon the voir dire, "to what extent he had read about the case in the newspapers."

Ray was sworn as a juror, and sat as a juror at the trial. The court read to all the jurors summoned Pub. Stat., chap. 170, § 85, and chapter 214, § 7, and then read a portion of what was said by Shaw, Ch. J., speaking for the full court, in Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295, 297, 298, 52 Am. Dec. 711, viz.: "The statute intends to exclude any person who has made up his mind or formed a judgment in advance in favor of either side. Yet the opinion or judgment must be something more than a vague impression, formed from casual conversations with others, or from reading imperfect, abbreviated newspaper reports. It must be such an opinion upon the merits of the question as would be likely to bias or prevent a candid judgment upon a full hearing of the evidence." The court also read the statement made by Chapman, Ch. J., speaking for the full court, in the trial of Samuel M. Andrews. Report of Trial of Andrews, by Charles G. Davis, p. 8. In the present case, the court, having put to the juror Ray all the statutory questions, which he had answered to its satisfaction, refused to permit the counsel for the defendant to put the question we have quoted above. The statutes we have cited, as also Stat. 1887, chap. 149, undoubtedly contemplate that other questions besides the statutory questions may be put to jurors by the court, or by the parties or their attorneys under the direction of the court. Pub. Stat., chap. 170, § 85, also provides that "the party objecting to the juror may introduce any other competent evidence in support of the objection." To determine whether a juror has such bias or prejudice that he does not stand indifferent in the cause is often a matter of a good deal of delicacy and difficulty, because persons most affected with bias or prejudice are sometimes the least sensible of it; but the extent to which the examination of the juror should be carried after the statutory questions have been answered has been said to be within the sound judgment and judicial discretion of the trial judge or judges. Com. v. Burroughs, 145 Mass. 242.

It is plainly impossible to exclude every juror who has read in the newspapers some statement of the case, because this might exclude every intelligent man in the country. It is well known, however, that there is a growing tendency in certain newspapers to publish not only the evidence given in any preliminary hearing on a charge of crime, but all sorts of unverified rumors and of crude opinions concerning the probable guilt or innocent of suspected persons. This reprehensible practice in a case which excites great popular interest may sometimes require extraordinary care on the part of the court in the selection of jurors, if the accused is to have an impartial trial. If the discretion of the court trying the case in the matter of the examination of jurors, after the statutory questions have been put and satisfactorily answered, is absolute, we cannot revise it, if it is not, we cannot say, as matter of law, on the somewhat meagre statement contained in the exceptions, and in the absence of anything indicating what the counsel of the defendant had any reasonable expectation in providing that the court erred in excluding the question.

The mother of the deceased, Mrs. Davis, testified to a conversation with the defendant on the morning of December 24th, a part of which is as follows: "I asked him where Tena was. He said he hadn't seen her . . . Says I, 'Don't lie. She went out to meet you last night on the corner of Ferry street, and you have carried her off.' He said he had not. Said I, 'You have.'" The counsel for the defendant asked that this be stricken out, and objected to its admission. The court overruled the request, and admitted the testimony, and the defendant excepted. There are other examples of the admission of similar testimony against the objection of the defendant. It does not appear that the defendant testified as a witness in his own behalf, and no question arises of the admissibility of evidence to affect his credit as a witness. The exceptions recite that, "after Mrs. Davis had testified, the commonwealth introduced a large amount of testimony relating to the conduct of Trefethen after the disappearance of Tena, including statements, declarations, conversations, and conduct of Trefethen with Mrs. Davis" and other persons named, the general character of which is set out in the exceptions; and "that at the interview with Mrs. Davis on the morning of December 24, when accused by her of Tena's disappearance, he [Trefethen] shed tears, and was greatly excited; and also . . . that at various times in these interviews, during the period between December 23 and January 10, he met the statements quoted in this bill, made to Mrs. Davis by Tena, and repeated to him by Mrs. Davis or the officers, in various ways, sometimes by explicit denial, sometimes by silence, and sometimes by equivocal expressions, such as 'It must be a mistake,' 'It is all a mistake,' 'It must be some other party,' from all of which evidence the commonwealth claimed and argued, without objection, that these denials of his relations with Tena, of her seduction, of the appointment with her for the evening of December 23, and his connection with her disappearance and death, were false, and were made to protect himself against the charge of murder." If a defendant is charged with crime, and unequivocally denies it, and this is the whole conversation, it cannot be introduced in evidence against him as an admission. Fitzgerald v. Williams, 148 Mass. 462. If any part of a conversation with the defendant put in evidence tends to show, directly or indirectly, that he is guilty of the crime charged, the defendant has the right to have put in evidence all that was said to and by him at the same time and relating to the same subject, although it is in his favor. Com. v. Keyes, 11 Gray, 323. When a statement is made in the presence and hearing of a defendant, which, if true, tends to show that he is guilty, and he remains silent, or makes an equivocal reply, the rule of law has been stated to be as follows: "The rule is that a statement in the presence of the defendant, to which no reply is made, is not admissible against him, unless it appears that he was at liberty to make a reply, and that the statement was made by such person, and under such circumstances, as naturally to call for a reply, unless he intends to admit it. But if he makes a reply wholly or partially admitting the truth of the facts stated, both the statement and the reply are competent evidence. Com. v. Kenney, 12 Met. 235, 46 Am. Dec. 672; Com. v. Galavan, 9 Allen, 271; Com. v. Brown, 121 Mass. 69, 80. See Com. v. Denamore, 12 Allen, 535. Com. v. Brown was an indictment for procuring the miscarriage of one Ann Powers, otherwise called Emma L. Smith, and one Frances Ordway, otherwise called Frances A. Chase. In that case one George, a police officer, testified that he "took the defendant into the presence of Emma L. Smith and Frances A. Chase, and asked them in the defendant's hearing and presence if they knew him. Both said that they knew him. One knew him as Dr. King, the other knew him as Dr. Brown. I asked them if he performed an operation on them. They said he did. The defendant asked if they had been operated on previously by any other person. They said, 'No,'" etc. This testimony was admitted against the objection of the defendant. The full court says: "In this case, when Emma L. Smith and Frances A. Chase stated that the defendant had performed an operation on them, he did not remain silent, but asked them in reply if they had been previously operated upon by another person. The jury might infer from this an admission by him of the truth of their statements." It is obvious that when the reply of a defendant to a statement made to him, which, if true, tends directly or indirectly to prove that he is guilty of the crime charged, is not an equivalent affirmation or denial of the truth of the statement, difficult questions must often arise in determining whether the reply is of such a character that it has any tendency to show a consciousness of guilt which will warrant its admission as evidence against him. Perhaps a certain discretion must be left to the presiding judge or judges, in view of all the circumstances of the case. The same is true when the conduct and declarations of the defendant are put in evidence for the purpose of showing a consciousness of guilt on his part. See Com. v. Piper, 120 Mass. 185, 189.

The exceptions in the present case do not set out verbatim the whole conversation between Mrs. Davis and the defendant on the morning of December 24, and of that set out we cannot say, as matter of law, that some of the replies were not such as to warrant their admission as evidence against the defendant. If these were admitted, the defendant had the right to have the whole conversation on that subject put in evidence. The logical effect of an unequivocal denial of guilt, if it have any effect, is in favor of the defendant; and the admission of the denials of the defendant, if the jury properly considered the evidence, was in favor of the defendant. This is shown in the attempt, often made by a defendant when the government has introduced evidence of a confession made on one occasion, to introduce evidence that on other occasions he has denied that he was guilty. While evidence that the defendant has made false statements in regard to many facts which are relevant to the issue is admitted against him as tending to show his guilt, it is not competent for the government to contend that a denial of guilt is of itself evidence against the defendant. To argue that by the other evidence the defendant is shown to be probably guilty, and that therefore his denial of guilt is false, and is additional evidence against him, ought not to be permitted. When a defendant in a criminal case is shown to have made certain false statements of facts and these facts are relevant to the issue, the fact that the defendant has knowingly made the false statements may have some tendency to show that he is guilty; but the jury must first be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant made the statements, and that they were false, and that the defendant knew that they were false, before any weight can be given to this evidence, unless the statements of themselves have some tendency to show his guilt. But when the defendant denies generally that he is guilty, this statement cannot be shown to be false, except by proving that he is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt; and then it is unnecessary. If there is a reasonable doubt of his guilt on all the other evidence, the fact that he unequivocally denied his guilt is not, of itself, evidence against him; and the denial cannot be assumed to be false because it has not been proved to be false by sufficient evidence. Some of the denials of the defendant in the present case were denials of facts which were relevant to the issue, and not a general denial of guilt, and we do not know whether the evidence was not such as to satisfy the jury beyond a reasonable doubt that these denials were knowingly false. Some of the evidence recited was competent on the ground that the conduct or replies of the defendant, in view of the statements made to him, had some tendency to show guilt on his part. If in one conversation some of the replies of the defendant has some tendency to show guilt, and some were explicit denials of guilt, we cannot say that the defendant has been prejudiced by the admission in evidence of all that was said at that interview directly or indirectly relating to his guilt or innocence if the jury were properly instructed upon the application to be made of this evidence. We cannot presume that the court did not take pains properly to instruct the jury upon the legitimate use to be made of the evidence admitted, and warn the jury that the statements made to the defendant were not to be considered, in and of themselves, as any evidence of the facts stated. On this part of the case the exceptions disclose no error of law.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Iowa

v.

RHODES, Appl.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. A consignment of intoxicating liquors "arrives" in the state within the meaning of the Wilson bill, which makes such liquors subject "upon arrival in such state" to the laws of the state, as soon as it crosses the state boundary and enters the state, although the contract of carriage is not then completed.
2. Removing intoxicating liquor from the platform to the freight room of a depot is a transportation or conveyance thereof from "one place to another" within the state, within the meaning of the Iowa statute making transportation or conveyance an offense, in the absence of a certificate from the county auditor that the consignee is authorized to sell such liquors.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Washington County convicting and fining him for knowingly, willfully, and unlawfully receiving for the purpose of delivering to another certain intoxicating liquors which were being unlawfully conveyed in the state in contravention of the provisions of a statute. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. M. Eicher and Hedge & Blythe for appellant.

Messrs. John Y. Stone, Atty-Gen., Thomas A. Cheshire, C. J. Wilson, and E. M. Shelton for the State.

Kinne, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The defendant was arrested upon an information charging that he was the agent of the Burlington & Western Railway Company at Brighton, Iowa, and that on August 6, 1891, as such agent, he "did knowingly, willfully, and unlawfully receive, for the purpose of delivering to another, certain intoxicating liquor that was being unlawfully transported or conveyed from Burlington, Iowa, to Brighton, Iowa, viz., one box containing a two-gallon jug, and said jug being full of whiskey, alcohol, or other intoxicating liquor; said box being marked 'W. H., Brighton, Iowa,' and was not plainly or correctly marked, showing the quantity and kind of liquor contained therein." The case was first tried before a justice of the peace, and defendant was convicted, and fined $100. From this judgment he appealed to the district court, where a jury was waived, and a trial had to the court. He was again found guilty, and adjudged to pay a fine of $100, from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted. From the evidence it appears that on August 4, 1891, the Dallas Transportation Company, a corporation doing business in the state of Illinois, delivered to the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railway Company, at Dallas, Ill., one wooden box, about a cubic foot in size, marked "W. H., Brighton, Iowa;" that the consignor of said box, when it left it with the railway company for transportation, represented to the railway company that it contained groceries. This box was shipped over the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railway to Burlington, Iowa, and then transferred to the Burlington & Western Railway for shipment to Brighton, Iowa. The shipment was made the entire distance upon a single way bill, August 5, 1891, said box arrived at Brighton, and was delivered on the depot platform by the trainmen. Immediately thereafter the defendant, in compliance with the directions of his employers, carried said box from the platform into the freight room of the depot building, where, on the same day, it was seized by a constable under a search warrant. At the time of the seizure the freight on the box was due and unpaid. Inclosed in the box was a jug containing whiskey, but it was so inclosed as to be hidden from view. At the time it was seized the box was being held by the railway company for the payment of charges, and for delivery to the consignee. Neither the defendant, nor the road by whom he was employed, held a permit for the transportation or sale of intoxicating liquors; and neither had a certificate from the county auditor that the consignee was authorized to sell intoxicating liquors in Washington county, Iowa. Previous to the arrival of the box a mail carrier told defendant he was looking for a box from Dallas City for William Hown, and said it was likely to be marked "W. H.," and would contain alcohol or whiskey. That he told the mail carrier that he had not received a box of that description. That it arrived the next day. He supposed, perhaps, this was the box the mail carrier told him would come.

2. The information in this case is based upon a violation of Code, § 1553, as amended McClain's Code, § 2410. This section provides that: "If any express company, railway company, or any agent or person in the employ of any express company, or of any common carrier, or any person in the employ of any common carrier, or if any other person, shall transport or convey between points, or from one place to another within this state, for any other person or persons or corporation, any intoxicating liquors, without first having been furnished with a certificate from and under the seal of the county auditor of the county to which said liquor is to be transported, or is consigned for transportation, or within which it is to be conveyed from place to place, certilying that the consignee or person to whom said liquor is to be transported, conveyed, or delivered, is authorized to sell such intoxicating liquors in such county, such company, corporation, or person so offending, and each of them, and any agent of such company, corporation, or person so offending, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined in the sum of one hundred dollars for each offense and pay costs of prosecution, and the cost shall include a reasonable attorney fee to be assessed by the court, which shall be paid into the county fund, and stand committed to the county jail until such fine and costs of prosecution are paid. The offense herein defined shall be held to be complete and shall be held to have been committed in any county of the state, through or to which said intoxicating liquors are transported, or in which the same is unloaded for transportation or in which said liquors are conveyed from place to place or delivered. It shall be the duty of the several county auditors of this state to issue the certificate herein contemplated, to any person having such permit, and the certificate so issued shall be truly dated when issued, and shall specify the date at which the permit expires as shown by the county records. Provided, however, that the defendant may show as defense hereunder, by preponderance of evidence, that the character and circumstances of the shipment and its contents were unknown to him." Under this section, in order to sustain the judgment in this case, it must appear that defendant, knowing that the box contained intoxicating liquor, transported or conveyed the same between points, or from one place to another, within this state, without first having been furnished with a certificate from the county auditor. We think defendant's testimony, heretofore referred to, clearly shows that he knew that the box contained intoxicating liquors. It is conceded that neither defendant, his company, nor William Hown, had a right or permit to sell intoxicating liquors, and that neither defendant nor said company had a certificate from the auditor of Washington county, showing that any of the persons named were authorized to keep or sell intoxicating liquors.

NOTE.—The construction of the Wilson bill, subjecting to state laws all intoxicating liquors transported into the state "upon arrival in such state" is brought in question for the first time, we believe, in the above case in respect to what constitutes such "arrival."

But two questions remain to be considered: First, did the liquor, when it first entered this state, become subject to the jurisdiction of our laws, or would such jurisdiction only attach when the shipment had reached its destination, viz., Brighton, Iowa, or when it was delivered to the consignee? And, second, was the defendant, in the removal of the liquor from the platform to the freight depot, engaged in transporting or conveying it, within the meaning of the section quoted?

An elaborate argument is made by defendant's counsel to show that the liquor did not become subject to the jurisdiction of our laws until its "arrival in" this state; and it is contended that it did not arrive within the state, within the meaning of the Wilson bill, until the contract of carriage had been completed. The so-called "Wilson Bill" reads as follows: "All fermented, distilled or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any state or territory, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale or storage therein, shall upon arrival in such state or territory be subject to the operation of the laws of such state or territory, enacted in the exercise of its police powers, to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such state or territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in 'original packages' or otherwise." We do not deem it necessary to enter into an extended consideration as to what is interstate commerce. We think the language of the Wilson bill, when considered with reference to the evil sought to be remedied, clearly indicates an intention on the part of congress to make such liquors the subject of state legislation and jurisdiction the moment they cross the boundary of Iowa, and enter the state. Under the decision in Leisy's Case, 135 U. S. 123, 84 L. ed. 137, such liquors in original packages did not become the subject of state jurisdiction until mingled with the common mass of property therein, until sold. In that case the right of congress to permit the state to exercise jurisdiction over such articles prior to their sale therein was fully recognized. It was for the purpose of removing all impediments to local jurisdiction, as to imported liquors, on their arrival within such jurisdiction, that the Wilson bill was passed. Wilkerson v. Rahrer, 140 U. S. 545, 35 L. ed. 572. By the Wilson bill these imported liquors, upon arrival within the state, were subjected to the operation of its laws enacted in the exercise of its police powers, as fully as though such liquors had been produced in such state. Now, if, in this case, the liquor had been produced at a point within the state, and consigned, over the Burlington & Western Railway, to Brighton, Iowa, there could be no question that our laws would apply thereto; and it is equally clear that upon crossing the border of this state, and entering it, such imported liquor becomes at once subject to its laws, the same as produced in the state. In Re Spickler, 43 Fed. Rep. 653, 10 L. R. A. 446, the circuit court of the United States, in treating of this matter, says: "The Wilson bill, upon its adoption, made subject to state police laws all imported liquors as soon as they should pass within the boundary of the state." In the case of Re Van Vliet, 43 Fed. Rep. 761, 10 L. R. A. 451, it is said: "The original package, when it arrives within the state where its transit terminates, is at once reduced to the rank of domestic liquor,—enjoys no privileges not enjoyed by domestic liquor."

In State v. Fraser, 1 N. Dak. 425, the court said: "On crossing the boundary line of a state, the supreme authority has declared by this enactment that interstate liquor ceases to be an object of federal protection and control, and becomes mingled with the mass of property within the state, and, in common with all such property, is subject to local police regulations. If, as appellant contends, imported liquors consigned to a place within this state could be lawfully transported thereto, it is certain that such liquors would not be subject to the operation of our laws" to the same extent, and in the same manner, as liquors produced in this state. It seems to us the view that state jurisdiction attaches when the imported liquor enters the state is not only in accord with a reasonable construction of the Wilson bill, itself, but in furtherance of the purposes sought to be accomplished by the passage of that act, and finds full support in the authorities.

8. Was the defendant, in the removal of the liquor, engaged in transporting or conveying it, within the meaning of our statute? The language of the statute is broad enough to cover the act of defendant in removing the liquor from the platform to the freight room of the depot. He was one of the instruments necessary to complete the act of transportation. If it be not so, then clearly, he is within the terms of the act, as he conveyed the liquor from "one place to another within this state." His guilt is not to be determined by the distance he conveyed the package, but his conveying it any distance was a violation of the law. With the propriety of legislation making such an act a crime, and with the severity of the punishment attached to doing the act, we have nothing to do.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Samuel K. NESTER et al., Appts.,

v.

THE CONTINENTAL BREWING CO.

(161 Pa. 473.)

1. The true test of the illegality of a combination to restrict business is its effect upon the public interests.

2. A combination of brewers to silence and stifle competition among them within the city and county of Philadelphia and the county of Camden, N. J., fixing a minimum price at which any of them shall sell beer to the customer of another or to new trade is void as against public policy.

3. Equity will not aid a person in an action, if he requires the aid of an illegal transaction to establish his case.

APPEAL by complainants from a decree of the court of Common Pleas, No. 1, for Philadelphia County in favor of defendants in an action brought to compel an accounting and a division of moneys in the hands of defendants to a portion of which complainant claimed to be entitled. Affirmed.

Certain brewers in the city of Philadelphia entered into an agreement for the organization of what was called the Brewers' Association of Philadelphia, to continue during the year beginning July 1, 1886. The agreement provided that no member should sell beer in the city and county of Philadelphia and Camden, and Camden county, N. J., or which was to be used in such places, to any new trade or any other brewers' customer or customers that belong to the association during the continuance of the agreement at less than $8 per barrel, and it was stipulated that it should be regarded as selling for less than that price if he paid any portion of the rent of his customer, or his license or tax, or should buy any fixtures for him or fix up his premises or give him beer for the purpose of sale, or make him any allowance, or cancel, satisfy, remit or release any account or debt, due or to become due, or to return to him any portion of the purchase price, or do anything which should directly or indirectly result in the diminution of the price below $8 per barrel. It was further stipulated that for the mutual benefit of all the parties, and in order to equalize the profits, each of them should contribute at the rate of $4 per barrel upon each and every barrel of beer sold during the month of June, 1886, and each succeeding month a like sum for every barrel sold during the previous month, of which contribution $2 per barrel should be actually paid in cash to the treasurer of the association. After two months' payments had been made, the treasurer should distribute and pay over to the members of the association the amount in his hands of the payments so made for the month of June, 1886, and so on from month to month, the treasurer always retaining in his hands one month's contribution undistributed. The basis of the distribution was to be the proportion of the sales of each party during the three months ending June 30, 1886, and each succeeding three months, to the total sales distribution to be made at the rate of $4 per barrel. In case any member violate the stipulation as to the price per barrel, he should forfeit to the association as agreed and liquidated damages any and all right to his pro rata share in the distribution of the month's contribution which should be undistributed after such breach was ascertained and entered of record and his share should be divided among the other members. Provision was made for investigation of the charges of breaches and for findings and judgment thereon.

This action was brought by the assignees of the Enterprise Brewing Company to recover that company's share of contributions which had accumulated in the hands of the treasurer of the association from time to time prior to the institution of this suit.

NOTE.—The present case shows in a very interesting way the distinction between contracts in restraint of trade and contracts to regulate prices with reference to limitations of time and place. For the latter class, see note to Lovejoy v. Michels (Mich.) 13 L. R. A. 770.

Further facts appear in the opinions.

The following is the opinion rendered in the court below by BIDDLE, J.:

"The bill of complaint in this case sets out that the defendants became members of the Brewers' Association of Philadelphia, which is an unincorporated association, familiarly known among its members as the 'Brewers' Pool,' and also the 'Pool'; that, under the articles of agreement, the defendants became indebted to them in a large amount of money, and that they have made repeated demands upon them for an account, and for payment of the amount due them under the provisions of the agreement, but the said account and payment have been refused. They therefore pray that an account may be taken, by and under the decree and direction of the court, of all the dealings and transactions of the said the Brewers' Association of Philadelphia, under the aforesaid agreement, for the said term, beginning on July 1, 1886, and ending on June 30, 1887, and that the amounts found due shall be paid over. To this demurrers have been filed by several of the defendants, alleging '(1) that the plaintiffs have not, in and by their said bill, shown such facts as would entitle them to the relief prayed for; and (2) that the said agreement set out in the said bill, and alleged to have been entered into by the said Enterprise Brewing Company, Limited, and the defendants, and which the said plaintiffs seek to enforce, is not such an agreement as a court of equity will enforce, because the same is an agreement against public policy, and in restraint of trade.' The agreement, by the fifth section, provides that 'the undersigned hereby stipulate and bind themselves one to the other, and do hereby agree, one with the other, not to sell and deliver any beer in the city and county of Philadelphia and Camden and Camden county, N. J., or which is to be used in the city and county of Philadelphia, Camden, and Camden county, N. J., after July 1, 1886, to any new trade, or any other brewers' customer or customers that belong to this association, during the continuance of this agreement, at less than eight dollars a barrel.' For the violation of this agreement the severest penalties are then provided. By the sixteenth article, 'the board of trustees may call the association together from time to time, and at any such meeting the price at which beer may be sold may be changed by a vote of not less than two thirds of all the members belonging to said association at the time of voting thereon.' These are the only sections to which the demurrer would apply, and which it is necessary to consider at this time.

"It cannot be gainsaid that the object of this combination is to enable the forty-five brewers of the county of Philadelphia, individuals, firms, and corporation, who have entered into it, to regulate and control the sales and prices of beer within the city of Philadelphia and the county of Camden, N. J. It certainly is a combination in restraint of trade, tending to destroy competition, and to create a monopoly in an article of daily consumption. Is this, therefore, a matter in which a court of equity will interfere? It has been strenuously urged, and innumerable authorities have been cited to prove, that contracts in partial restraint of trade, limited by time and space, have been sustained, and that inasmuch as this only applies to 1,250,000 of people, and the space which they occupy, the agreement is perfectly lawful. While we admit the principle, we fail to see that it has any application to this case. Where a barber contracts not to open a shop within one square of another, for the space of six months, equity would no doubt interfere to prevent its violation. But suppose it had been a gambling house, or a house of ill fame, instead of a barber shop. Equity would then refuse to interfere, because these establishments are held to be illegal, and their recognition against public policy. The question would be there, as here, not a question of time and space, but a question whether equity would take cognizance of such a subject. The restriction would rather, in a case of this sort, make the plan more objectionable. The fact that the city was to be placed in a worse position than all the rest of the state could not certainly be in accordance with any enlightened system of public policy. Professor Patterson, in his recent work on the Law of Contracts in Restraint of Trade, after an able and exhaustive examination of all the authorities, says (page 51): 'The rule that is deducible from the cases seems to be that restraints on competition and production are valid, provided they be for the necessary protection of the parties' interests; but combinations between producers, to limit production and to enhance prices, are opposed to public policy, and are not merely void contracts, but are offenses, and punishable as such.' This doctrine is clearly that of our own state. See Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay Coal Co. 68 Pa. 173, 8 Am. Rep. 159. That this agreement is a necessary protection of the parties' interests is not averred, and we do not understand it is contended. Where a price is fixed arbitrarily for which a manufactured article may be sold, it necessarily limits the production of that article to the amount that can be sold for that price. An increased price put upon an article restricts its sale, and the restricted sale necessarily reduces the production. It is no answer to say: 'We do not restrict your production. You may produce any amount you like. We only restrain your sale of it.' Is this not practically a limit to production? Where a pool or combination reserves the right to regulate prices, they can, by the manipulation of prices, drive their competitors out of business, create a monopoly, and enhance at their pleasure the prices to consumers.

"It is also contended here by the complainants that the consideration is executed, and therefore, in accordance with a line of cases, the illegal nature of the original transaction will not be inquired into. The test, however, as to whether a demand connected with an illegal transaction is capable of being enforced at law, is whether the plaintiff required the aid of the illegal transaction to establish his case. If the plaintiff cannot open his case without showing that he has broken the law, a court will not assist him. Swan v. Scott, 11 Serg. & R. 164; Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay Coal Co. supra. Now, in this case, the bill itself sets out the agreement, prays that it may be taken as part of the bill, asks for an account, and calls upon a court of equity to enforce it. It is the very transaction, itself, complained of as illegal, that we are asked to enforce. Believing this agreement to be against public policy, we sustain the demurrers, and dismiss the bill."

Messrs. J. O. Bowman, Theodore P. Matthews, and Furman Sheppard, for appellants:

The purpose of the agreement under which the brewers' association was formed was to restrain ruinous competition amongst the associates and protect them from the petty exactions of consumers seeking to take advantage of that competition. It was not its purpose to effect a monopoly nor to restrain production nor regulate sales; and it did not attempt to control prices further than was necessary to effect its principal object.

The fixing of a uniform price tends to stimulate production, not to restrain it. Fluctuation in price, caused by undue competition, has been judicially declared to affect injuriously both producers and consumers.

Central Shade Roller Co. v. Cushman, 143 Mass. 353.

The agreement under which the brewers' association was formed does not impose an unreasonable restraint upon trade, nor inflict any injury upon the public, and is therefore not illegal as being against public policy.

The term "public policy," is too indefinite and uncertain to be made the foundation of a judgment.

Instances of its variable character are found in the well known facts that many practices formerly held to be against public policy are to-day recognized and lawful.

The cases in which agreements have been adjudged illegal as against public policy are usually those where the end is accomplished by a wholesale restraint of trade, as in contracts not to manufacture, or not to sell at all, or except by permission of an association, or where members of an association must entirely stop work if so ordered.

Messrs. Henry P. Brown, John K. Valentine, Joseph L. Tull, John Dolman, and Samuel Gustine Thompson, for appellees:

Combinations of this character have been condemned whenever the courts have been called upon to interpret questions concerning them. So great has become the public condemnation of them that in many of the states their formation has been declared by legislative enactment to be in violation of law and in 1890 congress of the United States passed the act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies.

Act July 2, 1890, 26 Stat. at L. 209; Spelling, Trusts & Monopolies, p. 75; Patterson, Contracts in Restraint of Trade, p. 51.

The manifest purpose was to control the price and maintain it at a fixed sum and to sweep away all competition. To accomplish this penalties were imposed. With such purpose clearly impressed upon it, the agreement is against public interest, and is therefore void as against public policy.

The question as to whether the nature of the combination is tending towards monopoly and thereby injurious to the public, is to be determined by a construction of the provisions of the agreement constituting the combination, and not by its effect in actual operation.

Central Ohio Salt Co. v. Guthrie, and Hilton v. Eckerley, supra; Aitcheson v. Mallon, 43 N. Y. 149, 8 Am. Rep. 678; Richardson v. Buhl, and Anderson v. Jett, supra; Rannis v. Irvine, 7 Mann. & G. 969.

In the cases in which combinations have been upheld by the courts, it was apparent from the contracts themselves that they did not tend to create a monopoly or put an end to competition and the cases below cited by appellant demonstrate this.

Sterrett, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The conclusions of fact found by the learned court below were amply justified by the record: "It cannot be gainsaid that the object of this combination is to enable the forty-five brewers of Philadelphia, individuals, firms, and corporations, who have entered into it, to regulate and control the sale and price of beer within the city of Philadelphia and the county of Camden, N. J. It certainly is a combination in restraint of trade, tending to destroy competition and create a monopoly in an article of daily consumption." The appellants, however, conceding these to be the facts, insist that the contract was not within the prohibition of public policy, because the restraint was but partial. "Contracts in partial restraint of trade, which the law sustains, are those which are entered into, by a vendor of a business and its good-will, with his vendee, by which the vendor agrees not to engage in the same business within a limited territory; and the restraint, to be valid, must be no more extensive than is reasonably necessary for the protection of the vendee in the enjoyment of the business purchased. But, in the present case, there is no purchase or sale of any business, nor any other analogous circumstances, giving to one party a just right to be protected against competition from the other. All the members of the association are engaged in the same business within the same territory; and the object of the association is, purely and simply, to silence and stifle all competition as between its members. No equitable reason for such restraint exists.

More v. Bennett, 140 Ill. 69, 15 L. R. A. 261. The test question, in every case like the present, is whether or not a contract in restraint of trade exists, which is injurious to the public interests. If injurious, it is void, as against public policy. Courts will not stop to inquire as to the degree of injury inflicted. It is enough to know that the natural tendency of such contracts is injurious. So, it is obviously immaterial whether the restraint be general or partial. The application of the rule does not depend upon the number of those who may be implicated, or the extent of space included, in the combination, but upon the existence of injury to the public. One combination, consisting of but part of those engaged in a given branch of trade, may amount to a practical monopoly, while another, less extensive in its scope, may, as well, bring disaster in its train. The difference lies only in degree, but equally forbids the aid of courts. In More v. Bennett, supra, where a combination had been formed among some of the stenographers in the city of Chicago, Mr. Justice Bailey said: "True, the restraint is not so far-reaching as it would have been if all the stenographers in the city had joined the association; but, so far as it goes, it is of precisely the same character, produces the same results, and is subject to the same legal objection.

We can see no legal difference between the restraint on competition which it now exercises, and that which it will exercise when it is in a position to dictate terms to all who are engaged in the business, and to all who may wish to obtain the services of stenographic reporters." So, no one can for a moment doubt that more serious injury would result to a densely settled than to a much larger district, with scattered population. Thus, a combination to raise the price of breadstuffs would cause serious loss in a city, while it would be comparatively harmless in an agricultural state. "We can scarcely conceive," said Mr. Justice Marr in Texas Standard Cotton Oil Co. v. Adoue, 88 Tex. 650, 15 L. R. A. 598, "how mere territorial limits can be the controlling test, in all instances, of the legality of the restraints imposed upon the ordinary course of trade. The criterion may do very well when applied to the occupation or profession of one man, or even a few individuals; for neither their labor, industry, business, nor services may be so necessary to the public as not to be dispensed with without inconvenience or injury. It appears to us, however, that the case is very different in regard to trade in articles of prime necessity, or even of very frequent use, among a large number of persons in a given locality." Hooker v. Vandewater, 4 Denio, 849, 47 Am. Dec. 258; Stanton v. Allen, 5 Denio, 484, 49 Am. Dec. 282; More v. Bennett, 140 Ill. 69, 15 L. R. A. 261; Hilton v. Eckersley, 6 El. & Bl. 47; India Bagging Assn. v. Kock, 14 La. Ann. 164; Central Ohio Salt Co. v. Guthrie, 35 Ohio St. 666; and Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay 24 L. R. A.

Coal Co. 68 Pa. 178, 8 Am. Rep. 159,—were all cases (and they show the trend of decisions in this country) in which combinations in restraint of trade were partial in respect of the number of persons implicated, and territorial limits, and were yet held injurious to the public interests, and therefore void, as against public policy. The true test was the effect upon public interests. So, if the natural tendency of such contracts is to injuriously affect public interests, the form and declared purpose are immaterial. Courts will not lend their aid in illegal transactions, no matter how disguised. Thus, a contract entered into by the grain dealers of a town, which, on its face, indicated that they had formed a partnership for the purpose of dealing in grain, but the true object of which was to form a secret combination, which should stifle all competition, and enable the parties to control prices, was held void on the ground of public policy. Craft v. McCoughy, 79 Ill. 846, 22 Am. Rep. 171. India Bagging Assn. v. Kock, supra, is to the same effect.

The appellants insist that restraint of trade in the necessities of life, only, is within the prohibition of public policy. No standard has been furnished by which to ascertain what constitute these with reference to the general public. But, assuming that beer is not among them, it is equally within the reach of the rule. The law recognizes it as a commodity,—regulates its sale; it is "an article of daily consumption;" and the court should refuse to aid in any attempted imposition upon the public by means of illegal combinations. The fact that coal was "an article of prime necessity" was not mentioned as essential to the illegality of the combination which was involved in Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay Coal Co. 68 Pa. 178, 8 Am. Rep. 159. but was suggested, arguendo, as an aggravation of the injury done the public. The whole course of discussion there shows that injury to the public was regarded as the true test of illegality.

Appellants also insist that "equity will not permit the fund accumulated here to be locked up forever, or dishonestly appropriated by defendants," but will compel a settlement, according to good conscience, even with a partner in an illegal transaction; a fortiori with an assignee wholly innocent of participation in, or knowledge of, the alleged illegalities. "The test, however," as was well said by the learned judge below, "is whether the plaintiff requires the aid of the illegal transaction to establish his case. If the plaintiff cannot open his case without showing that he has broken the law, a court will not assist him. Swan v. Scott, 11 Serg. & R. 164; Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay Coal Co. supra." "The objection," said Lord Mansfield in Holman v. Johnson, Cowp. 848, "that a contract is immoral or illegal, as between plaintiff and defendant, sounds at all times very ill in the mouth of the defendant. It is not for his sake, however, that the objection is even allowed; but it is founded in general principles of policy, which the defendant has the advantage of, contrary to the real justice as between him and the plain tiff—by accident, if I may so say. The principle of public policy is this, 'Ex dolo malo non oritur actio.' No court will lend its aid to a man who founds his cause of action upon an immoral or an illegal act. If, from the plaintiff's own stating, or otherwise, the cause of action appears to arise ex turpi causa, or the transgression of the law of this country, there the court says he has no right to be assisted. It is upon that ground the court goes, not for the sake of the defendant, but because they will not lend their aid to such a plaintiff. So if the plaintiff and defendant were to change sides, and the defendant were to bring his action against the plaintiff, the latter would have the advantage of it, for, where both are equally at fault, 'potior est conditio defendentis.'" As the bill here bears upon its face the evidence of the turpitude of the transaction out of which the plaintiffs' demand arises, it is plain, upon this principle, that the court must have refused its aid, had the Enterprise Brewing Company itself been the beneficial claimant, and its assignees stand in no higher right. Notice of the character of the combination was in the channel of the assignees' title, and hence they are not "innocent of participation in or knowledge of the illegality" of the combination, and must be treated as having taken subject to the disabilities of their assignor. Chamberlain v. Barnes, 26 Barb. 160; Riddle v. Hall, 99 Pa. 116.

It follows that there is no error in the decree, and it should be affirmed.

Decree affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs to be paid by appellants.

Report with opinion of court below.

MANUFACTURER'S MUTUAL FIRE ASSOCIATION OF AKRON.

(29 Ohio L. J. 160.)

- *1. Associations organized under sections 3686-3690, Rev. Stat., are not authorized to receive into their membership persons who are nonresidents of this state.
- *2. Persons who are not members of such association cannot lawfully fill the office of director thereof.
- *3. Such association is not authorized to do insurance business on what is known as the "joint-stock" plan, nor on the "contingent liability" plan, as defined in section 3634 of the statutes; but it is confined to insurance business in which its members insure each other against loss by fire and other casualties, and agree to be assessed specifically for payment of losses, and for incidental purposes.

*Headnotes by the COURT.

NOTE—Right of nonresidents to become stockholders in corporations.

The great number of instances in which nonresidents have become owners of stock in corporations have sufficed, with little contest, to establish the right of such persons to be stockholders beyond dispute, except when statutes provide to the contrary.

This right was questioned in Humphreys v. Mooney, 5 Colo. 282, but the court declared that the statutes did not prohibit it, and therefore that corporators and officers, as well as stockholders, might be nonresidents of the state.

Likewise, in Central R. Co. of New Jersey v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 31 N. J. Eq. 475, where the statute provided that any number of persons, not less than seven (or thirteen in certain instances), might form a corporation for railroad business, and further provided that a majority of the directors should be residents of the state, it was decided that, subject to this provision as to a majority of the directors, the corporators might be nonresidents.

(March 7, 1883.)

PROCEEDINGS in quo warranto to oust defendant from exercising the franchises of a corporation under the laws of the state, on the ground that it had abused its privileges. Judgment of ouster.

Statement by Burket, J.

This is a proceeding seeking to oust the said mutual fire association from exercising the franchise of a corporation under the laws of Ohio. The petition avers that the said defendant is a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the state of Ohio, and that said defendant ought not to be permitted longer to exercise the franchise of a corporation, for the following causes, to wit: (1) Said association has written, and has now in force, policies of insurance on property located in 36 states and territories outside of Ohio, issued to nonresidents of this state, contrary to the laws of Ohio. (2) While incorporated as an assessment fire association, said defendant has transacted regular fire insurance business on the cash, or joint-stock, plan. (3) Said association,

In Pennsylvania the question arose again as to the right of nonresidents of the state to be stockholders in an agricultural corporation, known as a Farmers & Mechanics' Institute. The special act under which the association was incorporated authorized the exercise of the power "when any number of persons of this commonwealth are associated, or mean to associate" for the specified purposes, but the corporation had power to issue stock, and there was no restriction on its transfer, while the general statutes provided that the charter of an intended corporation must be subscribed by five or more persons, three of whom, at least, must be citizens." The court held that, under the statutes, while nonresidents might not be able to be the original corporations they might take a transfer of stock and were not excluded from membership in such corporation, when they were citizens of the United States. Detwiller v. Com. 7 L. R. A. 357, 121 Pa. 614.

In another case decided at the same time the right of membership in such a corporation was extended also to one who was not a citizen of the United States, but who was a resident and property contrary to law, has operated as a regular mutual fire insurance company, doing business on the contingent liability plan. (4) The majority of the board of directors are not members of said association. (5) Said association is hopelessly insolvent; its total cash assets consisting of cash deposited in the Akron Savings Bank, to the amount of $72.42, while its total liabilities amount to $27,986.17. Prayer for ouster and other proper relief. The defendant, by its answer, admits that it is incorporated under the laws of Ohio; that it has issued policies or certificates of membership to such of its members as were nonresidents of the state of Ohio, on their application therefor, and on property situated outside of the state of Ohio, and avers that it has a legal right so to do; that such has been the custom and method of doing business, by mutual fire associations incorporated under the laws of this state, ever since the passage of the Act of March 80, 1877, entitled, "An act to incorporate associations for the mutual protection of its members against loss by fire." Said defendant further avers that such has been the custom and method of doing business by such associations, to the knowledge of, and with the consent of, the commissioner of insurance of the state of Ohio, up to and until about the 15th of September, 1891, at which date defendant received instructions from said insurance commissioner, together with the written opinion of the attorney-general, to the effect that such mutual fire associations could not lawfully include in their membership nonresidents of Ohio, and could not lawfully issue to such nonresidents policies or certificates of membership on their property located outside of this state. The defendant further avers that, upon receipt of said instructions and opinion, it immediately ceased to issue policies or certificates to members nonresident of this state, insuring their property outside of Ohio, and recalled all certificates issued to such nonresidents, and did all in its power to bring itself within said instructions and opinion, and to abide thereby. Defendant denies that it has transacted a regular fire insurance business on the cash or joint-stock plan, and avers that, by its by-laws and contracts with its members, each and all members agree to pay a first assessment in cash at the time the indemnity takes effect, and to pay such further sums thereafter as may from time to time be assessed against such members for the payment of all losses, and for incidental purposes, which shall accrue during the time such persons are members. Defendant denies that it has operated as a regular mutual fire insurance company doing business on the contingent liability plan, and avers that all members, in their certificates of membership, agree to pay such sums, from time to time, as may be assessed against them by the association; to pay all losses occurring to co-members, during the time that such persons are members. Defendant denies its insolvency, and generally denies the averments of the petition not in its answer admitted to be true, or qualified. The reply of plaintiff denies the averments of the answer, and avers that policies were issued by defendant in which it was expressly stipulated that there should be no assessments after the payment of the first assessment in cash; that such policies were issued on the joint-stock or cash plan, and were made nonassessable; that in many policies the liability of the member was limited to five times the amount of the first or cash assessment; thus constituting such policies the same as the policies of a mutual insurance company, doing business on the contingent liability plan. It appears from the admissions in the answer, and from the evidence, that the facts charged in the petition are substantially true as therein stated.

Burket, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A construction was placed by this court up-holder in the state. Com. v. Hemingway, 7 L. R. A. 360, 131 Pa. 636.

The question whether or not the Constitution of the United States confers upon citizens of the United States the right to hold stock in a corporation of a state in which they do not reside was discussed in Detwiller v. Com., supra, and the decision in the lower court was based on this alleged constitutional right, but the supreme court of Pennsylvania said: "We put the right of the stockholder, not so much on the provision of the Constitution of the United States, which was discussed with so much learning by the judge of the court below, as upon the nature of stock as a personal chattel, and the right of an alien friend at the common law to deal in personal goods and embark in trade, loan money, sue, and be sued for the collection of debts and the protection of its person and personal estate." On this theory, the court in Com. v. Hemingway, supra, upheld the right of an alien resident to become a stockholder, reversing the decision of the court below, which denied the right on the ground that it rested on the Constitution of the United States.

In both the Pennsylvania cases above cited, the court also upheld the right of the nonresident citizen.

and of the alien to be directors; but the question of the right of nonresidents and aliens to become directors is not here entered upon, further than to call attention to the fact that in many states the statutes require that some, or all, of the officers and directors shall be citizens or residents of the state.

The decision in the main case being based on the statute in no respect changes the general rule as to the right when no statute denies it. The question of the right of a nonresident of the state who is a citizen of the United States to own stock in a corporation as one of his equal privileges and immunities under the Constitution of the United States remains unsettled by any direct decision upon the question.

As to regulation by by-laws of elections of private corporations, see Cross v. West Virginia Cent. & P. R. Co. (W. Va.) 18 L. R. A. 582, and note.

The right of infants to become members of a corporation, aside from the question of the right of the infant to disaffirm a contract of subscription, has been raised in respect to membership of a co-operative or assessment insurance company. B. A. R.

on some of the provisions of sections 3686-3690, both inclusive, Rev. Stat., in the case of State v. Monitor Fire Assn., 42 Ohio St. 555; but the question as to whether or not such an association is authorized by law to receive into its membership nonresidents of Ohio was not decided in that case, and we are now requested, by both parties in this case, to pass upon and settle that question. Section 3686 provides that "any number of persons of lawful age, residents of this state, not less than ten in number, may associate themselves together for the purpose of insuring each other against loss by fire and lightning, cyclones, tornadoes, or windstorms, and may make, assess, and collect, upon and from each other, such sums of money, from time to time, as may be necessary to pay losses which occur by fire and lightning, cyclones, tornadoes, or wind storms, to any member of such association; and the assessment and collection of such sums of money shall be regulated by the constitution and by-laws of the association." Section 3687 provides that: "The object of the association, which shall only be to enable its members to insure each other against loss by fire and lightning, cyclones, tornadoes, or windstorms, and other casualties, and to enforce any contract which may be by them entered into, by which those entering therein shall agree to be assessed specifically for incidental purposes, and for the payment of losses which occur to its members." Section 3689 provides that the persons named in the certificate shall elect directors and other officers to serve for one year, and such association, so organized, shall be a body corporate for all the purposes aforesaid; but in no instance shall the power to insure against losses by fire be exercised by others than members of the association. By section 3690 it is provided that all persons who sign the constitution of the association shall be considered and held to be members thereof, and shall be held, in law, to comply with all the provisions and requirements of the association.

It will thus be seen that the association is required, by the statute, to begin its existence with members who are residents of Ohio; and the object of the association is to insure its members, only, against loss by fire, etc. To become a member, the person must sign his name to the constitution. The officers are elected by the members, and the whole scheme contemplated by the statute seems to be an association of rather a local nature,—one in which the members are likely to be more or less acquainted with the standing of each other, and not scattered all over the country or the world. The success and solvency of such an association depend in a large measure upon the standing and responsibility of its members, the promptness with which they pay their assessments, and the confidence which each has that all the others will in the future continue to comply with the requirements of the association. This can best be done by limiting the membership to a small territory; and we think, and so hold, that it was the intention of the legislature, by the statute in question, to limit the membership of the association to our own state, and not to permit it to accept members who are nonresidents of the state, and not to insure property for such nonresidents situate outside of this state. Sections 3686-3690, both inclusive, form a part of title 2 of part 2 of the Revised Statutes; and section 3248 provides that, in all "corporations formed under this title, . . . all directors and all the executive officers must be holders of stock, in an amount to be fixed by the by-laws, and trustees of corporations must be members thereof." So that it was the evident intention of the general assembly that, in associations of the character in question, the directors should be members of the association, and that persons who are not members of the association are not legally qualified to fill the office of director in such association. An association organized under said sections 3686-3690, is not authorized to transact insurance business upon the "joint-stock" plan, nor upon the "contingent liability" plan provided for in section 3634, Rev. Stat. It is expressly provided at the close of said section 3634 that "nothing in this section shall apply to associations for the mutual protection of their members against loss by fire, heretofore or hereafter organized, as provided in section 3686 of the Revised Statutes." And section 3687 confines the business of an association for the mutual protection of its members to insurance in which the agreement among the members is "to be assessed specifically for incidental purposes, and for the payment of losses which occur to its members." The only assessments which such an association has the lawful power to make are assessments for specific incidental purposes, and for specific losses sustained by its members. The idea upon which such associations are founded is that whenever a loss occurs to a member, the amount thereof being first ascertained and adjusted, a specific assessment is made upon all the members to pay such loss. But in practice the method pursued is not to make and collect an assessment for each loss as it occurs, but to make and collect assessments at stated periods for all losses which have occurred up to that time. In such an association the liability of the members is limited only by the amounts of the losses; and an attempt to limit the annual liability, either to the amount of the cash premium paid when the policy is issued, or to the amount of three or five annual cash premiums, is not sanctioned by law, but is expressly prohibited by said sections 3684 and 3687 of the Revised Statutes.

The evidence shows that the defendant has violated the statute in this regard. It is therefore clear that the defendant has been exercising powers and franchises not authorized by statute. But defendant pleads that what it has thus done has been the custom of such associations for years past, with the knowledge and consent of the commissioner of insurance of the state of Ohio. The evidence fails to show such knowledge and consent on part of the commissioner of insurance, and, even if it did, his knowledge and consent would not make the acts lawful. Nor would the fact that all such associations have had a custom among themselves to do their business in an unlawful manner add any legal sanction to such illegal methods. We therefore conclude that the course of business as transacted by said defendant is not only illegal, but inexcusable, and that the prayer of the petition should be granted.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

BIGLER, Executor, etc., of James E. Jones, Pff. in Err., vs.

James A. BAKER.

(.....Neb.....)

1. The vacation of a judgment by default during the term at which it is rendered is largely within the discretion of the trial court, and presents no grounds for reversal, unless there appears to have been a clear abuse of discretion.
2. This court will require a stronger showing of abuse of discretion where the motion to vacate is allowed than in cases where a trial on the merits is denied.
3. Want of mutuality is no defense, even in an action for specific performance, where the party not bound thereby has performed all of the conditions of the contract, and brought himself clearly within the terms thereof.
4. The plaintiff, in an action of ejectment, must rely upon the strength of his own title, and not upon the weakness of that shown by the adversary.
5. Continued possession by a tenant is not such a part performance of a verbal contract for the purchase of land as to take the case out of the statute of frauds. Possession, to have such an effect, must be clearly shown to refer to and result from the contract, and not the lease.
6. An averment that an agent was duly authorized is sustained by proof of subsequent ratification by his principal.
7. The deed of an agent, executed in the presence and under the personal direction of his principal, is not within our statute of frauds, and is not void for the reason that the execution thereof was not authorized in writing.
8. When the vendor in a parol agreement for the sale of land puts the purchaser in possession, and the latter, while holding under such agreement, makes lasting and valuable improvements upon the premises, such facts amount to a performance of the contract by him, and are a sufficient defense in an action of ejectment by the vendor, notwithstanding default of payment for the land.

ERROR to the District Court for Lancaster County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Pound & Burr, for plaintiff in error:

To entitle a defendant to have default and judgment set aside he must furnish not only satisfactory reasons in excuse for his default, but he must accompany his motion by his proposed answer duly verified so that the court may see whether he has a defense to the action.

NOTE.—As to mutuality of contracts for options, see note to Lits v. Gossling (Ky.) 21 L. R. A. 127. 24 L. R. A.

The amended answer alleges that the plaintiff executed the written contract by his authorized agent C. C. Burr and the contract is signed "James E. Jones by C. C. Burr, Agt."

This allegation of the answer cannot be proved by testimony that Jones directed Burr to execute the contract as his agent in the presence of Baker.

The allegation that the plaintiff made the contract through his duly authorized agent cannot be proved by evidence that he made the contract in person.

The contract in question is void for want of mutuality. By the terms of this contract Baker was not bound to do anything. If he failed to make these payments mentioned in the contract as they became due Jones could not enforce payment for Baker made no promise to pay. If Baker failed to execute the notes and mortgage referred to in the contract, Jones was without remedy, for Baker did not agree to execute any notes or mortgage. The contract attempts to bind Jones absolutely while Baker has his election whether to be bound or not. If the latter pays, then Jones must give a deed, but if he does not pay he is not liable for any default—no agreement can be enforced against him for he has made none. Such contracts cannot be enforced in equity.

The mere fact that a person has made a contract for the purchase of land does not entitle him to enter upon and hold it, and a purchaser's possession so obtained, in the absence of some agreement permitting him to enter, would be unauthorized and unlawful.

Post, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action by James E. Jones, in the district court of Lancaster county, to recover possession of a part of the northwest quarter of section No. 14, township No. 10, range No. 6, in said county, which is fully described in the pleadings, but which does not call for a more specific description in this opinion. At the September, 1890, term of the district court, the defendant in error, who was the defendant below, being in default, judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff, in accordance with the prayer of his petition. Three days later, and presumably at the same term, the defendant filed a motion, supported by affidavit, for the vacation of said judgment, which motion was at the November, 1890, term, sustained, and leave given the defendant to answer, which he did four days later, to wit, on the 15th day of December. At the September, 1891, term, a trial was had, resulting in a finding and judgment for the plaintiff, which was, on the motion of the defendant, set aside, and the cause continued. At the February, 1892, term, the defendant, by leave of court, filed an amended answer, to which a reply was in due time filed, and a trial had, resulting in a verdict and judgment for the defendant, which we are now asked to review upon petition in error. Subsequent to the filing of the petition in error, Jones died, whereupon the action was revived in the name of the plaintiff in error, his executor. The alleged errors are:

1. "The court erred in vacating the judgment by default." In this connection, it is argued that the grounds stated in the affidavit accompanying the motion were not sufficient to excuse the default, and that the motion should have been accompanied by the proposed answer. The affidavit referred to is as follows:

"R. D. Stearns, being first duly sworn, on oath says: That he is attorney for said defendant in the above entitled cause, and has been for the last two years or more. That at the commencement of the September, A. D. 1890, term of the district court, affiant spoke to C. C. Burr, one of the attorneys of record in the above cause, and informed him (said Burr) that he (affiant) was attorney for defendant, and told him (said Burr) that he (affiant) was very busy with the criminal docket, and asked said Burr if it made any difference if said answer was not filed for a while; and said Burr said, 'No, it didn't make any difference;' that he would take no advantage of it, as the case could not be tried, anyhow, this term. That, within a day or so, affiant prepared an answer to plaintiff's petition, except the attaching of a copy of a contract which defendant desired to make a part of his answer, and which contract had been mislaid, and defendant was unable to find at that time, and the filing of the answer was thereby delayed. Affiant says he was entirely misled by Attorney C. C. Burr in the matter. He had no idea the case could possibly be reached; a jury case, No. 309 on the docket. This said case is one in ejectment, affecting the title to valuable land, which defendant claims to be entitled to. That defendant has been a resident of this land some four or five years; has put valuable and lasting improvements upon said land, such as dwelling house, farm corrals, windmills, fences, etc. That he has a good and valid defense to the claims made by plaintiff in his petition. In any event, defendant is an occupying claimant, and is entitled to compensation for his valuable and permanent improvements placed upon said lands. Wherefore, defendant asks to have said judgment opened up, and defendant allowed to come in and defend; and defendant now asks leave to file his answer setting out his defense. R. D. Stearns.

"Subscribed in my presence, and sworn to before me, this 27 day of Oct., 1890. J. D. Harris, Deputy Clerk Dist. Court."

It is not claimed for his affidavit that the showing therein is, in all respects, such as good practice requires. For instance, the defense must be inferred from the conclusions of the affiant, rather than the facts alleged. But the vacation during the same term of judgments by default is so largely a matter of discretion for the trial court that this court will decline to interfere unless there appears to have been a clear abuse of discretion. Mulholland v. Scoggin, 8 Neb. 202. It may be said, also, that good practice requires the motion to be accompanied by the proposed answer, in order that it may be determined whether there is a sufficient defense to the action. Where, however, the court has resolved that question in favor of the moving party, upon the evidence in the motion, and affidavits, and an answer subsequently filed, and trial had, a stronger showing of abuse of discretion will be required than where a trial on the merits has been denied. Westphal v. Clark, 46 Iowa, 262.

2. It is argued that the court erred in admitting in evidence the written agreement upon which the defense rests. In this connection it is deemed proper to set out the material allegations of the answer, which, after a general denial, are as follows:

"Further answering, this defendant alleges that he is in possession of the premises described in plaintiff's petition, and has been since the 25th day of May, 1886, by virtue of a certain written agreement given by the plaintiff through his authorized agent, C. C. Burr, which agreement was in words and figures as follows, to wit: 'Law Office of Charles C. Burr, Lincoln, Nebraska, May 25, 1886. In consideration that James A. Baker shall pay me \$300 on June 1, 1887, execute a mortgage and notes to me aggregating \$1,900, as follows: \$200, due June 1, 1888; \$200, due June 1, 1889; \$200, due June 1, 1890; \$200, due June 1, 1891; \$300, due June 1, 1892; \$400, due June 1, 1893; \$400, due June 1, 1894,—with interest at six per cent per annum from June 1, 1887, I agree to convey to him, by quitclaim deed, the undivided ( $\frac{1}{2}$  of S.  $\frac{1}{2}$  N. W.  $\frac{1}{2}$ ) two-thirds of the south half the northwest quarter, 14—10—6. [Signed] Jas. E. Jones, by C. C. Burr, Agt.' Which said agreement was duly filed for record in the office of the county clerk for Lancaster county, Nebraska, on the 25th day of May, 1886; being same land described in petition; interest having been apportioned in partition. Defendant further alleges that since entering in and upon the said described premises by virtue of said contract of sale, as aforesaid, he has made lasting and permanent and valuable improvements on said premises, of the value \$10,000. Defendant further alleges that he has performed all of the terms and conditions of said written contract upon his part to be performed, and upon the 1st day of June, 1887, this defendant tendered to C. C. Burr, the agent as aforesaid, \$100 lawful money of the United States, and at the same time made known his willingness and intentions to execute the notes and mortgage as provided in said written agreement, and that afterwards, and from time to time, the said defendant has made tender of all the money due and owing upon said written agreement to the said plaintiff, which tender had been refused; and the said defendant now brings into court the full sum of money due upon said contract, together with all accrued interest thereon, and makes tender for the same in open court. And defendant avers that, at all times since the making of said memorandum or agreement, this defendant has been ready and willing to pay the several sums of money at they became due, from time to time, and has made tender of the same, either to plaintiff or to his agent."

The ground of the objection to the agreement is that, according to the testimony of the defendant, it was made with the plaintiff, and not with Burr, as agent, and that the only connection of the latter with the transaction was to reduce the agreement to writing in accordance with the dictation of the plaintiff. We will not controvert the proposition that an allegation of a contract through an agent is not sustained by proof of a contract in person by the party sought to be charged. It is asserted by the plaintiff, and readily conceded, that where an instrument is executed in the name of the maker, in his presence, and at his request, it will be regarded as the personal act of the latter. But that is a rule for the benefit of the adverse party, and has never, so far as we are informed, been given the application here suggested. The defendant might have alleged a personal agreement; but, having elected to treat Mr. Burr as agent of the plaintiff, the latter will not be heard to complain, since the agreement set out is the identical one tendered to and accepted by the defendant.

8. It is contended that the agreement relied upon is void for want of mutuality. It is true there is found therein no express agreement by the defendant to purchase the land in controversy. But it is charged in the answer, in substance, that the defendant went into possession under said contract on the day of its execution; that he has, since said date, made lasting and valuable improvements thereon; and that he has performed all of the conditions imposed upon him by the terms of said contract. With regard to the degree of mutuality required in a contract, in order to warrant its enforcement at the hands of a court of equity, the authorities are, unfortunately, not harmonious. There are cases in this country which hold that unilateral agreements, like the one under consideration, are mere wagers, and will not be enforced, either at law, or in courts of equity. See Maynard v. Brown, 41 Mich. 298. But the true rule is believed to be that want of mutuality, in such cases, is not a valid objection, even to decree of specific performance, where the moving party had performed all of the conditions imposed upon him, and brought himself clearly within the terms of the agreement. See Van Doren v. Robinson, 16 N. J. Eq. 259; Green v. Richards, 28 N. J. Eq. 82; Reynolds v. O'Neil, 26 N. J. Eq. 223; Johnston v. Trippe, 38 Fed. Rep. 580; Schields v. Horbach, 80 Neb. 536; Fry, Spec. Perf. 291.

Perhaps the leading case in this country is Clason v. Bailey, 14 Johns. 484, where Chancellor Kent was at first disposed to follow Lord Redesdale in Lawrenson v. Butler, 1 Sch. & Lef. 18; but, upon a careful review of the authorities, he concluded that the contrary doctrine was firmly established in the English courts. Our conclusion is that the answer alleges such an acceptance of the agreement, and performance of its conditions, as to bring this case clearly within the rule stated.

4. It is next argued that the evidence does not prove that defendant went into possession under the contract of sale. It is conceded that he was in possession, as tenant of Jones, at the date of the contract. It is a well-established rule that where one is in possession, as tenant at the time he contracts for the purchase of the demised premises, his subsequent possession will be presumed to be under the lease, unless it be clearly shown to result from the subsequent agreement. 1 Sugd. Vend. 162, 163; Johnston v. Glancy, 4 Blackf. 94, 28 Am. Dec. 24 L. R. A.

45; Mahana v. Blunt, 20 Iowa, 142. The trial court, in several paragraphs, instructed the jury, in substance, that, in order to find for the defendant, they must be satisfied that he entered into possession under the contract of sale. The court might, with propriety, have added that the defendant's subsequent possession was presumed to be under his lease, especially since it, by its terms, did not expire until some months thereafter. But, as no such instructions were tendered by the plaintiff, the inference is that he was satisfied with that feature of the charge. The jury evidently found that the defendant held under the contract, and not the lease; and with that finding we cannot interfere, for reasons which will be stated in the consideration of the application of the statute of frauds to the contract in question.

5. Plaintiff offered to prove by a witness called to testify in rebuttal that the defendant had sold the contract relied on to Mr. Imhoff, and had, in pursuance of said sale, placed it in the hands of the witness; that Imhoff, had paid to plaintiff $200, and agreed to pay the further sum of $800 therefor; and that plaintiff had "surreptitiously obtained said contract" from the witness while the latter was holding it for Imhoff. This evidence was excluded, on the objection of the defendant, which ruling is assigned as error. The plaintiff in ejectment must recover on the strength of his own title, and cannot rely upon the weakness of that shown by his adversary. Butler v. Davis, 5 Neb. 521. If the contract had been so far executed by the defendant as to entitle him to possession thereunder, it would not avail the plaintiff to prove that a stranger had subsequently acquired rights which would entitle the latter to possession, as against him. The trial court, therefore, did not err in excluding the evidence offered.

6. Several paragraphs of the instructions are assailed on the ground that the question of ratification by Jones of Burr's act in executing the contract was thereby submitted to the jury, whereas it was not presented by the pleadings. In other words, it is contended that ratification by a principal of the unauthorized act of his agent must be specially pleaded by the party asserting it. The authorities cited in support of this proposition are all, we believe, cases involving the question of estoppel, and therefore not in point, while it has been held that an averment in a pleading that an agent was duly authorized by his principal is sustained by proof of subsequent ratification. Hoyt v. Thompson, 19 N. Y. 207; Hubbard v. Williamstown, 61 Wis. 400.

7. The question of Burr's authority to execute the contract mentioned was presented, both during the trial, and by requests to instruct. It is provided by section 8 of our Statute of Frauds that "no estate or interest in land other than leases for a term not exceeding one year, nor any trust over or power concerning lands or in any manner relating thereto, shall hereafter be created, granted, assigned, or surrendered or declared unless by act or operation of law or by deed of conveyance in writing subscribed by the party creating, granting, assigning or surrendering or declaring the same." Comp. Stat. chap. 82. And by section 25 it is provided that "every instrument required by any of the provisions of this chapter to be subscribed by any person may be subscribed by his agent thereunto authorized by writing." These provisions were construed together in Morgan v. Bergen, 8 Neb. 209, where it was held that a written agreement executed in behalf of his principal by an agent did not satisfy the requirement of the statute, but that the authority of the latter must also be in writing. To this, which is, without doubt, the general rule, there are recognized exceptions, some of which will now be noticed: In McMurtry v. Brown, 6 Neb. 375, it is said: "The character of a power under which an agent may execute a deed for another depends upon the presence or absence of the principal. If it is signed in his presence, and by his direction, an oral request to do the act is all that is required." And the rule, as there stated, is sustained by the decided weight of authority. See Gardner v. Gardner, 5 Cush. 483, 52 Am. Dec. 740; Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Brown, 30 N. J. Eq. 193; Story, Ag. § 512; 2 Greenl. Ev. 295.

According to the testimony of the defendant, the agreement under consideration was prepared and signed in the presence of Jones, and in accordance with his personal direction. The question of authority was therefore properly submitted to the jury. Another exception to the general rule is where the vendor in a parol agreement for the sale of land puts the purchaser in possession, and the latter, while holding under such agreement, and induced thereby, makes valuable and lasting improvements upon the premises. In such case the purchaser may, upon tendering the consideration price, demand a specific performance of the contract, or may rely upon such facts to defeat an action of ejectment by the vendor, although in default of payment of the purchase money. Pom. Eq. Jur. 1409. The defendant testified that upon the execution of the contract he took immediate possession of the premises, and built thereon a house (24 by 60 feet, and 16 feet high), barn and windmill; that he dug three wells on the land), set out trees, and broke up a part of it,—which improvements are of the value of \$5,000. He also testified that, while engaged in the erection of the house above described he was visited by Jones, who, although aware of said improvements, made no objection thereto. It is conceded that defendant, on the 1st day of June, 1887, tendered to Mr. Burr, who executed the agreement of sale as agent of Jones, the sum of \$100, being the first payment to mature under said agreement. This tender was refused by Burr for reasons assigned in writing as follows: "Lincoln, Neb., June 1, 1887. I hereby acknowledge tender to me of \$100 by Jas. A. Baker, J. E. Jones, under a pretended contract of his, dated May 25, 1886, involving the undivided  $\frac{1}{2}$  of S. 2, N. W. 4, Sec. 14, T. 10 N., R. 6 E., Lancaster Co., Neb., for the reason that I am not the agent of the said James E. Jones, nor authorized to receive any money for him for any purpose whatsoever. C. C. Burr." Defendant made repeated but unsuccessful efforts to find Jones, who, it seems, had left about that time for his home in England. Finally, he was referred to a Mr. Muff, of Crete, as the person to receive payment of the sum due, to whom he offered settlement, but which was refused, on the advice of Mr. Burr, to the effect that the agreement was not binding on Jones. Again, in the year 1890, defendant tendered the plaintiff the full amount due by the terms of the contract, which was also refused. The making of the improvements enumerated does not appear to have been controverted on the trial. Defendant is corroborated to some extent by Mr. Strode, who was present at a conversation of the former with Jones in May, 1890, when the latter, referring to the amount alleged to be due on the contract, remarked that he wanted all of the money. Although this evidence was contradicted on the trial by the testimony of Jones, who is, to some extent, corroborated by other evidence, the question was properly submitted to the jury.

8. It is strenuously argued that the verdict is not supported by the evidence. It is sufficient to say that the evidence is conflicting, and, while we might have reached a conclusion different from that of the jury, we cannot now disturb the judgment based upon the verdict without overruling a multitude of cases which assert a rule as salutary as it is well established, viz., that this court will not reverse a judgment on account of mere difference of opinion between ourselves and the trial court on questions of fact.

HASTINGS PROSPECTING CO.

(.....NEB.....)

- *1. The plaintiffs in error were sued on a writing signed by them, as follows: "For the purpose of organizing a corporation . . . to bore for gas, we, the undersigned, agree to subscribe and pay for the amount of stock set opposite our names . . . within thirty days from the organization of said corporation." Held, that by this writing the plaintiffs in error promised to take and pay for stock of a corporation de jure, not of a corporation de facto, thereafter to be organized.
2. A de jure corporation is one whose right to exercise a corporate function would prove invulnerable if assailed by the state in quo warranto proceedings.
3. The Hastings Prospecting Company was organized for the purpose of boring for gas; its articles of association fixed its principal place of business in Adams county, Neb.; it did not file its articles of incorporation in the office of the county clerk of said Adams county. Held, that by such default it failed to become a corporation de jure.

5. A subscription of stock to preliminary articles of association, not purporting to be a contract with an existing corporation, does not estop the subscriber from afterwards denying the legal existence of the corporation in a suit by the alleged corporation upon the subscription.

(May 2, 1894.)

ERROR to the District Court for Adams County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to have been subscribed by defendants, to the plaintiff company. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Capps, McCreary & Stevens, for plaintiffs in error:

A contract with a mere fictitious person is a nullity. Nor is it otherwise, though the non-existing person or corporation comes afterwards into existence.

Bishop, Cont. enlarged ed. § 886; Re Empress Engineering Co. L. R. 16 Ch. Div. 125; Glass v. Glass, 71 Ind. 392.

A mere offer or promise not accepted involves no concurrence of wills, and it can never constitute a contract.

It was agreed that plaintiffs in error should obtain for their agreement to subscribe for stock and as the consideration thereof, all the rights secured by it (the contemplated corporation) of membership in the corporation contemplated, and the rights and interests accruing from such membership. When these rights are not secured by the agreement to take stock, it is wanting in consideration, as are notes or any other obligations which might be given for the payment of subscription.

Grangers Life & Health Ins. Co. v. Kamper, 78 Ala. 325; Scovill v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 148, 26 L. ed. 968.

Defendant in error is not and never was an organized corporation.

Section 126 provides that the "corporation previous to the commencement of any business, except its own organization, . . . must adopt articles of incorporation and have them recorded in the office of the county clerk of the county, or counties, in which the business is to be transacted."

These requirements are expressed in affirmative language.

See Dubuque Dist. Twp. v. Dubuque, 7 Iowa, 276.

Affirmative expressions that introduced a new rule imply a negative of all that is not within the purview.

The general law under which the association is formed and the articles of incorporation adopted and filed as required, taken together, are in law considered in the nature of a grant from the state, and as a charter of the company.

Abbott v. Omaha Smelting & Ref. Co. 4 Neb. 419.

Any material omission will be fatal to the existence of the corporation, and may be taken 24 L. R. A.

Mokelumne Hill Canal & Min. Co. v. Woodbury, 14 Cal. 427, 78 Am. Dec. 658.

It may be argued by defendant in error that its promoters did organize, and that our agreement was "to subscribe and pay for stock within thirty days from the date of the organization of said corporation."

The reply to this is that there could eventuate no organization except a legally organized corporation.

Livesey v. Omaha Hotel Co. 5 Neb. 50; Estabrook v. Omaha Hotel Co. Id. 76; Abbott v. Omaha Smelting & Ref. Co. supra.

The agreement in question contains two conditions precedent: first, corporate existence; second, organizing a corporation with a capital stock of $15,000, subscribed for. Neither of these conditions precedent have been complied with as is fully shown by the evidence. Defendant in error must fail to recover in this case.

The agreement is a mere proposition to subscribe for the stock in question upon certain conditions after the charter should have been obtained and the corporation organized. The agreement was not enforceable.

Ward v. Brigham, 127 Mass. 24.

Messrs. Batty, Casto & Dungan for defendant in error.

Ragan, C., filed the following opinion:
The Hastings Prospecting Company sued Lucius J. Capps and Willis P. McCreary, copartners doing business under the name, firm, and style of Capps & McCreary, in the district court of Adams county, on a subscription or writing obligatory signed by them, in words and figures as follows: "For the purpose of organizing a corporation with a capital stock of $15,000 to bore for gas, oil, or coal, at or near the city of Hastings, Adams county, Nebraska, and to buy or lease the land to experiment thereon for such purposes, and to buy, lease, or hire the necessary machinery and labor for such purposes, we, the undersigned, agree to subscribe and pay for the amount of stock set opposite our names; said stock to be paid for in the manner following, to wit: Ten per cent within thirty days from the organization of said corporation, and the balance at the call of the directors: provided, that said directors shall not have power to call for more than 10 per cent of said stock at any one time, and provided, further, that payment shall not be called for oftener than once a month.

Names.	Number of Shares.	Dollars.
Capps & McCreary.	Ten Shares.	100.00."

The case was tried to the court, a jury being waived, resulting in a finding and judgment in favor of the prospecting company; and Capps & McCreary bring the case here for review.

The only errors assigned are that the findings and judgment of the court are contrary to the evidence and the law. The undisputed evidence in the case is that the plaintiffs in error, and a number of other citizens, signed the subscription paper quoted above; that, after the $15,000 of stock had been subscribed, the subscribers, or some of them, met and elected a board of directors, adopted articles of incorporation, and filed a copy of the same in the office of the secretary of state, and the original in the office of the register of deeds of Adams county, the county in which the principal place of business was fixed by the articles of association. This incorporation, or attempted incorporation, occurred on the 15th day of April, 1889. The articles of incorporation were never filed in the office of the county clerk of Adams county. We have here, then, the questions: (1) Whether the prospecting company failed to become, as it attempted, a corporation de jure, by neglecting to file in the office of the county clerk its articles of incorporation; (2) and, if it did, whether such default or failure on the part of the prospecting company is available as a defense to the plaintiffs in error.

The first inquiry which presents itself is as to the nature of the agreement which the plaintiffs in error signed. What did they promise to do? We think a fair construction of the writing signed by them amounts to this: that they agreed to accept and pay for ten shares of the capital stock of the corporation the subscribers to the enterprise of boring for gas should organize, such payment to be made within thirty days after such corporation should be organized.

The next inquiry is, What is meant by the expression "when the corporation shall be organized?" It must be remembered that the plaintiffs in error agreed to become stockholders in the corporation that should be formed, and a fair construction of this promise is that they meant to become stockholders in a corporation de jure, and not a corporation de facto. A de jure corporation is one whose right to exercise a corporate function would prove invulnerable if assailed by the state in quo warranto proceedings. The plaintiffs in error might have been willing to invest a part of their capital towards a public enterprise, and take their chances of the investment being remunerative, if no further liability would attach to them than that of stockholders in a de jure corporation, when they would not have embarked the same money for the same purpose in a partnership or a de facto corporation, where they would assume liabilities greater than those of stockholders in a de jure corporation. We hold, then, that by the subscription signed by the plaintiffs in error they promised to take and pay for ten shares of the capital stock of such de jure corporation as might be formed for the purpose for which the subscription was made. Is the Hastings Prospecting Company, or has it ever been, a de jure corporation? It is admitted that it did not file in the office of the county clerk of Adams county—that being the county in which its articles of incorporation fixed its principal place of business—its articles of incorporation. Did this default prevent the Hastings Prospecting Company from becoming a corporation de jure? The authorities are not entirely in harmony on this question, but the weight of authority is that, where the statute requires the articles of incorporation to be filed with some public officer before the commencement by the proposed corporation of the business for which it is organized, such filing is a condition precedent to the right of such corporation to perform any corporate function; consequently, until a compliance with the statute, the corporation has no valid existence as a de jure corporation. Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 27, says: "A substantial compliance with all the terms of a general incorporation law is a prerequisite of the right of forming a corporation under it. Thus, where it is provided that a certificate or articles of association, setting forth the purposes of the corporation about to be formed, the amount of its capital, and other details, shall be filed with some public officer, a performance of this requirement is essential; and, until it has been performed, the association will have no right whatever to assume corporate franchises." Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 231, speaking of this same subject says: "Occasionally, however, it happens that this certificate is not fully made out, as required by statute, or is not filed, or some other step prescribed by law is not complied with. The corporation is then not duly incorporated, and the state, by quo warranto, may oust it from its user of corporate franchises." In Doyle v. Mizner, 42 Mich. 332, it was ruled: "All private corporations must be organized under general laws, and can be valid only when strictly conforming to all the conditions imposed on their completion." The court says: "The incorporation was sought to be shown by asking Doyle, on cross-examination, concerning the signing of a paper purporting to be articles of incorporation, which had been filed in the Detroit city clerk's office, April 6, 1875. This paper was not acknowledged, and was not filed in the county clerk's office.

The statute concerning manufacturing corporations expressly requires that the articles shall be 'acknowledged before some person authorized by the laws of this state to take acknowledgments of deeds;' and, before any such corporation shall commence business, the articles shall be filed with the secretary of state and county clerk." And the court held that, by reason of the failure to acknowledge and file in the office of the county clerk the articles of incorporation, the association did not become a corporation de jure. To the same effect are Stowe v. Flagg, 73 Ill. 397; Bigelow v. Gregory, 73 Ill. 197; Utley v. Union Tool Co. 11 Gray. 139; Unity Ins. Co. v. Cram, 43 N. H. 636; Childs v. Smith, 46 N. Y. 34; Harris v. McGregor, 29 Cal. 125. Comp. Stat. 1893, chap. 16, § 128, provides: "Every corporation previous to the commencement of any business, except its own organization, when the same is not formed by legislative enactment, must adopt articles of incorporation and have them recorded in the office of the county clerk of the county . . . in which the business is to be transacted." Section 132 of said chapter provides: "Any corporation formed without legislative enactment may commence business as soon as its articles of incorporation are filed by the county clerks of the counties as required by this subdivision and shall be valid if a copy of its articles be filed in the office of the secretary of state and the notice required be published within four months from the time of filing such articles in the clerk's office." These two sections of the statute, read together, leave little room for doubt that the filing of the articles of incorporation in the office of the county clerk is one of the things required to make the corporation one de jure. To organize a corporation there must be subscribers to the stock; a meeting of said subscribers, or some of them; the adoption of articles of association for the government of the proposed corporation, and such articles must be filed in the office of the county clerk of the county in which is fixed the corporation's principal place of business. These sections of the statute quoted above were construed by this court in Abbott v. Omaha Smelting & Ref. Co., 4 Neb. 416, and it was there said: "In this state the filing of articles of incorporation with the county clerk is a condition precedent to the existence of any corporate franchise. The law and the articles so filed, taken together, are considered in the nature of a grant from the state, and constitute the charter of the company." A corporate franchise is a privilege, a power, a right. It is a very different thing from the performance of any step necessary to the organization.

In Indianapolis Furnace & Min. Co. v. Herkimer, 46 Ind. 142, the question we are considering arose, and was decided by the supreme court of Indiana under a statute substantially like the one we have quoted above, and the court said: "The signing of articles of association by parties proposing to form a corporation does not create such corporation; the subscribers must also make, sign, and acknowledge the certificate of incorporation prescribed [by the statute], and must file the same in the recorder's office of the proper county." We think, therefore, that the Hastings Prospecting Company, the name of the corporation attempted to be organized by the subscribers who signed the subscription on which the plaintiffs in error are sued, is not, and has never been, a corporation de jure.

2. Is that fact available to the plaintiffs in error as a defense to this suit? It is to be borne in mind that the plaintiffs in error did not subscribe for the stock of any corporation, either de facto or de jure, then in existence; and there is a distinction as to the liability of parties for subscriptions to a corporation or an association which assumes to be, and is, acting as a corporation, and the liability for subscriptions made by parties for the purpose of organizing a corporation from among the subscribers. If the subscription made by Capps & McCreary had been made to the Hastings Prospecting Company when it was acting as a corporation, when it was exercising the functions of a corporation, when it was claiming to be a corporation, and had their agreement been to pay such corporation certain sums of money for certain shares of its stock, it seems that they would then be estopped from setting up as a defense that the prospecting company was not a corporation de jure. Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 186, and cases there cited. Morawetz, Private Corporations, § 67, thus lays down the rule in such cases: "Every subscription [to the stock of a corporation to be organized] by implication refers to and incorporates the terms of the charter or general law under which the corporation is to be formed; and every subscriber agrees to become associated with the others only upon condition that the formalities prescribed by the charter shall be observed in making the mutual contract. Thus, if certain preliminaries, such as the filing of a certificate, are required to be performed after the articles of association have been subscribed, but before the corporation shall be in existence, the contract of membership does not go into effect until these formalities are complied with; and the subscriber to the articles cannot until then be made to contribute the amount of his subscription." In Rikhoff v. Brown's Rotary Shuttle Sewing Mach. Co., 68 Ind. 388, it was held: "A subscription of stock to preliminary articles of association, not purporting to be a contract with an existing corporation, does not estop the subscriber to afterwards deny the existence of the corporation in a suit upon the subscription." See also Indianapolis Furnace & Min. Co. v. Herkimer, 46 Ind. 142, where it is said: "Until the statutory requirements to organize a corporation have been complied with a subscriber to the articles of association is not estopped to deny the existence of the corporation." See also Dorris v. Sweeney, 60 N. Y. 463. We think these authorities are decisive of the case under consideration. The rule they lay down is sound law, good sense, and exact justice. If the plaintiffs in error are to pay for the stock subscribed, it of course follows that they become entitled to the stock. This would make them stockholders in a de facto corporation, and liable as copartners, whereas their contract was to become liable as stockholders. The plaintiffs in error have not broken their promise.

CITY NATIONAL BANK OF HASTINGS.

(.....Neb.....)

*1. While a national bank may not lend its credit for the accommodation of others, still it may guarantee the payment of commercial paper as incidental to the exercise of its power to buy and sell the same.

2. A., being indebted to a national bank, and being the holder of certain negotiable notes, indorsed them generally, and delivered them to the president of the bank, who negotiated them for value to C., at the same time executing in the name of the bank a written guaranty of payment. From the proceeds of the sale, A.'s debt to the bank was canceled. Held, following People's Bank of Belleville v. Manufacturers' Nat. Bank of Chicago, 101 U. S. 181, 25 L. ed. 907: First, that the guaranteeing of the notes under such circumstances was within the powers of the bank; second, that the authority of the president to execute the guaranty would be conclusively presumed in favor of the purchaser acting without notice to the contrary; third, that the retention and enjoyment by the bank of the proceeds of such transaction constituted a ratification of the president's act.

3. Where the evidence on behalf of the plaintiff suing upon such a guaranty tended to establish the state of facts set forth in the foregoing paragraph, it was error for the trial court, in the giving and refusal of instructions, to withhold from the jury the law as above stated.

Irvine, C., filed the following opinion:

The plaintiff in error sued the defendant in error, a national bank, alleging that on January 21, 1889, one Elsmore and one Knowlton made and delivered to Charles H. Paul certain promissory notes secured by real estate mortgage of the same date. That Paul, in the ordinary course of business, indorsed and delivered the notes to the bank. That the bank executed and delivered to plaintiff a guaranty as follows: "For value received, we hereby assign and transfer the within note to Joseph Thomas, trustee, and guaranty payment of the principal and interest on the same on the terms and conditions stipulated in the mortgage of even date securing the same."

{ City National Bank of } [Seal.]
{ Hastings, Neb. }

City National Bank, Hastings, Nebr.,
"By H. Bostwick, Pt."

That the foregoing contract was written upon each of said notes, and that plaintiff, relying thereon, and on the delivery of said notes and mortgage to him, paid over to the bank $10,500 as consideration therefor, which money was transmitted by certain bills of exchange which were duly indorsed, received, accepted, used, and transmitted to the credit of the bank. The petition then avers a default in payment, and the insolvency of the makers, and prays judgment upon the contracts of guaranty. The bank admitted the execution and delivery of the notes and mortgage, but denied the default of payment. This defense was, however, waived on the trial. As a second defense, it denied the indorsement or transfer of the notes to the bank, or that the bank was ever the owner thereof; denied its execution of the guaranty; denied that it authorized the guaranty to be executed; and denied the payment of any money by the plaintiff, to the bank. It then alleged that Bostwick (who is shown to have been the president of the bank), without any right or authority, and solely for the accommodation of a partnership of which he (Paul) and the makers of the notes were all members, wrote the transfer and guaranty upon the notes, and thereby forged the signature of the bank. As a third defense, substantially the same allegations are repeated, and the defense of ultra vires set up. There was a fourth defense pleaded, but it was evidently abandoned in the district court, and has not been referred to in the argument here. The evidence on the part of the plaintiff tended to show that the notes and mortgage were made and delivered to Paul in payment for an interest in a brickyard; that Paul was then indebted to the bank in the sum of about $7,000, $5,000 of which seems to have grown out of the brickyard business, but constituted a debt which Paul testifies he had individually assumed. Bostwick, the president of the bank, took the notes and mortgage. Paul having indorsed the notes, sold them to the plaintiff, writing the guaranty thereon before their transmission. The payment was made by two drafts of the National Bank of Commerce of Kansas City upon the National Bank of the Republic of New York. Each was drawn to the order of the defendant bank. Each draft bears the following indorsement: "Pay to the American Exchange Bank, New York, or order for collection, account of City National Bank, Hastings, Neb. J. M. Ferguson, Cashier." Ferguson was cashier of the defendant bank. He testifies he did not place the indorsement upon the drafts, and that he never saw them before the trial, but that it was not his duty to make such indorsements; that they were generally made by the remittance clerk. The drafts were paid, and from the proceeds Paul's debt to the bank was canceled, and the remainder passed to his credit. The method of bookkeeping pursued in order to accomplish this result is left doubtful by the evidence. But the evidence is uncontradicted that this result was reached. Subsequently, one note of the series was paid plaintiff in a draft through the City National Bank. A letter signed by Bostwick indicating that the bank paid it was excluded from evidence. The theory of the plaintiff is that the guaranty was within the scope of the bank's authority and that of the president, but, if not so, the bank, having adopted the benefit of the transaction by receiving the proceeds in satisfaction of Paul's debt, Bostwick's acts were ratified. The theory of the defendant is that the arrangement was a scheme between Bostwick, the makers, and the payee of the notes, constituting the brick company, to obtain money; that the bank never owned the notes; and that the president's act was not within the scope of his authority, but amounted to a forgery, committed by him while acting individually, and that the guaranty was, in any event, a pledge of the bank's credit, and ultra vires. From Rich v. State Nat. Bank of Lincoln, 7 Neb. 201, 29 Am. Rep. 882, we quote the following: "As a general rule, the officers of a bank are held out to the public as having authority to act according to the usage and course of business of such institutions, and their acts, within the scope of their authority, bind the bank in favor of third persons having no knowledge to the contrary." "And it may also be laid down as a rule that no officer of a bank can bind it by a promise to pay a debt which the corporation does not owe, and was not liable to pay, unless the bank authorize or has ratified the act."

In People's Bank of Belleville v. Manufacturers' Nat. Bank of Chicago, 101 U. S. 181, 25 L. ed. 907, one Pickett made his notes for $50,000, payable to his own order, indorsed them, and delivered them to the national bank, to be negotiated to the plaintiff. The vice-president of the national bank, with the knowledge and consent of the president and cashier, but without any authority from the board of directors, or from a majority of them as individuals, transmitted the notes to the plaintiff, with a written guaranty signed by himself. The plaintiff's account with the defendant was debited with $50,000 on account of the notes. At the same time Pickett's papers held by the defendant was canceled to the same amount. It will be observed that in all its essential features this case was similar to the one under consideration, according to plaintiff's theory of the facts. The language of Mr. Justice Swayne in that case is therefore entirely appropriate to this, and, so far as it concerns the law of the case, we quote it entire in lieu of an original discussion: "The National Bank Act (Rev. Stat. p. 993, § 5186) gives to every bank created under it the right 'to exercise by its board of directors, or duly authorized agents, all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking, by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bill of exchange, and other evidences of debt, by receiving deposits,' etc. Nothing in the act explains or qualifies the terms italicized. To hand over with an indorsement and guaranty is one of the commonest modes of transferring the securities named. Undoubtedly a bank might indorse 'Waiving demand and notice,' and would be bound accordingly. A guaranty is a less onerous and stringent contract than that created by such an indorsement. We see no reason to doubt that, under the circumstances of this case, it was competent for the defendant to give the guaranty here in question. It is to be presumed the vice-president had rightfully the power he assumed to exercise, and the defendant is estopped to deny it. Where one of two innocent parties must suffer by the wrongful act of a third, he who gave the power to do the wrong must bear the burden of the consequence. The doctrine of ultra vires has no application in cases like this. Merchants Nat. Bank of Boston v. State Nat. Bank of Boston, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 604, 19 L. ed. 1008. All the parties engaged in the transaction, and the privies, were agents of the defendant. If there were any defects of authority on their part, the retention and enjoyment of the proceeds of the transaction by their principal constituted an acquiescence as effectual as would have been the most formal words. These facts conclude the defendant from resisting the demand of the plaintiff. Whart. Ag. § 89; Bigelow, Estoppel, 428; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Howard, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 892, 19 L. ed. 117; Kelsey v. Crawford County Nat. Bank, 69 Pa. 426; Baltimore & P. S. B. Co. v. McCutcheon, 18 Pa. 18. A different result would be a reproach to our jurisprudence." The case involving to a certain extent the construction of the national banking act, the decision referred to is probably binding upon this court, but, whether it is or not, we accept it as a correct statement of the law.

The errors assigned relate to the admission and exclusion of evidence, and to the giving and refusal of instructions. Some are not assigned with sufficient definiteness to permit a review. In ruling upon the evidence, the trial court seems to have proceeded upon the theory that the plaintiff had no right to rely upon the apparent authority of Bostwick, and that it was not competent to show a ratification by subsequent acts. In instructing the jury, he placed before it only the defendant's theory of the case, and assumed that there was evidence to show that the guaranty was merely for the accommodation of the parties to the notes, and not within the line of the bank's business. The instructions asked by plaintiff, and refused, were based upon competent testimony tending to establish his theory as we have outlined it, and were in language receiving direct support from the case of People's Bank of Belleville v.

Manufacturers' Nat. Bank of Chicago supra. In failing to submit the case in this aspect to the jury the court erred.

Reversed and remanded.

WYOMING SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Wyoming, ex rel. Harry B. HENDERSON,

Charles W. BURDICK, State Auditor.

(.....Wyo.....)

A continuing appropriation of the amount of the salary, which omission of annual appropriation will not affect, is made by a statute creating an office and fixing the salary in obedience to a constitutional mandate and requiring it to be paid by the treasurer in the same manner as other salaries of state officers are paid where the constitution provides that an officer's salary shall not be diminished during his term, although it also provides that no money shall be paid out of the treasury except on appropriations made by the legislature.

(June 1, 1898.)

PETITION for a writ of mandamus to compel defendant to draw a warrant upon the state treasurer in payment of relator's claim for salary as state examiner. Granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lacey & Van Devanter for relator.

Mr. Charles N. Potter, Atty-Gen., for respondent.

Groesbeck, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This proceeding invokes the original jurisdiction of this court, and is submitted on the petition of the relator for the writ, and the demurrer thereto. The following facts appear from the petition: The relator is the duly and regularly appointed and qualified state examiner of the state of Wyoming, and was such during the entire month of April, 1898. On the 18th day of May, 1898, he presented to the auditor of the state his bill and voucher, duly verified, against the state, for the sum of $166.66, the amount of his salary as state examiner for the month of April last past, and demanded a warrant upon the state treasurer in payment of the same. The auditor disallowed said claim, indorsing thereon, as cause for disallowance, that there was no appropriation by the second state legislature with which to pay said salary for the said month of April, 1898. Under section 27 of the Act providing for the office of state examiner, defining his powers and duties, prescribing his bond, and fixing his compensation, approved January 10, 1891 (Sess. Laws 1890-91, chap. 84), it is provided that the state examiner shall receive an annual salary of $2,000, which sum shall be paid by the treasurer in the same manner as other salaries and expenses of other state officers are paid. The salaries of other state officers, except such as are specifically required by law to be paid quarterly, are allowed by the auditor and paid by the treasurer of the state monthly. It is alleged in the petition that, in and by said section 27 of the Act referred to, the sum of $2,000 per annum is appropriated by the legislature and by law for the purpose of paying the salary of the state examiner, and so an amount of money sufficient to pay said salary due to the relator for said month of April, 1898, is in the treasury, and has been regularly appropriated by the legislature of the state, and by law, as required by the constitution of the state. The constitutional provision for this office is in the following words: "The legislature shall provide for a state examiner, who shall be appointed by the governor and confirmed by the senate. His duty shall be to examine the accounts of [the] state treasurer, supreme court clerks, district court clerks, and all county treasurers, and treasurers of such other public institutions as the law may require, and [he] shall perform such other duties as the legislature may prescribe. He shall report at least once a year, and oftener, if required, to such officers as are designated by the legislature. His compensation shall be fixed by law." Wyo. Const. art. 4, § 14. The act referred to, creating the office (Sess. Laws 1890-91, chap. 84), fixes the compensation in the following language: "Sec. 27. The state examiner shall receive an annual salary of two thousand dollars, and a contingent fund of not to exceed fourteen hundred dollars for the incidental expenses of his office, which same shall be paid by the treasurer of the state, in the same manner as other salaries and expenses of state officers are paid." The first state legislature made an appropriation "for state examiner from January tenth, eighteen hundred and ninety-one, four thousand dollars" (Sess. Laws 1890-91, chap. 61, § 2), the act being approved on the same day as the act fixing the compensation and duties of the state examiner. This appropriation was in the general appropriation bill for the expenses of the state government, and covered the period from the passage of the act until and including March 31, 1898. No appropriation was made in the appropriation act, or by any statute passed by the second legislature, for the salary or contingent expenses of the state examiner for the fiscal years and biennial term beginning March 31, 1898, and ending March 31, 1899, although appropriations were made to pay the salaries of all state officers except the veterinarian, the examiner, and the board of livestock commissioners. The claim of the relator is based wholly upon the provisions of section 27 of the Act creating the office of examiner, quoted supra.

The following are the provisions of the constitution relating to the payment of moneys from the treasury of the state: "Except for interest on [the] public debt, money shall be paid out of the treasury only on appropriations made by the legislature, and in no case otherwise than upon warrant drawn by the proper officer in pursuance of law." Article 3, § 85. "No money shall be paid out of the state treasury except upon appropriations by law, and on warrant drawn by the proper officer, and no bills, claims, accounts, or demands against the state, or any county or political subdivision, shall be audited, allowed, or paid, until a full itemized statement in writing, verified by affidavit, shall be filed with the officer or officers whose duty it may be to audit the same." Article 16, § 7. It will be seen that the first section quoted (art. 3, § 85) employs the words "appropriations made by the legislature," while the latter (art. 16, § 7) uses the term "appropriation by law." These terms "legislature" and "law" seem to be used as synonyms. They appear to be employed interchangeably, and are evidently so used in the section directing the creation of the office of state examiner (art. 4, § 14, supra), where the direction is that the "legislature" shall provide for the office; specifying, in the list of his duties, that he shall perform, such other duties as the "legislature" may prescribe, and providing that he shall examine such other public institutions as the "law" may require. His compensation shall be fixed by "law." The executive of the state is intrusted with a veto power by the constitution, which may be overridden by a vote of two thirds of the members elected to each house, and which may become an absolute veto, if the bill be not approved, in case it is presented to him within the last three days of the session, and he retains it without returning it, when he has fifteen days after the adjournment to approve or disapprove it. It certainly cannot be successfully contended that the legislature alone can enact any law without the assent of the governor, or by passing it with a two-thirds vote of the membership of each house, except where his veto becomes absolute by the failure to pass and present the bill to him in sufficient time for him to return it with his objection to the house where it originated. In other words, any appropriation, to be effective, must be a "law." Possibly, the meaning of these constitutional provisions, construed together, is that an appropriation must be made by statute, and not by the force of any constitutional provision. It is not necessary, however, to consider this question, as the appropriation in this case, if any there be, is made by a statute, and not by reason of any provision of the constitution.

Does section 27 of chapter 84 of the Session Laws of 1890-91, which provides for the compensation of the state examiner, make a valid appropriation for his salary? There is no provision in our constitution, as there is in the constitution of some states, requiring legislative appropriations annually or biennially to make funds in the treasury available for the payment of the ordinary expenses of the government. The limitation in the Federal Constitution is that "no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law." The object of this limitation, and that contained in the constitutions of the several states of similar import, is to secure to the legislative department the exclusive power of deciding how, when, and for what purposes the public funds shall be applied in carrying on the government. 2 Ops. Atty-Gen. U. S. 670. It had its origin in the British parliament, when the people of Great Britain, to provide against abuse by the king and his officers of the discretionary power with which they were vested, demanded that the public funds should not be drawn from the treasury except in accordance with express appropriations therefor made by parliament. Hallam, Const. Hist. 55. This was the fruit of the English revolution of 1688, which sent the king to Versailles, and changed the succession to the throne. This wise restraint has become a part of the fundamental law of nearly every state in the Union. It has been well said that these provisions were "obviously inserted to prevent the expenditure of the people's treasure without their consent, either as expressed by themselves in the organic law, or by their representatives in constitutional acts of legislation. To use the language of Justices Story (vol. 3, Com. § 1842), its purpose 'is to secure regularity, punctuality, and fidelity in the disbursements of the public money.' And, as said by Judge Tucker in his Commentaries, . . . all the expenses of the government being paid by the people, it is the right of the people, not only not to be taxed without their own consent, or that of their representatives freely chosen, but also to be actually consulted upon the disposal of the money.' Such a provision, says the same learned writer, 'forms a salutary check, not only upon the extravagance and profusion in which the executive department might indulge itself, and its adherents and dependents, but also against any misappropriation which a rapacious, ambitious, or otherwise unfaithful executive might be disposed to make. In those governments where the people are taxed by the executive, no such check can be interposed. The prince levies whatever sum he thinks proper, and would deem it sedition against him and his government if any account were required of him in what manner he had disposed of any part of them. Such is the difference between governments where there is responsibility and where there is none." Thomas v. Owens, 4 Md. 225. This opinion, which has been much cited, then proceeds to show that the constitutional provisions in that state, that the comptroller "shall receive" an annual salary of $2,500, was the expression of the will of the people in their written constitution, and must be obeyed, as the fiat of their supreme will. The constitution of Maryland inhibited the legislature from diminishing the salary of state officers, and on this point the court says: "Were it not for such a provision, the whole government would exist only by permission of the legislature. It can only be carried on through the instrumentality of individuals, and their services can only be obtained by being paid for. The framers of the constitution and the people who adopted it, aware of this, determined not to submit the durability of their work to the caprice, passion, or prejudice which possibly might, at times of great excitement, triumphantly rule the action of the legislature, and therefore wisely did the work themselves by ingrafting in the organic law a provision for the protection of those who should be charged with its execution; in other words, they made the appropriation."

In our state constitution, salaries provided for certain state officers, the governor, secretary of state, auditor, and treasurer, are temporarily fixed, "until otherwise provided by law," with the rule,—repeated in almost every instance where salaries are mentioned,—that such salaries shall not be increased or diminished during the period for which such officers were elected or appointed; and, in addition to this, there is the general rule prescribed that no law shall increase or diminish the salary of any public officer after his election or appointment. Article 3, § 32. This was intended to secure official independence, and to prevent the legislature from being assailed by the demands of importunate officials, to the detriment of public business. The stability and permanence of the salaries of public officials were guaranteed by the constitution, after once fixed, secure during the official term from legislative control. Converse County Comrs. v. Burns, 3 Wyo. 704-718. Although some courts seem to distinguish between salaries fixed by the constitution and those fixed by an unrepealed statute, it seems that this is a distinction more nice than wise. In either case, the people have given their assent to the measure,—in one method by their organic law, which they have accepted, adopted, and ratified by their votes, and in the other by their representatives in the legislature. The salaries are to be fixed by law, and all such officers, whether of the state, county, city, town, or school, "shall be paid fixed and definite salaries." Wyo. Const. art. 14, § 1. The law relating to the state examiner provides that he "shall receive" an annual salary of $2,000, and the constitution requires that his compensation shall be fixed by law, and shall be a fixed and definite salary, which shall not be increased or diminished after his election or appointment. It will be conceded that the second legislature could not have reduced his salary during his term, 24 L. R. A.

either by a direct act for that purpose or in an appropriation bill. It is equally clear that they could not take it away, directly or indirectly. An imperative direction to create the office is found in the constitution, and the same authority is bestowed in that instrument to fix the compensation. The first state legislature, in obedience to that mandate, did create the office, and fixed the compensation of the officer. This law has not been repealed. If the constitution had fixed the salary, and the time and manner of payment, there would have been no doubt, under the great weight of authority, that this would have been an appropriation made by "law," as the supreme law had so provided, and an act of the legislature, it seems, would have been unnecessary. State v. Hickman, 9 Mont. 870, 8 L. R. A. 408; citing, in support of this proposition, Thomas v. Owens, 4 Md. 189; Green v. Purnell, 12 Md. 333; State v. Weston, 4 Neb. 216. In this case (State v. Hickman) the Montana supreme court says upon this point: "We do not know of any rule to the contrary where the same constitutional provisions exist which are embodied in the supreme law of the state. An illustration of the principles which are applied where salaries of the officers are not prescribed by the constitution, and the case of Thomas v. Owens, supra, is not followed, may be found in Myers v. English, 9 Cal. 348." And, again: "We cannot add anything to the discussion of this vital proposition. The doctrines which were announced in Thomas v. Owens, supra, have been accepted for years without a question, and have remained inflexible under every test." In the California case Myers v. English, supra, the court declined to follow the ruling in Thomas v. Owens, but Field, J., did not concur with the other two judges in the opinion, although he did not expressly dissent. The court in the Montana case seems to think there was a difference in applying a direct constitutional provision providing for salaries of state officers and one made by a statute in force; but the California court held differently, and say: "But we think it must be conceded that the decision is a case in point, and sustains, fully, the position taken, notwithstanding this difference. The principle involved is the same." And, further: "But, with all due deference to the learned and distinguished jurists who decided the case of Thomas v. Owens, we are compelled to arrive at a different conclusion."

The opinions of the California supreme court have not been consistent on this subject, as appears in the note to the case of Carr v. State, 22 Am. St. Rep. 638, taken from 127 Ind. 204, [11 L. R. A. 370.] In the case of People v. Brooks, 16 Cal. 11, at page 28, the court announces this doctrine: "When the constitution, therefore, says that 'no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law,' it only means that no money shall be drawn except in pursuance of law." This decision was evidently not in harmony with Redding v. Bell, 4 Cal. 333, and Myers v. English, 9 Cal. 348, and it was apparently overruled in Stratton v. Green, 45 Cal. 149.

where the rule announced in Redding v. Bell, was "preferred;" but the later cases in that state are in harmony with the cases of People v. Brooks; Froll v. Dunn, 80 Cal. 220; and Humbert v. Dunn, 84 Cal. 57. See State v. Kenney, 10 Mont. 485. In the case of Humbert v. Dunn the relator was a member of an examining commission on rivers and harbors, and asked for a writ of mandate commanding the comptroller of the state to draw a warrant in favor of relator for $200 for salary as a member of said commission for the month of November, 1889, the same having been presented to the state board of examiners, and by them audited, allowed, and approved, and ordered paid out of any money in the state treasury not otherwise appropriated; the comptroller having refused to draw his warrant therefor. The court says that the usual formula, "There is hereby appropriated the sum of ——— dollars out of any moneys in the state treasury not otherwise appropriated for the payment of salaries," etc., is not found in the act, but the intention of the legislature was clearly manifested in the language used, which was that "each member ——— shall receive a salary of two thousand four hundred dollars per annum, payable monthly," and that it was to be paid out of any money in the state treasury not otherwise appropriated; and it held that there was nothing in such language indicating any intention to postpone the payment of the salaries of the commission until the next session of the legislature. In this case, as in the case of People v. Brooks, it was held that it is not essential to the validity of an appropriation that the usual formula, "There is hereby appropriated the sum," etc., or any of them, should be used, if the legislature fixed the amount of the claim, and designated its payment out of a certain fund. In Campbell v. State Soldiers & Sailors Monument Comrs., 115 Ind. 594, an act of the state legislature appropriating $200,000 for the erection of a soldiers' and sailors' monument, and providing a compensation for the commissioners and their secretary, was under consideration. It was held that the sum appropriated must be applied to the structural work of the monument, excluding incidental expenses and the compensation of the officers, and that these expenses and compensation could be paid under another statute, authorizing the auditor of state to draw warrants on the treasury for all moneys directed by law to be paid out of the treasury to public officers, or for any other object whatever, as the same become payable. The court says: "It is true, as claimed, that no money can be rightfully drawn from the treasury, except in pursuance of an appropriation made by law; but such an appropriation may be made impliedly, as well as expressly, and in general, as well as specific, terms. It may also be a continuing or fixed appropriation, as well as one for a temporary purpose or a limited period. The use of technical words in a statute making an appropriation is not necessary. There may be an appropriation of public moneys to a given purpose without in any manner designating the act as an appropriation. It may be said, generally, 24 L. R. A.

that a direction to the proper officer or officers to pay money out of the treasury on a given claim or class of claims, or for a given object, may by implication be held to be an appropriation of a sufficient amount of money to make the required payments. Ristine v. State, 20 Ind. 828." This case was affirmed in Henderson v. State Soldiers & Sailors Monument Comrs., 129 Ind. 92, 13 L. R. A. 169.

In State v. Weston, 6 Neb. 16, it was held that, as the provisions of the constitution of Nebraska were that no money could be drawn from the treasury except in pursuance of a "specific" appropriation made by law, there was no such specific appropriation made by a statute which provided for the compensation of an officer, or the incidental expenses of his office, and when they were to be paid, as the manner of payment and out of what particular fund they were to be paid was not mentioned, the statute being silent in that respect. A ruling to the same effect may be found in State v. Kenney, 10 Mont. 485, and the syllabus to the case indicates that the constitutional limitation in Montana is about the same as that of Nebraska. The word "specific" is omitted in the provision in our constitution; but, if it were not, the reasoning in the case of State v. Bordelon, 6 La. Ann. 68, seems to me to be clearer. It is said in the judgment of the district court, a view which was adopted by the supreme court: "Is the appropriation specific in the intent of the constitution? It is specific in the amount to be paid,—two thousand five hundred dollars a year. It is specific in the person to whom it is to be paid,—one or the other of the named officers, as the case may be. It is specific as to the time when the money is to be paid,—in each year during two years. It is specific as to the purpose for which it shall be used,—the maintenance of the Legion, [of the Louisiana militia] and certain other volunteer companies. It is specific as to the money out of which the same shall be paid,—any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated. In what other respects an appropriation could be constitutionally required to be specific has not been suggested by counsel, nor does it occur to the court. In the only sense, then, in which the words of the constitution can have any meaning, so as to distinguish a specific appropriation from any other appropriation, the present act seems to be as specific as it can possibly be made."

It was said in Reynolds v. Taylor, 48 Ala. 480, where the law fixing the compensation of marshal of the supreme court declared, "The annual salary of the marshal is two thousand dollars," and a general section of the code provided, in effect, that the salaries of all officers are payable monthly, notwithstanding the fact that the legislature had made an appropriation in another and later act for such officer at the rate of $1,000 per annum, it was held, under the authority of a case decided thirty years previous, Nichols v. Comptroller, 4 Stew. & P. 154, that, in order to authorize the comptroller to issue his warrant on the treasury for the amount of the salary, it was not necessary that there should be a special annual appropriation by act of the legislature, where there was a general law fixing the amount of the salary, and prescribing its payment at particular periods; and the court observed: "We are not aware that this decision has been doubted from that day to the present time." It has been no unusual thing for a legislature to adjourn without making appropriations for the salaries of state officials, or some of them, either through intention or mistake. In Colorado it was held by the attorney-general that a law fixing the salary of the adjutant general at $1,800 per year, payable monthly, the same as a general provision as to other state officers, constituted an appropriation, within the meaning of the constitution of that state, which closely resembles in this particular our fundamental law. This opinion says that "the case of People v. Spruance, 8 Colo. 580, might appear, from a casual reading, to be opposed to the proposition above, but a careful reading of this decision shows that it does not apply to any case of fixed salaries, such salaries being guaranteed by the constitution." Rep. Atty-Gen. Colo. 1890-91, p. 60, followed by the next attorney-general of that state, Rep. 1891-92, p. 23. The Indiana legislature failed to make any appropriation for the fiscal year ending October 31, 1888. The attorney-general of that state held that a general act providing that the officers named therein should be entitled to receive and charge for their services as such officers the salaries, fees, and compensation allowed and set out in the act, and this and other statutes, either "expressly appropriated the sums named, or provided that the officer shall receive the sum named as his salary, thereby creating an appropriation by force of the language used," according to the rules laid down in the opinion deduced from the decisions of the courts. Rep. and Ops. Atty-Gen. Ind. 1888, p. 155. These views of the law departments of these states seem to have been accepted without question and without a struggle in the courts.

But we have a ruling in this jurisdiction, made at an early day, which is directly in point. The legislature had failed to make a direct appropriation for the transportation of criminals. The supreme court of the territory held that a general law providing that the county commissioners, when it became necessary to transport, or to transport and provide for, any idiot, lunatic, insane, blind, deaf, deaf-mute, or criminal to any eastern asylum, school, or prison, should apply to the governor for pecuniary or other aid in such case; and, if the governor approved the application, he was authorized to call upon the auditor for a warrant upon the treasurer, in favor of the board of county commissioners, sufficient for the purpose, and it should be placed in the hands of the county commissioners, who should be officially and personally responsible for the proper application of such funds, as far as they might be able, — was a sufficient authority to compel the auditor to audit the proper account for the same, and to compel the treasurer either to pay the account when audited, or to certify, that there was no funds in the treasury to pay the same.

Donnellan v. Nicholls, 1 Wyo. 61. It was in effect held that the general statute met such emergencies as the one presented, — the failure of the legislature to appropriate money for such purposes in an appropriation bill. In the general appropriation act of the second legislature, making appropriations until March 31, 1895, which fails to provide for the salary and expenses of the veterinarian and the examiner (Sess. Laws 1893, chap. 22), section 48 provides that any and all balances remaining in the treasury on the 31st day of March, 1895, more than the outstanding obligations then contracted for, and properly payable from such appropriations, shall be converted into the general fund on that day, but excepted from the provisions of the section all balances in any special fund established by law, which are continued in their respective fund, and made available for their proper use. Section 49 of this Act repeals all inconsistent acts and parts of acts, and provides that "no money shall be paid out of the state treasury during the period covered by this act, and for the purposes hereinafter provided, in excess of the appropriations hereby made, or otherwise specially provided by law," etc. It seems, then, that the legislature intended that other appropriations theretofore made were to be paid, and other funds theretofore created were to remain intact, and subject to future disposition according to law, untrammelled by this general appropriation act. In addition to the constitutional provision, the territorial statutes continued in force after the admission of the state provide that no warrant shall be drawn by the auditor, or paid by the treasurer, unless the money has been previously appropriated by law, and, further, that in all cases where the law recognizes a claim for money against the territory (state), and no appropriation shall be made by law to pay the same, the auditor shall audit and adjust the same, and give the claimant a certificate of the amount therefor, under his official seal, if demanded, shall report the same to the legislature, with as little delay as possible. Wyo. Rev. Stat. §§ 1709, 1711. Another provision is that, in all cases of accounts audited and allowed against the territory (state), and in all cases of grants, salaries, pay, and expenses allowed by law, the auditor shall draw a warrant on the treasurer for the amount due, in the form set forth by the revenue department. Id. § 1708. The provision is for the issuing of the certificate of indebtedness by the auditor, where the law recognizes a claim against the state, but there is no appropriation to pay for it, or some portion of it. It seems that salaries "allowed by law" were not to be governed by this provision, but by that of another section, supra, where, in such case, the auditor shall draw his warrant upon the treasurer for the amount due. Under a statute in Alabama requiring the comptroller or auditor to examine and adjust the claims of all persons against the state, where provision for payment had been made by law, it was held that such a provision "manifestly refers to special claims against the state, and does not refer to the salaries of public officers, where not only the amount, but the time of payment, is determined by the general law." Reynolds v. Taylor, 43 Ala. 480.

The annual salary of the examiner must be paid by the treasurer of the state in the same manner as other salaries of state officers are paid. This indicates that the salary is to be paid out of the same fund as that from which other state officers are to be paid. It has never been the legislative custom in this jurisdiction to make biennial appropriations at each regular legislative session for all purposes, or to meet all the obligations of the state, contracted or incurred by statute. The acts for the maintenance of the university and the insane asylum each require the levy of a specific tax annually for such purpose, and this has been deemed a continuing appropriation. After the taking effect of these acts providing for such specific levies, no subsequent legislature has deemed it necessary to provide for the support of these institutions by direct appropriations therefor, or by renewing the tax; and the same may be said of the tax levied annually, pursuant to law, for the incidental expenses connected with the management of the capitol building. Interest on the public debt is paid without a direct appropriation therefor. The first state legislature provided for the compensation of presidential electors in a special act regulating their duties and time and place of meeting. No specific appropriation was made otherwise than by this act, and none was necessary, as the appropriation in the act itself was sufficient, and is a perpetual one, so long as the law is in force. It is clear that the act creating the office of state examiner does, in section 27 thereof, make an appropriation at least for the salary of such officer, which is a continuing appropriation. The appropriation is exact as to the amount of money, the person to whom it is to be paid, when it is to be paid,—that is, for each year,—and that the treasurer shall pay it. The direction to the treasurer to pay the amount of the annual salary of the examiner to that officer may be held by implication to be an appropriation of a sufficient amount of money to make the required payments. Campbell v. State Soldiers & Sailors Monument Comrs. 115 Ind. 594. The fund set apart and allotted to this purpose is the general fund of the state provided from the general revenue. The expenses of maintaining the state government are paramount to all others, and must be set apart before other claims are paid. Re Appropriations by General Assembly, 13 Colo. 816. It is true that no time of payment of the salary of the examiner is provided in the act, but I do not think this is material. It has been the custom to pay state officers in this state monthly, where there is no particular time prescribed by statute when they shall be paid, or at what intervals payments may be made on account of their salaries. This was conceded on argument, and is so alleged in the petition, which must be taken as true on demurrer. It can make no difference to the state that this method is pursued, and it may be left to the auditing department to fix such a rule of monthly payments, when there is no provision of the law to the contrary. There being no statutory or constitutional provision fixing the time of payment of certain state officers, including the examiner, the auditor and treasurer may very properly make a rule that the salaries of such officers may be paid monthly.

As has been indicated herein, the constitutional requirement that no money shall be paid from the treasury except by appropriations made by the legislature or by law means that no money shall be paid out of the treasury except in pursuance of some law. It inhibited the expenditure of public moneys at the mere caprice of those in power at their own pleasure, without authority derived from the sovereign people, as expressed by them, either in their written constitution, or by the consent of their representatives freely chosen, in their solemn enactment. The appropriation here made is by law and by the legislature, and that expressed will of the people, through their chosen representatives, stands unrepealed and unmodified. A law fixing the salary of a public officer cannot, under the constitution, be so modified or repealed as to increase or diminish his salary or emoluments after his election or appointment. In the United States it is conceded to be a fundamental axiom of government that the three great departments of government shall be kept separate, distinct, and independent of each other. As is well said by Chancellor Kent, at page 281 of volume 1 of his Commentaries: "It would be in vain to declare that the different departments of government should be kept separate and distinct, while the legislature possessed a discretionary control over the salaries of executive and judicial officers. This would be to disregard the voice of experience, and the operation of invariable principles of human conduct. A control over a man's living is, in most cases, a control over his actions." This power to deprive a public officer of his salary for a stated term ought not to be lodged in a single branch of the legislature, to such an extent that during a period of great political excitement, or through party rancor, or dislike of an official, by failure or refusal to make an appropriation for his salary, he might be singled out and shorn of the remuneration for his labors for a term or a portion of his term, in flagrant disregard of the constitutional provision securing him a definite and fixed salary, to be ascertained before he accepted the office. If a case arises where an officer has been derelict in his duties, or guilty of malfeasance in office, the methods prescribed by the organic or statutory law to secure his displacement or punishment should be pursued. If his salary cannot be diminished during any portion of his official term, it certainly cannot be withheld for a certain portion of his term by a failure to provide at each session of the legislature a sufficient sum to pay his salary, already fixed and appropriated by law. To hold otherwise is to say that the legislature, or one branch of it, at one session, may by nonaction suspend the operation of a public statute providing that an officer "shall receive" a certain, definite, and fixed salary, to be paid by the treasurer of the state, and thus deprive the state of his services, and in effect abolish the office, when it is created, and the compensation of the officer fixed, under a constitutional mandate. To grant this is to make all officials mendicants upon the bounty of the legislature, whenever that body meets, and to reduce the other departments of state to a condition of vassalage to one department,—a state of affairs abhorrent to the constitution, and in palpable violation of many of its express provisions. The act before us is in effect and operation an appropriation act, and it stands unrepealed and unmodified. It provides for the compensation of a public officer, and requires the treasurer to pay it. It does not require any other legislation, or a special appropriation at each biennial and regular session of the legislature, to keep it alive, and effective.

This proceeding was stated to be an amicable one, in order to determine the question, which the auditor did not wish to assume the responsibility of deciding. He was cited to show cause on this application why the writ should not run. The cause being submitted on demurrer to the petition, it must be overruled, and the peremptory writ must be allowed.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

JACKSONVILLE, TAMPA & KEY WEST R. CO., Appl.,

v.

(83 Fla. 608.)

* 1. The purpose of the provision of section 29 of article 16 of the Constitution, that compensation for property, appropriated to the use of any corporation or individual shall be ascertained by a jury of twelve men in a court of competent jurisdiction, as shall be prescribed by law, is that there shall be the concurrent judgment of the twelve as to what is just compensation. The legislature cannot make the judgment of less than twelve competent to answer the requirement of the constitution. The words, "as shall be prescribed by law," relate to procedure, and do not authorize any change or impairment of the agency by which compensation is to be fixed.

2. The provision that a majority of the jury of twelve may determine all matters before them, to be found in the Act of June 8, 1887, amending certain sections of the Act of February 12, 1885, regulating the condemnation of lands for the use of railroads, is in conflict with section 29 of article 16 of the Constitution, NOTE.—Constitutionality of verdict by less than all the jurors.

The necessity of the agreement of the entire panel of twelve jurors to render a valid verdict seems to have been one of the few legal principles which was so thoroughly settled in the early period of the formation of the English system of jurisprudence that few have been found with sufficient temerity to question it, within the period covered by the regular reports now extant.

There are a few references in books which pretend to be collections of legal principles in the early times to instances in which verdicts have been taken from a jury which was not unanimous.

An instance is cited in Fitzherbert, Abr. (Verdict, 40) where, in an action of trespass, eleven jurors agreed in finding the defendant not guilty, but the other would not agree to this, so the court received the verdict of the eleven and committed the other to prison; but Brooks' Abridgment (Jurors, 53), in citing the above comments by saying that this practice was not usual at the time of his writing. 23 Edw. III.

In 2 Hale, P. C. 297n. it is said that anciently the practice was if the twelve could not agree, to take both verdicts and have them fully recorded, and then give judgment according to the saying of the major part, citing Abbott of Kirkstede v. Edward de Eynocourt, 56 Hen. III., Rot. 29, in Dorso and Tristram v. Simenel, Pas. 14 Edw. I.

But in a case found in the book of assizes (Y. B. pt. 4), 41 Edw. III., pl. 11, it seems to be agreed that a verdict can be no verdict unless all the jurors are in accord, and although means were taken to coerce the recalcitrant juror in that case, which afterwards fell into disuse, the law seems to have been ever since settled in England that there must be an agreement of the jurors for a valid verdict.

Viner, Abr. title Trial (Y. B. pl. 6n.) says "for a verdict of eleven without the twelfth shall not be accepted," for which it cites Brooke, Trial, pl. 65, which in turn is stated to cite 49 Assize, 1. But Viner's citation cannot be traced, so that his statement must be received for what it is worth as authority. Viner cites several methods of coercing jurors, which were practiced in early days.

In Winsor v. Reg., 6 Best & S. 170, L. R. 1 Q. B. 289, 35 L. J. M. C. 121, 19 Jur. N. S. 91, 14 L. T. N. S. 195, 14 Week. Rep. 423, the lord chief justice states that "our ancestors insisted on unanimity as the essence of the verdict."

Such seems to have been the unquestioned law at the time of the formation of the constitutions under which the governments in this country are operated, and whenever the constitution guarantees a trial by jury, or by jury as formerly practiced, it seems to have been understood that the reference was to a jury of twelve who must agree in order to render a verdict. In fact, so universal has been the understanding that but few decisions have ever been rendered upon the question.

In Campbell v. Woldredge, Ga. Dec. pt. 2, 123, it is said that each member of the jury must agree to the verdict. A verdict found by a majority is illegal.

In Work v. State, 2 Ohio St. 306, 59 Am. Dec. 671, the court enters into quite an elaborate discussion of the question, and holds that the jury must be unanimous to render a verdict, and that case is cited as late as Kent v. Perkins, 36 Ohio St. 639.

In Cruger v. Hudson River R. Co. 12 N. Y. 198, the court in passing on the regularity of the formation of a commission to assess damages to property taken by eminent domain, says: "The term 'trial by jury,' as used in the constitution, means a jury of twelve men, whose verdict must be unanimous."

in so far as the latter section ordains that the compensation for property appropriated to the use of a corporation or individual shall be ascertained by a jury of twelve men in a court of competent jurisdiction, and is void; yet such void provision does not impair the validity or efficiency of the other provisions of the Act of 1887.

3. The Act of February 12, 1885, regulating the condemnation of lands for the use of railroads, provided that compensation should be ascertained by six disinterested freeholders, registered voters of the county, they being styled "commissioners." It was composed of nine sections, and was of itself a complete statute. The Constitution of 1885 became operative January 1, 1887. Held, that the provision of this constitution that compensation for property appropriated to the use of a corporation or individual shall be ascertained by a jury of twelve men, in a court of competent jurisdiction (section 20, article 16), did not have the effect to render the Act of 1885 incapable of amendment by legislation subsequent to the taking effect of the constitution, so as to make it conform to the provisions of section 20 of article 16 of the Constitution.

4. The Act of February 12, 1885, regulating the condemnation, of lands as amended by the Statute of June 8, 1887, does not offend the clause of the constitution prohibiting special or local laws for summoning grand or petit jurors.

5. A report of a jury, under the Act of February 12, 1885, regulating the condemnation of lands, as amended by the Act of June 8, 1887, was signed by each of the twelve jurors, but contained this statement: "This report and verdict are concurred in by ten of the jurors." Held, that the report was evidence that ten jurors, and no more, concurred in the finding.

6. That an appeal lies from an order of the circuit court dismissing a proceeding under the act for the condemnation of land for railroad purposes, as amended in 1887, has been adjudicated already in this cause.

APPEAL by complainant from an order of the Circuit Court for Volusia County dismissing proceedings instituted by the railroad company to condemn certain land for its right of way. Reversed.

On April 1, 1891, the Jacksonville, Tampa & Key West Railway Company filed a petition for the condemnation of a right of way over certain lands, stating that the company existed under the laws of the state, that the road of the company was then constructed on and across the lands in question, describing them, and that the lands were essential for the use of the corporation; that the corporation had made its survey, and maps thereof, by which its road was designated, and that it had located its road according to such survey, and had filed a certificate of such location, signed by the engineer of the corporation, in the office of the clerk of the circuit court for Volusia county; that the petitioner had acquired the right to use the land; was in possession of a portion of it, and that appellee was in possession of the balance, claiming, together with Helen Maria Adams, to own the land. The petition prayed for an order for summoning a jury to appraise and value the land and fix the amount of compensation to be paid to the owners, and for such further proceedings as were requisite to enable petitioner to hold the land for its purposes. The circuit judge made

And the principle of unanimity is also recognized in Weeks v. Hart, 24 Hun, 181.

In State v. Austin, 6 Wis. 205, the court says: "That the court should refuse to receive a verdict not fairly and unanimously agreed in."

In Scott v. Scott, 110 Pa. 387, it is said that less than the twelve jurors cannot render a verdict; the finding of a majority is not a verdict; yet it may be called a verdict and declared void.

In Lawrence v. Stearns, 11 Pick. 501, it is said that the only verdict which can be received and regarded as a complete and valid verdict of a jury upon which a judgment can be rendered is one which is assented to as the unanimous act of the jury.

The Opinion of the Justices, 41 N. H. 550, perhaps more nearly covers the exact point in question than any other. In it the court held that the legislature could not provide that a number of the petit jury, less than the whole, could render a verdict in a case where the constitution gives the right of trial by jury.

The numerous cases upon the question of the right to poll the jury recognize and grow out of this principle of unanimity, and in Bunn v. Hoyt, 3 Johns. 255, it is held that the jury may be sent back to agree.

When it was ascertained that two of the jurors had agreed to submit to the majority, but that the verdict found was not their verdict, the judgment entered thereon was set aside. Adkins v. Blake, 2 J. J. Marsh. 40.

A new trial was granted when one juror expressed his dissent at the time the verdict was opened. Perry v. Mays, 2 Bail. L. 354.

The question has arisen in at least two cases in territorial courts besides the case of Hines v. 24 L. R. A.

WHITE (Utah) post, 277, both of which are opposed to that decision.

In Kleinschmidt v. Dunphy, 1 Mont. 118, the court held that the trial by jury granted by the United States Constitution is a trial by a jury of twelve men, acting only in unanimity, and that a territorial act authorizing a verdict by agreement of nine was void. That case was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States. Dunphy v. Kleinschmidt, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 610, 20 L. ed. 223, but that court refused to pass upon this branch of the case. It was, however, followed on this point in Aylesworth v. Reece, 1 Mont. 200.

In Bradford v. Territory, 1 Okla. 366, it is held that a territorial legislature cannot authorize a verdict by a majority of the panel. In that case the court says that the principle that the verdict must be unanimous is so well settled at common law that they deem it unnecessary to cite authorities.

The rule requiring the unanimous agreement of the jurors has not, however, been entirely satisfactory and attempts have been made to devise means for permitting verdicts by a majority. In view of the above decisions the only one found feasible was a constitutional provision permitting it, and therefore there have been several such provisions recently inserted in state constitutions.

The new Constitution of California, 1879, provides that in civil actions three fourths of the jury may render a verdict. Majority verdicts are also permitted in Idaho, Louisiana, Nevada, South Dakota, Texas, Washington, and Montana, while in Wyoming the inviolability of the right to jury trial is guaranteed in criminal cases only. These provisions are, however, as yet mere experiments, and nothing definite can be stated as to their success.

H. P. F.

an order directing the sheriff to summon twelve disinterested freeholders, registered voters of Volusia county as a jury to meet at the courthouse at a day and hour stated to proceed under their oaths to take steps to appraise and value the land described in the petition and to fix the compensation to be awarded. The jury met and proceeded to view the land, heard the parties and appraised, ascertained and determined the value of the tract proposed to be taken, and the damage that would be sustained by the owner by reason of the taking, at $50, and fixed the amount of compensation to be made at that amount, and stated in their report that such "report and verdict are agreed in by ten of the jurors." The report was signed by the entire twelve. Defendants filed exceptions to this report which were sustained, and the court refused to order further proceedings on the ground of the unconstitutionality of the law authorizing the same, and dismissed the case.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. J. R. Parrott, Hamlin N. Stewart and T. M. Day, Jr., for appellants:

A statute may contain some unconstitutional provisions, "and yet the same act, having received the sanction of all the branches of the legislature, and being in the form of law, may contain other useful and salutary provisions, not obnoxious to any just constitutional exceptions. It would be inconsistent with all just principles of constitutional law to adjudge these enactments void because they are associated in the same act, but not connected with or dependent upon others which are unconstitutional."

Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 177.

A section or a part of a section of a statute providing a method by a corporation of exercising the right of compulsory purchase of land may be unconstitutional. If, however, there are sufficient independent provisions constitutional in their character to provide a complete method of proceeding, effect will be given to such last-named portions of the act, and the condemnation authorized.

State v. Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co. 20 Fla. 616.

It was the duty of the court to have referred the case to another jury to be tried under the rules and principles of law, and according to the intent of the legislature and the framers of the constitution, if any irregularity was found in the proceedings of the jury or their finding.

The provision of the statute for a majority verdict is not in conflict with the constitution.

The usual constitutional provision securing the right of trial by jury does not apply to condemnation cases.

Messrs. A. W. Cockrell & Son, for appellees:

In the absence of a confirmation of the report or verdict of the jury and the payment of the award and the entry consequent thereon of the rulings of the judge as the judgment or decree of the court, there is no basis, constitutional or statutory, upon which the supposed or actual jurisdiction of this court may be invoked by way of "appeal."

The jurisdiction, the power to hear and determine, was vested in the judge and not in the court.

Bryant v. Stearns, 16 Ala. 803.

If the verdict of the jury is not satisfactory to the corporation, it cannot become or be the basis of a judgment or decree of the court. At no stage is the proceeding as to the corporation, "in initium."

It is idle to contend that this statute, or the General Statutes, § 1, Acts February 10, 1832, § 1, chap. 3006, allow to the corporation an appeal from the action of the judge or jury which can never become effective, never become the judgment or decree of the court unless it is made so by the voluntary act of the corporation, clothed as to this particular proceeding with a delegated sovereignty.

Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. Ryan, 64 Miss. 399.

The woof and warp of the sections in terms amended by the Act of 1887 proceeded upon the theory that the property of the landowner could, as was the law under the constitution in force at the time, be divested by the act of six commissioners, had in conformity to that act, and confirmed by the circuit judge.

When, therefore, the constitution which became operative in January, 1887, in section 29, article 16, declared that the land owner could not be so divested of his property, the Act of 1885, as to these sections thus sought to be amended, was absolutely repealed.

The Act of 1887, as is shown by its title and by its terms, was merely amendatory of sections that had been theretofore repealed, sections constitutionally incapable of amendment, not the subject of amendment.

Louisville & N. R. Co. v. East St. Louis, 184 Ill. 656.

The Act of 1887, therefore, which sought to amend sections having at that time no legal existence, was absolutely void.

It was clearly the purpose of the Constitution of 1885 to enlarge the rights of the landowner in reference to his getting "full compensation," by ordaining its ascertainment, not by viewers or commissioners of appraisal, but by a "jury of twelve men in a court of competent jurisdiction, as shall be prescribed by law."

Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Hook, 118 Ill. 587.

The Act of 1887 then, had it not been amendatory to sections which at the time had no legal existence and therefore void, would be void, because it deprives the land owner of his constitutional right to have the question of his compensation tried by a jury.

Postal Tele. Cable Co. v. Alabama G. S. R. Co. 92 Ala. 331; Ex parte Reynolds, 52 Ark. 330.

Raney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The following provisions are to be found in our constitution: The right of trial by jury shall be secured to all, and remain inviolate forever—section 3, Declaration of Rights. The number of jurors for the trial of causes in any court may be fixed by law, but shall not be less than six in any case—section 38, article 5. No private property, nor right of way, shall be appropriated to the use of any corporation or individual until full compensation therefor shall be first made to the owner, or first secured to him by deposit of money; which compensation, irrespective of any benefit from any improvement proposed by such corporation or individual, shall be ascertained by a jury of twelve men in a court of competent jurisdiction, as shall be prescribed by law—section 29, article 16. This constitution became operative on January 1, 1887; and the statute regulating the condemnation of lands for the use of railroads, which was of force at this time was that of February 12, 1885, chapter 3595 of our laws. Under it the appraisement was to be made by "six disinterested freeholders, registered voters of the county in which the land is situated," the statute designating them as commissioners. The first legislature that assembled under the constitution referred to, enacted the Statute of June 8, 1887, chapter 3712, amending certain sections of the above Act of February 22, 1885, and providing that on the presentation of the petition the judge of the circuit court should make an order for the summoning of twelve disinterested freeholders, registered voters of the county in which the land is situated, "as a jury, to appraise and value the said land, on their oaths well and truly so to do, and to affix the amount of compensation to be made to the owner or owners of the land. It also provided that the jury should view the land described in the petition, hear the allegations of the parties, and appraise, ascertain, and determine the value of each tract or parcel of land proposed to be taken, with the value of the improvements thereon, and each separate estate therein, and the damage that will be sustained by the owner or owners by reason of the taking thereof, and they shall fix the amount of the compensation to be made to each of the owners thereof; and further: "A majority of the jury may determine all matters before them."

The Act of 1885 was composed of nine sections, and was, of itself, a complete act. The Act of 1887 is an act to amend the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh sections of the former statute. One of the contentions of Adams' counsel is that the Statute of 1885 was entirely repealed by the new constitution, as that statute provided for a divestiture of the owner's interest in the land by the act of six commissioners, and the constitution substituted the different agency of a jury as indicated above; and hence that the designated sections were incapable of amendment, and the Act of 1887 was absolutely void. In support of this contention such counsel cite the case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. East St. 24 L. R. A.

Louis, 184 Ill. 656, where, in 1889 a statute was passed which purported to amend a specified section of an Act approved April 10, 1872, but the stated section had been amended by the enactment of a distinct and complete section in 1887; and it was held that as the Amendment of 1887 was a repeal of the original section, such section was not in existence nor the subject of amendment in 1889, and hence that the amendment of 1889 was of no effect. To avoid any erroneous inference from the statement of the doctrine of this case we should not fail to remember that in Florida the adjudicated law is that where a section of a statute is amended expressly—as by an enactment that it "shall read as follows," the amendment desired following—the amendatory section becomes for future purposes, including those of subsequent amendment or repeal, the named section of the first act. Barnett v. Jacksonville, 19 Fla. 664; Saunders v. Provisional Municipality of Pensacola, 24 Fla. 226; Const. art. 3, § 15. However, we do not think that section 29 of article 16 of the Constitution, supra, had the effect to strike down or abrogate entirely the Act of 1885, or those sections of it amended by the Act of 1887; on the contrary, our judgment is that the stated section of the constitution merely rendered invalid and inoperative those clauses of the act which provided for an ascertainment of the damages by commissioners, and the act, as thus affected, was amendable to make it conform to the provisions of section 29 of article 16 of the Constitution. State v. Monmouth Pl. Road Co. 26 N. J. L. 99; State v. Seymour, 35 N. J. L. 47; Bonaparte v. Camden & A. R. Co. 1 Baldw. 205; McCauley v. Weller, 12 Cal. 500; Cairo & F. R. Co. v. Turner, 81 Ark. 494, 25 Am. Rep. 564. We find neither authority nor good reason to the contrary of this conclusion.

The purpose of the last-mentioned provision of our constitution (section 29 of article 16), in so far as it provides that the compensation to the land owner shall be ascertained by a jury of twelve men in a court of competent jurisdiction, is that there shall be the concurrent judgment of the twelve as to what is a just compensation in any case. We appreciate the arguments to the contrary founded upon both the existence of the former system of commissioners as the proper agency for fixing the damages, and the subordination of the same to the legislative will (Cruger v. Hudson River R. Co. 12 N. Y. 190; Menges v. Albany, 56 N. Y. 878), but our judgment is that the essential guaranty of the constitution in substituting for it a jury of twelve men was to secure to the landowner the protection of the judgment of this number; and to permit the judgment of a smaller number to control is not to be reconciled to either the meaning of the language used or to the intent shown by it, and the change which has been made. If the legislature can authorize a majority of the jury to ascertain the compensation or determine the matters before them, they can give the same power to less than a majority. A concession to the legislature of power to make the judgment of less than the entire twelve competent to answer the requirement of the constitution, is a surrender of all protection from the prescription of the stated number, and renders this feature of our organic law a useless declaration. The words "as shall be prescribed by law," at the end of the section relate to the procedure in such cases, but do not authorize any change or impairment of the agency by which the compensation is to be fixed.

In Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Hock, 118 Ill. 587, where the provision of the Constitution of 1870 was: "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation. Such compensation, when not made by the state, shall be ascertained by a jury, as shall be prescribed by law," and where it was held that the right to a jury might be waived, it was said that this section of the constitution "was no doubt intended as a new protection to the citizen—one not theretofore enjoyed—an additional safeguard placed in the hands of the citizen to which he might resort when a necessity seemed to exist to afford him full compensation for property" taken. To this we may add that to permit legislation doing away with the necessity for a concurrence of the twelve would, in our judgment, remove all "additional safeguard."

The provision of the Act of 1887: "A majority of the jury may determine all matters before them," at least as applied to fixing the amount of compensation to which the land owner is entitled, is void, but it is so distinct and severable from the other provisions of the statute as not to impair their validity or efficiency, or the practical operation of the statute as a means for condemning lands for the purposes contemplated and of ascertaining through the agency of a jury of twelve men in a court of competent jurisdiction, the amount of compensation to which the land owner is entitled. The decision and reasoning of this court in the cases of Donald v. State, 31 Fla. 255, and English v. State, Id. 840, are conclusive of this question. There a statute provided that every grand jury should consist of twelve persons, and the assent of eight of them be necessary to the finding of an indictment, and it was held the act was valid in so far as it provided that the jury should consist of twelve persons, although the clause requiring the assent of only eight to the finding of an indictment was declared to be unconstitutional and void.

It appears from the record before us that the report of the jury of their proceedings concerning the land in which is their verdict as to the amount or award of compensation due for the land is signed by each of the twelve persons, but it contains this statement: "This report and verdict are concurred in by ten of the jurors." We are unable to conclude that the fact of the signing of it by the twelve can be taken, notwithstanding the above statement, as evidence that the entire twelve concurred in the finding, but our judgment is that the signing of all is their attestation of the truth of what is stated in the body of the report, and that ten, but not more, concurred in the finding. The only natural and safe conclusion is that only ten concurred in it. There is no evidence that any more did. Because of the concurrence of only ten we think the judge should have refused to confirm the report.

The contention that the legislation under discussion offends section 20 of article 3 of the Constitution is unsound. That section ordains that the legislature shall not pass special or local laws providing for summoning grand and petit juries. This jury is neither a grand nor a petit jury in the sense in which those terms are there used. Such jurors as these constitute a distinct class of themselves and the statute is applicable to all cases of the class covered by the statute, and is neither special nor local in its operation or effect within the meaning of the named section of the constitution.

The Statute of 1887, section 5, provides that should the owner or owners show, on the hearing on the report, good cause why the report should not be confirmed, the judge shall refuse to confirm the same, and he shall order and cause to be taken such further proceedings in the matter not inconsistent with the act, as in his judgment right and justice demand. The judge erred in so far as his order declared the law to be unconstitutional and refused to order further proceedings under the act. In view of the conclusion of this opinion as to the majority clause set out above there should have been further proceedings.

The proceeding is one in the circuit court, as distinguished from one before the circuit judge. They are instituted and conducted in that court, and the acts of the judge are as the judge thereof, his orders and decrees being required to be recorded in the chancery order book thereof, and such orders and decrees or judgments are appealable as any other chancery order. This has already been decided in this cause, Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co. v. Adams, 29 Fla. 280.

In view of what has been decided in Orange Belt R. Co. v. Craver, 32 Fla. 28, it is unnecessary for us to say more on the general subject of procedure in such cases.

Our conclusion is, that, the order appealed from, in so far as it in effect dismissed the proceeding, is erroneous, and should be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings according to the law and practice in such cases.

It will be ordered accordingly.

UTAH SUPREME COURT

H. A. HESS et al., Appts.,

v.

Margaret WHITE, Admx., etc., of George
M. White, Deceased, Respt.

(9 Utah, 61.)

A territorial statute providing for a verdict by three fourths of the jury in a civil case does not violate that clause of the Federal Constitution which provides for the right of trial by jury.

(June 2, 1908.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Salt Lake County, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial after a verdict in defendant's favor by ten of the jury, two members dissenting, in an action upon a guaranty to pay for goods sold and delivered to a third person. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Richard H. Cabell and Ritchie & Ritchie, for appellants: -

Section 17 of the Organic Act and section 1891 of the Revised Statutes of the United States extend the constitution over the territory of Utah.

The words "trial by jury" as used therein mean trial by jury as it was understood at the adoption of the constitution.

Miller, Const. 492.

This amendment extends over the District of Columbia (Callan v. Wilson, 137 U. S. 540, 32 L. ed. 223), and the territories.

The words "trial by jury" in the constitution mean a jury which renders a unanimous verdict.

A state legislature has no power, in the absence of constitutional authority, to pass an act fixing the number of the jury at less than twelve in cases civil or criminal, nor to provide that a number of the jury, less than the whole number, can render a verdict in any case where the constitution gives to the party a right to a trial by jury.

Messrs. Richards, Moyle & Richards, for respondent:

The 7th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States is not restrictive upon the states or state legislation, and there is no reason why it should be held to be restrictive upon territorial legislation.

The intention was to confine the application of this amendment to common-law suits of a civil nature, in which the jury, by the rules of common law, constitutes an element of the trial.

Per Curiam:

This was an action at law, brought by the appellants against the respondent to recover upon a written guaranty to pay for goods sold and delivered to one Frances Brown. The guaranty was executed by the respondent's intestate. The cause was tried by a jury regularly impaneled. After the jury had deliberated upon their verdict, they brought into court a verdict, signed by ten of their number, but two of the jury dissented from it, and refused to sign it. The appellants objected to the entry of judgment upon this verdict "because the verdict was rendered in a manner not authorized or warranted by the constitution and laws of the United States applicable to the territory of Utah, but contrary thereto, in that said verdict was not a unanimous verdict, but was agreed to by ten of said jurors only, and is therefore illegal, and of no effect." Judgment was entered upon the verdict, whereupon a motion for a new trial was made, and as ground therefor the same objection was urged. The motion for a new trial was overruled, and appeal taken to this court.

The sole question argued upon appeal is whether a verdict rendered by ten out of the twelve jurors is legal under the constitution and laws of the United States and under the laws of the territory of Utah. The clause of the constitution relied upon is the seventh article of amendments thereto: "In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved." The laws of the United States applicable are cited as follows: Section 17 of the Organic Act, which provides "that the Constitution and laws of the United States are hereby extended over and declared to be in force in said territory of Utah, so far as the same, or any provision thereof, may be applicable." This section was approved September 9, 1850. Also section 1891 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which enacts: "The Constitution and all laws of the United States, which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within all the organized territories, and in every territory hereafter organized, as elsewhere in the United States." Also there was an act in force April 7, 1874, which provided (18 Stat. at L. 27) "that it shall not be necessary in any of the courts of the several territories of the United States to exercise separately the common-law and chancery jurisdiction vested in said courts; and that the several codes and rules of practice adopted in said territories, respectively, in so far as they authorize a mingling of said jurisdictions, or a uniform course of proceeding in all cases, whether legal or equitable, be confirmed; and that all proceedings heretofore had or taken in said courts in conformity with said codes and rules of practice, so far as relates to the form and mode of proceeding, be, and the same are hereby, validated and confirmed: Provided, that no party has been or shall be deprived of the right of trial by jury in cases cognizable at common law." At the time this last statute was passed there was a law of the territory of Montana which authorized the rendition of a verdict upon the concurrence of three fourths of a jury. This law had been enacted in January, 1869. The law of the territory of Utah was passed under the grant of legislative power in the Organic Act, section 6 of which provides "that the legislative power of said territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation, consistent with the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act," and that "all the laws passed by the legislative assembly and governor shall be submitted to the congress of the United States, and, if disapproved, shall be null, and of no effect." In pursuance of this grant of legislative power, section 493 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is section 3371 of 2 Comp. Laws 1888, p. 286, in force August 1, 1884, provided: "When the jury have agreed upon their verdict, they must be conducted into court, their names called by the clerk, and the verdict rendered by their foreman. The verdict must be in writing, signed by the foreman, and must be read by the clerk to the jury, and the inquiry made whether it is their verdict. If any juror disagrees, they must be sent out again; but, if no disagreement be expressed, and neither party requires the jury to be polled, the verdict is complete, and the jury discharged from the case. Either party may require the jury to be polled, which is done by the court or clerk asking each juror if it is his verdict. If any one answer in the negative, the jury must be sent out again." This statute had superseded section 174 of an Act approved February 17, 1870, Comp Laws 1876, p. 447, which provided: "When the verdict is given, which must be by unanimous agreement, except by the consent of the parties, it shall be read aloud," etc. In 1892 the legislature amended section 3371, supra, to read as follows: "In all civil cases a verdict may be rendered on the concurrence therein of nine or more members of the jury. When the jury have agreed upon their verdict, they must be conducted into court by their foreman. The verdict must be in writing, and signed by their foreman, if he is a concurring juror, and if he is not a concurring juror it must be signed by all the concurring members, and be read by the clerk to the jury, and the inquiry made whether it is their verdict, and the answer may be made by any juror signing the verdict. If more than three jurors dissent, they must be sent out again, but, if not more than three jurors dissent, and neither party requires the jury to be polled, the verdict is complete, and the jury discharged from the case. Either party may require the jury to be polled, which shall be done by the judge or clerk asking each juror if it is his verdict. If more than three answer in the negative, the jury must be sent out again." Utah Laws 1892, p. 46. It will be seen that until 1892 the statutes of the territory by express enactment required the verdict of the jury to be unanimous. The original Act of 1870 permitted this unanimity to be waived by the consent of the parties, but the Act of 1884 was silent upon such waiver.

It is apparent that the sole question here is whether the provision for a verdict by three-fourths of the jury in a civil case was a rightful subject of legislation consistent with the Constitution of the United States, providing that the right of trial by jury shall be preserved. In other words, do the words "trial by jury," as used in the seventh amendment of the constitution, mean a jury which renders a verdict by the unanimous action of its twelve members? It may be remarked that unanimity of action was not considered a constituent part of trial by jury by the framers of the California Constitution of 1879, which provided in section 7, article 1: "The right of trial by jury shall be secured to all, and remain inviolate; but in civil actions three fourths of the jury may render a verdict." This is not preserving the right of trial by jury inviolate if a trial by jury in a civil action requires unanimous action by the members of the jury. At the time the amendments to the constitution were proposed in the house of representatives by Mr. Madison, the original proposition applied to trial of crime the express qualification of unanimity for conviction, but did not apply the same to suits at common law. At that period unanimity of action on the part of the jury was not required in Scotland, and such a requisite had been strongly attacked in England by John Locke and Jeremy Bentham. Originally, unanimity of action had not been required, even by the common law of England. One of the qualifications of jurors at the time of the adoption of the constitution was that they should be freeholders, yet this qualification has not been considered as a part of the trial by jury; but, if the words "trial by jury," as used in the seventh amendment, means a jury trial with all its accustomed requisites, it is difficult to see how the qualification as to freeholders could be changed. Upon this question the Supreme Court of the United States has, so far as we have been referred, never passed. That court expressly declined to pass on the question in Dunphy v. Kleinsmith, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 610, 20 L. ed. 223, where this precise question was involved in an appeal from the territory of Montana. We are aware that there are decisions in large number which affirm that a jury must consist of twelve, and a very few that the action of the jury must be unanimous in civil cases. But we think the reasoning of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Hurtado v. People, 110

U. S. 516, 28 L. ed. 232, upon the phrase "due process of law," is equally applicable to the case at bar. Mr. Justice Matthews said in that case: "The constitution of the United States was ordained, it is true, by descendants of Englishmen, who inherited the traditions of English law and history; but it was made for an undefined and expanding future, and for a people gathered and to be gathered from many nations and of many tongues. And while we take just pride in the principles and institutions of the common law, we are not to forget that in lands where other systems of jurisprudence prevail the ideas and processes of civil justice are also not unknown. There is nothing in Magna Charta, rightly construed as a broad charter of public right and law, which ought to exclude the best ideas of all systems and of every age; and as it was the characteristic principle of the common law to draw its inspiration from every fountain of justice, we are not to assume that the sources of its supply have been exhausted. On the contrary, we should expect that the new and varied experiences of our own situation and system will mould and shape it into new and not less useful forms." And again: "Restraints that could be fastened upon executive authority with precision and detail might prove obstructive and injurious when imposed on the just and necessary discretion of legislative power; and while, in every instance, laws that violated express and specific injunctions and prohibitions might, without embarrassment, be judicially declared to be void, yet any general principle or maxim, founded on the essential nature of law, as a just and reasonable expression of the public will and of government, as instituted by popular consent and for the general good, can only be applied to cases coming clearly within the scope of its spirit and purpose, and not to legislative provisions merely establishing forms and methods of attainment. Such regulations, to adopt a sentence of Burke's 'may alter the mode and application, but have no power over the substance of original justice.' This reasoning, we believe, is decisive of the case. "Administration and remedial proceedings must change, from time to time, with the advancement of legal science and the progress of society." Rowan v. State, 80 Wis. 129, 11 Am. Rep. 559. One of the signs of progress is the provision for a verdict by three fourths of a jury in a civil cause. Wherever this provision has been tried, it has been found to be a distinct benefit. Such a provision is simply a change in the procedure of applying legal remedies. It is general in its application; it is fair and just to all. No man's property rights are injured by it, and no man can be said to have a vested right in the unanimous action of a jury any more than in the fact that a juror was anciently required to be a freeholder. All litigants could waive in civil trials at common law and under our constitution this unanimity of verdict. If they could waive it, then it was not one of the requisites which must be preserved in order to preserve a jury trial in civil actions.

For these reasons, because society progresses and modes and legal procedure must change with that progress, because this enactment is a "just and reasonable expression of the public will," because it is calculated to be a great benefit to all classes of litigants, because it reaches justly and fairly and impartially all classes of men, because it is claimed only to be an infringement of a broad and general statement in the constitution which ought not to be so narrowly construed as to be a bulwark against progress, we hold that this law was a rightful subject of legislation, and this judgment should be affirmed.

(113 N. C. 489.)

A note given solely for usury is void even in the hands of a bona fide holder under a statute which provides that taking "usury" shall be deemed a forfeiture of the entire interest, but which does not avoid the debt as to the principal.

(December 19, 1903.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Pitt County in favor of defendants in an action brought to cancel a note and to enjoin a sale of land under a mortgage which had been given to secure its payment. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. James E. Moore for appellants.

Mr. T. J. Jarvis for appellees.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The jury found that the $400 note in suit was wholly given for a usurious charge for the use of money, and that the present holder acquired it before maturity, for value and without notice. The question whether it is valid in his hands is not an open one in this state. Such note is held to be void, into whatever hands it may pass. Ruffin v. Armstrong, 9 N. C. 411, 11 Am. Dec. 774; Collier v. Nevill, 14 N. C. 30. Such was also the law in England until the law was in some respects modified by the Act of 58 Geo. III., and is the law in New York and other states, except where modified by statute. Randolph, Com. Paper, § 525; 8 Parsons, Cont. 5th ed. 117; Powell v. Waters, 8 Cow. 669; Wilkie v. Roosevelt, 3 Johns. Cas. 206, 2 Am. Dec. 149; Solomons v. Jones, 3 Brev. 54, 5 Am. Dec. 538; Oneida Bank v. Ontario Bank, 21 N. Y. 495, cited by Smith, Ch. J., in Rountree v. Brinson, 98 N. C. 107; Callanan v. Shaw, 24 Iowa, 441.

When the statute makes a note void, it is void into whosesoever hands it may come, but, when the statute merely declares it illegal, the note is good in the hands of an innocent holder. Glenn v. Farmers Bank of North Carolina, 70 N. C. 191, 206. Hence, it was argued strenuously that the authorities above cited were good under our former statute, which made the contract void, but that the present statute merely makes the contract illegal. It does not so seem to us. The former statute (Rev. Code, chap. 114; Rev. Stat. chap. 117) denounced the contract as void as to the whole debt,—principal and interest. The present statute (Code, § 3886) makes it void, not as to principal, but as to the interest only. It provides that "the taking, receiving, reserving or charging a rate of interest greater than is allowed . . . shall be deemed a forfeiture of the entire interest . . . which has been agreed to be paid," with a further provision that, if such interest has been paid, double the amount can be recovered back by the debtor. The only difference between the two acts is that formerly the whole note was forfeited and of no avail, and now only the stipulation as to the interest is ipso facto deemed forfeited and void. But the point has already been adjudicated by this court. In two cases this court, and by most eminent judges, has expressly held that the words "deemed a forfeiture," in the Act of 1876-77 (now Code, § 3886), make void the agreement as to interest. If any attention is to be paid to the doctrine of stare decisis, the precedents in our own court do not leave this open to debate. In First Nat. Bank of Charlotte v. Lindeberger, 88 N. C. 454 (on page 458), Ashe, J., quotes this section in full, and says: "The purpose and effect of this statute were not only to make void all agreements for usurious interest, but to give a right of action to recover back double the amount after it has been paid." Dillard, J., in Moore v. Woodward, 83 N. C. 581 (on page 585), says: "They [the notes there sued on] are both wholly for illegal interest, if the allegations of the answer be true, and, if so, then the sentence of the law is that they are void;" and further says: "The device of taking a distinct bond and mortgage for the interest does not take the case out of the operation of the statute." The opinions of such judges upon a court constituted as the bench then was are surely entitled to be considered the law in this state until changed by legislation. And in Glenn v. Farmers Bank of North Carolina, 70 N. C. 191 (bottom of page 205), Rodman, J., says that "it is admitted law" that "notes vitiated by a usurious or gaming consideration cannot be enforced in the most innocent hands, but are always, and under all circumstances, void." Our own decisions upon our own statute should govern, even though a court of another jurisdiction, upon a somewhat similar statute, had ruled differently. But in fact the case relied on to NOTE.—The above case is noticeable as one in which a note is held wholly void even in the hands of a bona fide purchaser because given wholly for usury where a statute forfeits the interest but not the principal for usury.

that effect (Oates v. First Nat. Bank of Montgomery, 100 U. S. 289, 25 L. ed. 580), merely holds that the contract, being not void in toto, but only as to the interest "being legal in part and vicious in part, the former will support a contract of indorsement." But here the note is solely for usury, and, being wholly vicious, this authority is against its validity in the hands of the assignee. In 1 Daniel on Negotiable Instruments, § 198, it is stated that where the statute provides that when, "In an action brought on a contract for payment of money, it shall appear that unlawful interest has been taken, the plaintiff shall forfeit threefold the amount of the unlawful interest so taken, it was held to apply to the innocent indorsee of a note, who received it in due course of trade; and, as a general rule, all contracts founded on considerations which embrace an act which the law prohibits under a penalty are void;" citing Kendall v. Robertson, 13 Cush. 156; Woods v. Armstrong, 54 Ala. 150, 25 Am. Rep. 671. In Kendall v. Robertson, the Massachusetts law had undergone a change similar to ours, and Shaw, Ch. J., says: "The former law extended the entire forfeiture to any holder of the note, though an innocent indorsee. The natural conclusion is, in the absence of express words changing the operation of the law, that it was the intention of the legislature to extend such partial forfeiture in like manner, and attach it, as before, to the note, although held by an innocent indorsee without notice. In both cases the intention of the legislature appears to have been the same,—to suppress a mode of lending regarded as dangerous and injurious to society, by attainting the contract, and attaching the penal consequence to the contract itself, whenever set up as a proof of a debt." And at the last term of this court (Moore v. Beaman, 119 N. C. 558), it is said: "The contract, usury being pleaded, is simply a loan of money which in law bore no interest." The note for the usurious interest being in the hands of an assignee, he, and not the maker, must suffer. The law regards the maker, not as in pari delicto with the payee, but as the victim of an oppression which the law has denounced and prohibits under penalty. Merchants Bank of Fayetteville v. Lutterloh, 81 N. C. 142. If, by passing the note off before maturity and for value, the indorsee may recover on it, the statute is useless, as the protection intended, and the penalty and prohibition, are alike rendered nugatory. The victim would have no recourse but to suffer in silence. The usury would be collected in spite of the law, which had declared the "entire interest forfeited" ab initio, by the fact of "charging or reserving" it. On the other hand, the innocent indorsee has his recourse upon the payee who has indorsed the note to him (1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 807); a recourse which would more surely protect him, being against the party who has money to loan, not to borrow. At any rate, the fact that the indorsee's sole remedy as to the interest is against the payee and indorser, not against the maker, will cause such lenders to be more chary of shouldering off upon innocent parties the collection of their usurious contracts.

The only case in our Reports that seems to mitigate against the otherwise uniform tenor of our decisions on this subject is Coor v.

Spicer, 65 N. C. 401, which held that a mortgage given to secure a usurious bond might be enforced in the hands of an innocent purchaser for value. The case recognizes the general rule, but takes mortgages out of it upon the supposed wording of the statute. Rev. Code, chap. 50, § 5 (now Code, § 1549). Aside from the fact that this is held expressly otherwise in the later case of Moore v. Woodward, 83 N. C. 531, an examination of § 1549 will show that Coor v. Spicer was a palpable inadvertence. The statute cited (Code, § 1549) in fact does not purport to protect the innocent holder of a mortgage note which is tainted with usury, but the "purchaser of the estate or property" at sale under the mortgage, who buys without notice of the usurious taint in the debt secured. It would be a fraud for the mortgagor to stand by and let him purchase without giving him notice, but the maker can give no notice, usually, to the assignee of the note. There is a broad distinction, which runs through all the cases everywhere, between contracts upon an illegal consideration, as to which, the parties being in pari delicto, the courts will aid neither party, but will protect the note in the hands of a holder for value without notice, and a contract which, in whole or in part, is declared void or forfeited in its inception, which can acquire no validity by being passed on to other hands. Henderson v. Shannon, 1 Dev. L. 147; Glenn v. Farmers Bank of North Carolina, supra. As to usurious contracts, the law regards the maker, not as in pari delicto, but as acting "in chains" (1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 302); and to permit his contract which is deemed exacted under duress to come under the general rule in favor of innocent holders for value of commercial paper would be to nullify the protecting statute. The recourse of the holder is against the payee and indorser, who is more likely, by far, to be able to respond than the maker. The statute makes the "taking, receiving, reserving or charging usury when knowingly done," s. e. intentionally done, and not by a mere error of calculation, a forfeiture (not merely forfeitable) of the entire interest which the note carries with it, "or which has been agreed to be paid thereon." The note in this case falls exactly within the evil denounced in the last clause. It is a written promise to pay the usury reserved or charged on the note, and such charging or reserving is ipso facto a forfeiture, which attaches either by the taking, receiving, reserving, or charging, as the lawmakers evidently intended to prevent and head off all casuistry, for which this class of law breakers have in all times been specially noted, and to carry out the legislative intent of bona fide protecting the public, not nominally, but in fact, from evasions of this law. But if, in truth, the forfeiture was limited to the "knowingly receiving," the holder of this note certainly knows now, and doubtless did before suit brought, that this note was given for usury "agreed to be paid," and his receiving it would eo instanti work a forfeiture. Besides, if the maker should have voluntarily paid this note, the receiver of such payment knowing it was for usury, the statute gives the person "by whom it was paid, or his legal representative," an action to recover back twice the amount. Out- done, then, shall the debtor be compelled by law to pay the usurious note, when instantly he can recover back double the sum of the party to whom he pays it, as a punishment for knowingly receiving it? Such multiplicity of actions was not tolerated under the old practice, and certainly will not be under the present simpler and more practical system of procedure. Merchants Bank of Fayetteville v. Lutterloh, 81 N. C. 142, was decided under the Act of 1866, and, to cure the defect in that act, the wording of the present statute is made explicit, and gives the action to recover back. Under the Act of 1866 there was no forfeiture, as now, but simply interest could not be collected. While the "charging, reserving," etc., is now a forfeiture of the contract as to all interest ab initio, the recovery of double the sum paid is necessarily from the party to whom it is paid, for the language is "may recover back" double the sum paid, which can only be from the party receiving the money. With the policy of the lawmaking power the courts have nothing to do, further than as it may throw light upon the meaning of the statute by considering the evil to be remedied. That is thus considered by Taylor, Ch. J., in Ruffin v. Armstrong, 9 N. C. 411, 416, 11 Am. Dec. 774: "It is not less important now than it was then to restrain the power of amassing wealth without industry, and to prevent those who possess money from sitting idle and fattening on the toil of others; it is not less important to prevent those who desire profit from their money without hazard from receiving larger gain than those who employ it in undertakings attended with risk, calculated to encourage industry, and to multiply the sources of public prosperity; nor is it less important to facilitate the means of procuring money on reasonable terms, and thereby to render the lending of it more extensively beneficial." In a matter so capable of oppression as the lending of money, the legislature has deemed it wise to regulate the limit of what is a reasonable exaction for its use, since all interest is the creation of statute. Moore v. Beaman, supra. As to lenders upon a lawful rate of interest, the legislature has looked upon them with a favorable eye, and of late years has raised the limit from 6 to 8 per cent. But there is nothing in the action of the legislature, nor in the circumstances of the day, which indicates that this is a propitious time to relax the restrictions placed heretofore upon the illegal exactions to those who would use their money contrary to law, and yet call upon the law to aid them, directly or indirectly, to secure their unlawful gains.

Error.

Burwell, J., dissenting:

I cannot agree to the conclusion of the court, and deem it proper to give the grounds of my dissent. By the terms of the statute which was in force in this state before the Act of 1866, all contracts founded upon a usurious consideration were declared to be void, and, according to all the authorities, promissory notes thus expressly avoided are void in the hands of indorsees for value without notice. By the Act of 1866 the legal rate was fixed at 6 per cent, with a proviso allowing 8 per cent to be charged for money loaned, if the contract was in writing, and signed by the party to be charged; and it was therein enacted that, if a greater than the legal rate was charged, the interest should not be recoverable. This law, as was said by Justice Dillard in Merchants Bank of Fayetteville v. Lutterloh, 81 N. C. 144, introduced a new theory. It was an expression of the popular will. It did not declare the contract void in whole or in part. It did declare that the contract, so far as it related to interest, was not enforceable in the courts,—that it could not be collected by law,—and in effect it enacted that so much of the contract as concerned the rate of interest was void, the word "void" being used here as it is in Moore v. Woodward, 83 N. C. 581. Speaking accurately, the contract for interest in excess of the legal rate was made by that act, not void, but illegal. This act remained in force until 1875, when the legislature adopted a law which distinctly declared "void" all contracts, both as to principal and interest, if a greater than the legal rate was charged. When this statute went into effect, what are called "usurious contracts," and all notes, bonds, etc., founded on such contracts, were not only illegal, but void. At January term, 1874, of this court, the case of Glenn v. Farmers Bank of North Carolina was decided, 70 N. C. 191, and Justice Rodman said, in his opinion filed in that cause: "If the statute declares a security void, it is void in whosoever hands it may come. If, however, a negotiable security be founded on an illegal consideration (and it is immaterial whether it be illegal at common law or by statute), and no statute says it shall be void, the security is good in the hands of an innocent holder, or of one claiming through such a holder. The case of Hay v. Ayling, 16 Q. B. 428, is a notable illustration of the difference. Gaming securities were declared void by 9 Anne, chap. 14, § 1, and it was held that they were void in the hands of a bona fide, innocent indorsee. The Act of 5 & 6 Wm. IV., chap. 41, § 1, modified the act of Anne, and declared they should be illegal. The court held that after that act they could be recovered on by an innocent holder." It is to be presumed that the Act of 1874-75, enacted, as it was, one year after that announcement of the rule of law, was framed by men acquainted with that decision, and that it was then provided that all usurious contracts should be void in order that they might be invalid in whosoever hands they might come. In 1876-77 another change was made in the law, and the statute then enacted is in force at this time. That act nowhere, in totidem verbis, declares void a contract for interest in excess of the legal rate. It is to be presumed that this enactment was also framed in distinct recognition of the rule laid down by the learned justice in Glenn v. Farmers Bank of North Carolina, supra, and I think much significance is to be attached to the fact that, with this rule thus brought to its attention, the legislature repealed a law which declared all such contracts void, and adopted one which omitted to so declare them. And here it may be well to note the often inaccurate, or rather misleading, use of the word "void," in statutes and reports. Parker, Ch. J., in Somes v. Brewer, 2 Pick. 184, 18 Am. Dec. 406, says, of the words, "void and voidable," that they "have not always been used with nice discrimination; indeed, in some books there is a great want of precision in the use of them;" and then he adds that, for the purposes of the case he was considering, "the term 'void' will be used to express that which is in its very creation wholly without effect,—an absolute nullity." In Baucom v. Smith, 66 N. C. 588, Pearson, Ch. J., said of the bond there in suit that it "was void in the hands of the obligee for the illegality of consideration;" and then he adds: "Had the bond been assigned before it was due, the assignee for valuable consideration, and without notice, could have maintained an action to enforce payment. This is settled. Henderson v. Shannon, 12 N. C. 147." Numerous instances of the use of the word "void" could easily be cited from our Reports. Justice Reade makes similar use of the word in Coor v. Spicer, 65 N. C. 401. What he there says may well be quoted here: "Except as otherwise provided by statute, a negotiable instrument, void as between the original parties by reason of any illegality in the consideration, was nevertheless good in the hands of an indorsee for value and without notice."

If it be said that the effect of the provision of the Act of 1876-77 is to make void all contracts entered into contrary to its provisions, it is to be replied that, in the interest of commerce and trade, bona fide purchasers of commercial paper are favorites of the modern law of every enlightened nation, and, at this day at least, it is not allowable to destroy, by an inference, negotiable instruments in the hands of such purchasers. The rule is, as I understand, that if the maker of a negotiable note contests the right of one who has acquired it by indorsement for value before maturity and without notice of any defense, to recover of him the amount of the note, he must be able to show a statute that in totidem verbis declares the note to be void, or one that makes the contract illegal, and, expressly or by necessary implication, declares that this illegality shall avoid the contract and all securities given in fulfillment of such illegal contract into whosoever hands they may come, and thus render them unenforceable in the courts. Story, Prom. Notes, § 192; Converse v. Foster, 32 Vt. 828. In sections 807 and 808 of Daniel on Negotiable Instruments, it is said that, "in many localities, negotiable instruments executed upon gaming or usurious considerations are upon the same footing as those executed for other illegal considerations,—that is, void between the parties, but valid in the hands of a bona fide holder;" and that "where the instrument was executed upon an illegal consideration, especially if illegal by statute (but not absolutely avoiding the instrument), it throws upon the holder the burden of proving bona fide ownership for value; . . . and in all cases where the statute does not declare the instrument void, bona fide ownership for value being proved, the holder is entitled to recover." The reason of this rule is well stated in Pickaway County Bank v. Prather, 19 Ohio St. 497, as follows: "The cardinal principle of the commercial law which protects commercial paper regular upon its face, and negotiated before its maturity, cannot be otherwise vindicated; and this is of 24 L. R. A. much more importance than that one who has received the benefits of the paper should be compelled to perform an engagement which he voluntarily made." In Converse v. Foster, supra, the rule, as I conceive it to be, is thus expressed by Poland, J.: "The English statutes against usury and gaming not only impose a penalty for such illegal acts, but expressly declare that all notes, bills, bonds, and other securities given for such illegal considerations, shall be utterly void. All the cases that have been cited, and all that can be, so far as we know, both English and American, upon this subject, turn upon this very distinction and difference between the statutes. In those cases in which the legislature has declared that the illegality of the contract or consideration shall make the security, whether bill or note, void, the defendant may insist on such illegality, though the plaintiff, or some other party between him and the defendant, took the bill or note bona fide, and gave a valuable consideration for it; but, unless it has been so expressly declared by the legislature, illegality of consideration will be no defense in an action at the suit of a bona fide holder for value, without notice of the illegality." A recognition of the principle thus well expressed may be seen, I think, in the chapters of the Revised Code that relate to usury and gaming, and in the Act of 1874-75, above referred to. In Moore v. Woodward, supra, the learned justice who delivered the opinion says: "Under our present statute, while the contract is valid as to the principal, a stipulation for usurious interest, secured by a separate bond and mortgage therefor, ought, as between the parties at least, on plea of the illegality, to bar the direct collection of the same by an action therefor." In a former part of the opinion he had remarked that, under the provision of the Revised Code, a usurious contract was void, "in whosoever hands it might come." His subsequent statement, quoted above, seems to indicate that he thought that contracts made in contravention of the provision of the present law, which he was discussing, were illegal, and were void as between the parties, but, being only illegal, were not void in whosoever hands they might come; evidently having in mind the rule laid down by Justice Rodman in Glenn v. Farmers Bank of North Carolina, supra. The Act of 1876-77 (Code, § 3836), which we are construing, is in all essential particulars copied from the National Banking Act, Rev. Stat. § 5198. The words are almost identical. The forfeitures and penalties are the same. The Supreme Court of the United States has held, in Oates v. First Nat. Bank of Montgomery, 100 U. S. 239, 25 L. ed. 580, that that act "does not declare the contract, under which the usurious interest is paid, to be void;" and it is to be noted that this language is used by that court in drawing a contrast between the act it was construing and the law of Maryland, which did declare all usurious contracts void, and therefore not enforceable, even in the hands of bona fide indorsees. We therefore have an adjudication of the point under discussion from the highest court. In conclusion, our statute does not expressly make void notes given for a usurious consideration. It is not a necessary inference from its provisions that the legislature intended they should be so. I think, therefore, that, though the note here in suit is founded upon an illegal consideration, it is recoverable in the hands of a bona fide holder for value and without notice.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

INTERNATIONAL BUILDING & LOAN ASSO.

v.

William S. HARDY

(.....Tex.....)

Constitutional provisions against impairing the obligations of contracts and taking away vested rights prevent the application to the remedy for the enforcement of a trust deed which is provided in the contract, of the rule which permits the legislature to change at any time the ordinary remedies prescribed by law.

(April 19, 1894.)

QUESTION CERTIFIED by the Court of Civil Appeals for the Fourth Supreme Judicial District for the opinion of the Supreme Court arising on an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Bexar County in favor of defendant in an action to try title to real estate claimed by plaintiff under a sale in accordance with a certain deed of trust. Question answered in plaintiff's favor.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. B. L. Aycock for appellant.

Mr. 8878. C. A. Keller and Leo Tarleton for appellee.

Stanton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question certified and accompanying statement are: "Plaintiff claims title to land in Bexar county under a deed of trust executed by appellee and wife on April 18, 1885; the sale by the trustee having taken place on October 9, 1890, in Bexar county, appellant being the purchaser. The trustee's deed was objected to when offered in evidence on one ground only, viz.: 'Because there was no evidence that advertisement was made by posting notice of the time and place of sale, as in sheriffs' sales, in three public places in the county, one of which being the court-house door,—which objection was sustained.' Question: "Did the Act of March 21, 1889, entitled 'An Act to prescribe the Place and Time of Sale of All Real Estate thereafter to be Sold under Power Conferred by Any Deed of Trust or Other Lien,' have the effect of requiring compliance with its provisions in cases of sales thereafter made under a power, where the contract conferring the power had been executed prior to said act, and provided differently in respect to the sale?" The act referred to requires such sales "to be made in the county in which such real estate is situated, notice shall be given as now required in judicial sales, and such sales shall be made at public vendue between the hours of 10 o'clock A. M., and 4 o'clock P. M., of the first Tuesday in any month." The purpose of that act evidently was to make the law regulating time and place of sale under execution or other judicial process applicable to sales under powers conferred in mortgages, and to require notice of such sales to be given in the mode and for the period prescribed for notice of sales under judicial process. The law in force when the contract was made, as at the time when the sale under the trust deed was made, required that "the time and place of making sale of real estate, in execution, shall be publicly advertised by the officer for at least twenty days successively next before the day of sale, by posting up written or printed notice thereof, at three public places in the county, one of which shall be at the door of the court-house of the county." Sayles' Civ. Stat. art. 2309. The statute, however, gave a defendant the right, upon written request, to have notice of sale given by publication in some newspaper if there was one published in the county, provided this could be had for the compensation fixed by the statute; and such publication was required for three consecutive weeks. Id. 2309a. The Act of March 21, 1889, in terms applies to "all sales of real estate which may hereafter be made in this state under powers conferred by any deed of trust or other contract lien," and there can be no reasonable doubt of the intent of the legislature to make it apply to sales under contracts made before its passage, as well as to those afterwards made; and the question arises whether such legislation is violative of any part of the Constitution of the United States or of this state. If not, effect must be given to it in all cases coming within its terms.

The Constitution of the United States and the constitution of this state deny to the legislature of this state power to enact any law impairing the obligation of contract, and the latter withholds power to enact retroactive laws. The purpose of the parties in making the mortgage contract and in giving power to sell the mortgaged property, in accordance with the terms of the instrument, were twofold. The leading purpose of that contract was to give lien on the property described in it to secure debt due or to become due from one party to the other; and, if the contract had gone no further than to secure this right, there is no doubt that it would have been within the power of the legislature to change the remedy then existing for the enforcement of such a right through the courts in any respect that did not essentially affect the right secured. Notice for a longer period before sale or notice to be given in some manner other than that prescribed by law in force when the contract was made might have been required, or the time and place of sale might have been changed, without violating the right of either party under the contract; for the parties contract with reference to the enforcement of rights through the courts, if this becomes necessary, and they must be understood to contract in view of the fact that the state has power to establish courts, to fix their jurisdiction and also to regulate procedure, and that this cannot be controlled by contracts persons may make. The contract, however, had in view, and by its terms gave and was intended to give to the creditor, a remedy through which it might enforce its right against the mortgaged property without resort to the ordinary remedies given by law, and it will be assumed that the contract which gave that remedy was valid when made. The constitutional provisions which forbid legislation, the effect of which would be to impair the obligation of contracts affecting property or pecuniary rights, are broad, and embrace every such contract, and, in the case stated, the question arises: Is a contract securing to a creditor right to a specific remedy, whereby he may enforce a pecuniary obligation without resort to the courts of the country, subject to such modification and changes as may lawfully be made in the ordinary remedies prescribed by law? We are of opinion that this should be answered in the negative; for, as before said, the contract in the one case secures the right of the parties as to the subject-matter of contract, but looks for remedy to laws existing, or to such laws as may be subsequently enacted,—in fact contract with reference to the known power of the lawmaking department to make such changes in remedial laws as may be deemed beneficial, provided they be not such as impair the obligation of contract,—while, in the other, the very purpose of so much of the contract as secures a remedy the law does not give is to secure the specific remedy contracted for. In one case the specific remedy is the subject of contract, and parties, one or both, thus secure it because deemed more advantageous in enforcement of right than the remedies provided by law; while, in the other, the thing or right secured by contract is that which gives right to some remedy for enforcement of contractual obligation. By reason of the right the remedy operates upon persons or things, and, in the absence of contract for remedy, in such cases, parties subject themselves and property to such remedies as exist at the time the contract is made, and to such as subsequently may lawfully be given by law. That persons may contract for a remedy, lawful in itself but not given by law for enforcement of a right, will not be questioned; but such a contract will not prevent resort to any remedy given by law. If, however, a party desires to resort to a remedy existing only by contract, he must take it in accordance with the agreement that gives it; for the legislature has no power by subsequent law to change the contract. The existence of such a power would be, in effect, to make a contract for parties which the legislature has no power to do. While this is true, there is no doubt that parties may contract with reference to an existing law affecting the remedy; but, if the contract relates only to process and the manner of its execution, and not to something on which the process is to act, or like substantial thing, then the contract ought not to be held to affect the power of the legislature to change the remedy. It has been held that a change in the law, in such cases, if given effect, would not necessarily impair the obligation of contract. A statute in New York authorized sales of mortgaged property under a power conferred by the mortgage, upon notice being given for twenty-four weeks; and, while that law was in force, a mortgage was executed which authorized a sale under a power "according to law," but, before the sale, the law was so changed as to authorize such sales to be made on notice given only for twelve weeks. A sale made under the last law was held to be valid, on the ground that the words "according to law" meant in compliance with the law in force when the sale became necessary. James v. Stull, 9 Barb. 482. It was, however, held that the sale was valid if such was not the true construction of the contract, on the ground that the legislature had power to change the remedy, and that such a change as was made did not impair the obligation of the contract. In support of the last proposition, quoting from Bronson v. Kinzie, 42 U. S. 1 How. 811, 11 L. ed. 148, it was said: "If the laws of the state had done nothing more than change the remedy upon contracts of this description, they would be liable to no constitutional objection. For, undoubtedly, a state may regulate at pleasure the modes of proceeding in its courts in relation to past contracts as well as future." Under the construction given to the contract, the decision may not be subject to objection; for it seems reasonable, when parties do not expressly fix the terms on which such powers may be exercised, but agree that the act to be done in the future may be done according to the law governing that subject, that they consent to be governed by the law in force when, under the terms of the contract, it may become necessary to examine the power. They contract with knowledge that the legislature may change the remedy and ought not to be presumed to have intended, in case of such change, that the contract should become inoperative. It seems to us that the decision in Bronson v. Kinzie, does not give support to the ruling it was cited to sustain. In that case it appears that a mortgagor executed a mortgage which authorized the mortgagee to take possession of and sell the mortgaged property, and title to convey to the purchaser on default of payment of principal or interest, but instead of pursuing that remedy, as he might lawfully have done, he brought a suit to foreclose. It was contended that, under a law passed subsequently to the execution of the mortgage, the property could not be sold unless it brought two thirds of its appraised value, and that it should be sold subject to the mortgagor's right to redeem within twelve months. The law in force when the mortgage was executed, as well as the contract, gave right to make sale absolute, and without reference to appraisal. The court simply held that to give effect to the subsequent law would impair the obligation of the contract.

The case of Conkey v. Hart, 14 N. Y. 23, is frequently cited as authority for the proposition that the legislature may pass laws which will annul right to remedy given by express contract. In that case Wardell had given a chattel mortgage which provided that he should remain in possession of the mortgaged property, "unless he or some other person or persons shall attempt to sell, secrete, remove, or otherwise dispose of the said chattels in any way whatever; then, or in such case, it shall and may be lawful for the parties of the second part, their heirs, etc., to take immediate possession of said chattels and keep the same until default be made as aforesaid, and then to sell and dispose thereof. Subsequently Wardell leased land from Simpson, and the contract provided that if Wardell shall fail to pay said rent or any part thereof, when it becomes due, it is agreed that the said party of the first part may distrain or sue for the same, and re-enter said premises, or resort to any other legal remedy; and, in case of distress for nonpayment under this lease, the said party of the second part hereby consents and agrees that any property upon said premises, not excepting such articles as are by law exempt from distress, may be taken to satisfy the rent in arrear." Wardell having failed to pay rent due, Simpson sued out a distress warrant, under which he caused the mortgaged property to be seized by the sheriff, whereupon the mortgagor brought replevin against him. After the mortgage and lease were executed, a law was passed which abolished distress for rent, and the contract for remedy by distress was relied upon to defeat the action of replevin. While recognizing the fact that the waiver of exemption was the substantial matter the parties had in view in making the contract, the court held that the subsequent law took away the remedy by distress which the lessee contracted might be used. The lease contract gave right to no remedy which would not have existed without it, and it may be true that it might properly have been held that the parties only intended that all such remedies as were lawful at the time of default might be used. The remedy contracted for was not one that could exist by contract. It could only exist by reason of a law, and it is clear that no person, by contract or otherwise, can prevent the lawmaking power from repealing the law which permits the use of given process, while it would not have power to deny remedy for the full enforcement of obligation imposed by contract. It is obviously true that such remedies as rest on contract alone must be exercised as provided by the contract, or not at all; and it is equally clear that the legislature has no power to change such a contract, and, in its changed condition, to make it obligatory on either party, simply because it has no power to make contracts for parties. In a case in which a trustee in a mortgage, which gave power to sell the mortgaged property in name on terms prescribed by the instrument, was sought to be enjoined by the debtor on account of legislation subsequent to the contract, it was aptly said: "The deed established all the agencies for the execution of the trust. Unlike a mortgage, it contemplated no day in court for foreclosure or redemption, nor sale under the direction and terms of the court, and by its officers. But its design was to avoid the processes of the law, and to confide to impartial agents summary means of realizing the objects of the trust. Had the parties by the nature of their agreement, as in case of mortgage, been thrown upon the courts for redress, they might have been amenable to the control which the legislature possesses over judicial remedies. . . . Shall it be said that a sale is a remedy that may be likened to legal process, and, as such liable to be changed and modified by the legislature? If so, there is at least this material difference; that is a remedy of the parties' own appointment, and the very essence of his contract. It cannot be segregated from it, and treated as an extrinsic remedy within the pale of legislative jurisdiction. . . . To admit a subsequent act of the legislature thus to modify and essentially vary the written stipulations of the parties would concede to the legislature a power to make a new contract, and destroy the old altogether; a power not assumed by the letter of the act itself, for it only professes to operate on general remedies." Taylor v. Stearns, 18 Gratt. 244.

The rule is well stated by the supreme court of Pennsylvania. "But a statute strictly remedial may impair the obligation of a contract, and, when this happens, the act is unconstitutional. Bronson v. Kinzie, 42 U. S. 1 How. 322, 11 L. ed. 147. This always happens where the parties make legal remedies a subject of their contract and subsequent legislation conflicts with what they have expressed in their agreement. If they do not prescribe the rule of remedy in their contract, the lawmaking power is free; but, if they do, they become a law to themselves, and the legislature must let them alone. Stay laws, exemption laws, and limitation laws are ordinarily constitutional, although applied to existing and prior contracts, but the cases in which such laws have been sustained have been cases in which the parties have not contracted about the subject-matter to which the laws were applicable. . . . If the thing provided for by the legislature be within their general competence, and yet be the very thing expressly excluded by a particular contract, it is plain that, as to the parties to that contract, the law is unconstitutional and void, because it impairs the obligation of their contract." Billmeyer v. Evans, 40 Pa. 327. To the same effect are the following decisions: Breitenbach v. Bush, 44 Pa. 318, 84 Am. Dec. 442; Lewis v. Lewis, 47 Pa. 127; Pool v. Young, 7 T. B.

Mon. 588; Boice v. Boice, 27 Minn. 378; O'Brien v. Krenz, 36 Minn. 188. It appears that, under the contract, notice of sale was required to be given by advertisement in a daily paper of the city for ten days prior to sale day, and, in entering into that contract, the parties must be supposed to have determined for themselves that such notice would be more beneficial to them than notice given in some other manner. They were equally interested in that matter, and it is certainly true that power had not been given, to make the sale under any other mode of advertisement. What notice of the sale should be given was matter of contract. Had the legislature jurisdiction to declare that the power to sell should exist, and might be exercised, if notice of sale was given in some other manner than that prescribed by the contract? While the legislature has power to prescribe what powers shall be used for enforcement of rights through the courts, and what notice of judicial sales shall be given, it certainly has no power to confer on any private person power to sell the property of another at such time and place and on such notice as it may prescribe, without regard to or in violation of any contract parties may have made. If the law requiring notice to be given as in sales under execution is to operate on contracts made before its enactment, this necessarily annuls the power based solely on contract; for neither of the parties agreed that the power might be exercised at all unless notice was given as the contract required. The contract, only permitting the power to be exercised on terms prescribed, impliedly forbade the trustee to sell unless notice was given as it required; and, if the subsequent law is to have effect, the power to sell under its terms is a power existing only by force of the law, for the parties did not confer it. The necessary effect of the law, when the period for advertisement prescribed by the law differed from that required by contract, would be to extend or shorten the period after default within which a sale could be made; and, by reason of the fact that the statute prescribes a day in each month on which such sales shall be made, this period may be extended for a longer time than the difference in time of advertisement prescribed by contract and the law. When parties, looking to all the facts bearing on their respective interests, make a contract whereby specific remedy, not given by law, is secured for enforcement of right, courts ought not to inquire as to the extent of injury which may result if a law subsequently enacted, and affecting the remedy, be given effect; for such legislation impairs the obligation of contract, takes away vested rights, and is therefore prohibited by the constitution.

The Act of March 21, 1889, cannot be given effect as to contracts executed before it was operative, in cases in which the remedy therein prescribed differs from the remedy prescribed by contract.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Walter H. WATSON

v.

Inhabitants of NEEDHAM.

(.....Mass.....)

1. A contract to supply water for a boiler to make steam to heat a greenhouse is one which a municipal corporation may legally make, where it has a municipal water supply.
2. For lack of due diligence to furnish a supply of water according to contract for steam heating in a greenhouse, a municipal corporation may be liable for the damages.
3. The full amount of damage to growing lettuce in a greenhouse, which is frozen by reason of the failure to supply water necessary for steam heating, is the measure of damages for such failure.

(May 12, 1894.)

REPORT by the Superior Court for Norfolk County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of an action brought to recover damages to a growing crop situated in a greenhouse by reason of defendant's breach of contract to supply plaintiff with water for the boilers which generated steam to heat the greenhouse. Judgment for plaintiff.

The court below found that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the full amount of damage to the crop, and on that finding reported the case for the consideration of the supreme judicial court.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas H. Wakefield, for plaintiff:

The liability of a municipal corporation for the acts of its officers performed in building or maintaining sewers, waterworks, gasworks, etc., where such municipality accepts the authority granted and voluntarily acts as an agency to carry on an enterprise to some extent commercial and for profit, for the purpose of furnishing benefits to such as choose to pay for them, and where the element of consideration comes in, has been long recognized.

Oliver v. Worcester, 103 Mass. 489, 3 Am. Rep. 485; Emery v. Lovell, 104 Mass. 18; Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 344, 23 Am. Rep. 332; Murphy v. Lovell, 124 Mass. 564; Hand v. Brookline, 126 Mass. 324; Neff v. Wellesey, 2 L. R. A. 500, 148 Mass. 487.

Where the duty is voluntarily created by the act of the party such party is bound to perform it. The defendant town should have protected itself by express limitations in its contract, if it did not intend to assume all liabilities of furnishing water to the plaintiff under all contingencies consistent with its duty to the public, except those specifically reserved in reference to its right to exercise by its voluntary and affirmative act of option in cutting off the water at any time when deemed expedient.

NOTE.—On the subject of liability for damages caused by lack of water under contract for its supply, see Howsmon v. Trenton Water Co. (Mo.) 23 L. R. A. 144, and note.

2 Chitty, Cont. 11th ed. p. 107, and notes; Mill Dam Foundry Proprs. v. Hovey, 21 Pick. 417; Lord v. Wheeler, 1 Gray, 282; Randall v. Bancroft, 10 Allen, 348.

If this failure is assumed to have been the result of an accident, still due care is required to avoid liability.

Sweetland v. Boston & A. R. Corp. 102 Mass. 282.

If the defendant town had the right to cease furnishing water to the plaintiff at the end of any six months' term for which he had paid for it in advance, yet throughout such term for which he had paid in advance the contract and duty of the defendant under the statute and regulations or ordinances adopted was to furnish him with water for the uses applied for (which application had been accepted), not simply when it had the water, but at all times during such term, so far as such duty and the duty said town owed the public did not conflict.

Young v. Boston, 104 Mass. 95; Merrimack River Sav. Bank v. Lowell, 10 L. R. A. 122, 152 Mass. 556.

Within reasonable limits, and so far as would not be inconsistent with the performance by the municipality of its general public duty, cities and towns, under statutes similar to the one involved in this case, may make contracts with individuals to supply them with water for a price to be paid, and when such price is paid in advance such municipality is bound to furnish such individuals with water in the manner contemplated.

Merrimack River Sav. Bank v. Lowell, supra; Mt. Hope Cemetery Proprs. v. Boston, 158 Mass. 513.

The measure of damages is such loss as might reasonably be anticipated according to common experience and the usual course of events.

Metallic Compression Casting Co. v. Fitchburg R. Co. 109 Mass. 277, 12 Am. Rep. 689; Derry v. Flitner, 118 Mass. 181; Stock v. Boston, 149 Mass. 410.

Messrs. Henry E. Fales and Stephen H. Tyng for defendant.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant town, acting through its water commissioners, undertook to furnish the plaintiff with water, for use in a boiler, to make steam to heat his greenhouse. It is objected that this is a use for which the town had no constitutional authority to take and furnish water, and that the contract was therefore void. It is true that the right of eminent domain cannot be exercised to take property for a private use, and persons or corporations owning rights in streams or ponds cannot be deprived of their use of the water by an attempt to take it for the use of another, merely for purposes of private gain; but it has long been settled that ponds and streams may constitutionally be taken, in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, for the purpose of supplying the inhabitants of cities and towns with pure water for domestic and other similar purposes. Opinion of the Justices, 150 Mass. 592, 8 L. R. A. 487. It may be a matter of some difficulty to determine precisely what uses are included within the public purposes for which water lawfully may be taken. In regard to uses strictly domestic, there can be no doubt. We are of opinion that other uses are included, such as are fairly incidental to the ordinary modes of living in cities and large towns, and as involve the operation of motors requiring but a small quantity of water, which may reasonably be supplied from an aqueduct of such capacity as would be needed to meet the ordinary requirements of the inhabitants for domestic and other similar purposes. We are of opinion that the use in the present case was one for which the town might legally furnish water.

The terms of the contract were not expressed in full, but were left in part to implication. In construing the contract, we must consider the situation of the parties, and their relation to the subject with which they were dealing. The town was acting in the performance of a public duty, in supplying water for public use, and incidentally was making contracts with individuals, adapted to the circumstances of each particular case. It would not be expected to guarantee a supply of water against all contingencies, but only to guarantee proper effort to insure a constant supply. In the regulations, which were made part of the contract, the right to shut off the water in all cases when it becomes necessary to make extensions or repairs, and whenever the commissioners deem it expedient, was expressly reserved. Subject only to that reserved right, the town was bound to use reasonable care and diligence to have ready for delivery a sufficient supply of water for the plaintiff's use, so long as the contract remained in force. Merrimack River Sav. Bank v. Lowell, 152 Mass. 556, 10 L. R. A. 122.

There was evidence from which the court was warranted in finding a breach of this contract. The damage to the plaintiff did not result from the exercise of the reserved right to shut off the water. It was caused by a leak which remained undiscovered until after the standpipe had been emptied, and there was no longer any pressure in the service pipes. The testimony of the expert, and the other facts of the case, warranted the inference that due diligence was not used to discover such leaks quickly, and to shut off the flow of water to the place of the leak, and to start pumping engines, so as to prevent the standpipes from being emptied. It was not contended that the plaintiff was in fault, nor that the town should be relieved from liability on the ground that it was not accountable for the neglect of the water commissioners. Hand v. Brookline, 126 Mass. 324; Neff v. Wellesley, 148 Mass. 487, 3 L. R. A. 500.

The ruling in regard to the amount of damages recoverable was correct. Stock v. Boston, 149 Mass. 410.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

CONE EXPORT &amp; COMMISSION CO.,

Appt.,

v.

J. T. POOLE, Resp't.

(..... S. C. ....)

1. A corporation has, under the law of comity, the legal capacity to sue in states other than that from which its charter was obtained.

2. Failure of the complaint of a foreign corporation to show charter power to contract and sue is not ground for demurrer under a statute allowing a demurrer only when it appears from the face of the complaint that plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue.

3. Failure to allege capacity to sue

NOTE.—Recognition or exclusion of foreign corporations.

By a long series of decisions it has been fully established that, through an exercise of comity, foreign corporations will be recognized and allowed to enforce their rights in a state, except so far as state statutes, or clear public policy of the state, prohibit it.

So if a statute restricting the rights of foreign corporations is declared unconstitutional, until a new statute on the subject is passed, a foreign corporation can enter into any business in a state for which corporations could be created in that state, since, in the absence of statutory restrictions, comity places the foreign corporation on the same footing with the domestic corporation. Lytle v. Custard, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 490.

In Re Prime's Estate, 18 L. R. A. 713, 136 N. Y. 347, it is declared that a state statute granting powers and privileges to corporations must, in the absence of plain indications to the contrary, be held to apply only to corporations created by the state, and over which it has the power of visitation and control.

The question how far statutes as to corporations will be held to apply to foreign corporations will not here be treated except so far as it touches the right of a foreign corporation to do business.

As to any monopoly or special privileges it is clear that legislative authority is confined to its own state; therefore, the legislature of one state cannot authorize a corporation to build a bridge across a river forming a state boundary and give authority to demand tolls for crossing the end of the bridge which is in another state. Middle Bridge Corp. v. Marks, 26 Me. 323.

For the same reason also, since a foreign corporation can do business in a state only by comity, it cannot obtain an injunction from a federal court against the formation of a domestic corporation bearing the same name. Lehigh Valley Coal Co. v. Hamblen, 23 Fed. Rep. 225.

In Gill v. Kentucky & C. Gold and Silver Min. Co., 7 Bush. 636, it was said that whether a foreign corporation could exercise any power in a state depends upon the law of that state, but the question did not really arise in the case.

A congressional corporation of the District of Columbia, was held entitled to do business in Tennessee. Hadley v. Freedman's Sav. & T. Co., 2 Tenn. Ch. 122.

Right to sue.

The recognition of a foreign corporation to the extent of allowing it to become a plaintiff in a suit is an exercise of comity that has been universal, except when expressly prohibited.

Henriques v. Dutch West India Co., 2 Ld. Raym. 1532, 1 Strange, 612; National Bank of St. Charles v. De Bernales, 1 Car. & P. 569; Tombigbee R. Co. v. Kneeland, 45 U. The absence of the certificate, which the foreign corporation is required to have by N. Y. Laws 1892, chap. 687, § 15, in order to maintain an action on a contract, will not prevent the corporation from maintaining an action of replevin, as that is purely ex delicto. American Typefounders Co. v. Conner, 6 Misc. 391.

To the same effect it is held in Smith v. Little, 67 Ind. 549, that the right of a foreign corporation to bring a replevin suit is not precluded by its failure to comply with statutory conditions of doing business in the state.

So on the ground that the transaction was void, where a foreign corporation had made a conditional sale of the piano, it was allowed to maintain an action of replevin for its recovery. Boulden v. Estey Organ Co. supra.

does not render a complaint demurrable as not stating a cause of action.

4. A complaint for the recovery of money alleging that plaintiff sold and delivered certain goods to defendant at prices named which were reasonably worth the amount charged therefor, and that defendant promised to pay that amount a certain number of days after the sale and delivery, but that such time had elapsed and no payment has been made and the amount is still due,—states a cause of action.

(August 15, 1894.)

The failure of a foreign corporation to file articles of incorporation, for which it is denied by statute the right to make a defense in relation to its property, rents, issues, or profits does not prevent it from defending a suit to recover money for work and labor done at its request. Weeks v. Garibaldi South Gold Min. Co. 78 Cal. 599.

An action by a foreign corporation to recover a tax paid under protest cannot be defeated on the ground that the corporation has not complied with the statute so as to be authorized to transact business in the state. Powder River Cattle Co. v. Custer County, 9 Mont. 145.

Even if the failure of a foreign corporation to obtain a permit prevents it from doing business it does not exclude it from asserting rights under a contract which was lawful when made. Middlebrook v. David Bradley Mfg. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) June 21, 1894.

Failure to comply with the provisions of the Massachusetts Act of 1884, chap. 330, requiring a foreign corporation to appoint the commissioner of corporations its attorney for service of process against it, and to file a copy of its charter before beginning business in the state, but expressly declaring that such failure shall not affect the validity of any contract of the corporation, will not prevent the corporation from maintaining a suit within the state. C. B. Rogers & Co. Corp. v. Simmons, 155 Mass. 259.

A statute prohibiting any corporation or person to maintain any action in any court of the state until after filing certain statements of capital, assets, and liabilities does not affect the right of a foreign banking company to bring a suit in the circuit court of the United States sitting in that state. Bank of British North America v. Barling, 44 Fed. Rep. 641; Haley Livestock Co. v. Routt County (C. D. Colo.) 2 Denver Legal Laws, 275.

So, a foreign insurance company may sue to collect a premium for insurance on property in the state, although it has not complied with the state statutes so as to be entitled to do business in the state, where the contract for insurance was made in another state in which it was valid. Connecticut River Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Way, 63 N. H. 622.

A foreign corporation is not debarred from suit because it was incorporated for the illegal purpose of blockade running, if the transaction involved in the suit was legal. Importing & Exporting Co. of Georgia v. Locke, 50 Ala. 332.

A foreign corporation is also within the provisions of a statute allowing suit by a corporation after dissolution. Stetson v. New Orleans City Bank, 3 Ohio St. 174.

And a foreign bank may sue under a statute as to joint actions by banks on negotiable paper. Lewis v. Bank of Kentucky, 12 Ohio, 132, 40 Am. Dec. 469.

An action for a libel may be maintained in Illinois by a foreign corporation. Jewelers Mercantile Agency v. Douglass, 85 Ill. App. 627. A query was made as to this in Hahnemannian L. Ins. Co. v. Beebe, 48 Ill. 38, 95 Am. Dec. 519.

A foreign corporation lawfully appointed and

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Johnson & Richey, for appellant:

The complaint is its own justification. It alleges the making of the contract, the full performance thereof by the plaintiff, and the breach by the defendant.

exercising the duties of administrator in the state of its creation may bring suit as such administrator for a debt due the decedent in another state. Deringer v. Deringer, 5 Houst. (Del.) 418.

The filing of its articles by a foreign corporation and the appointment of an agent before the commencement of a suit to foreclose a mechanic's lien although after the filing of the lien notice, is sufficient under Hill's Code, Wash. §§ 1525 and 1526, for the purpose of such suit. Hutting Bros. Mfg. Co. v. Denny Hotel Co. of Seattle, 6 Wash. 123.

Right of contract.

By the comity of nations, foreign corporations may make contracts and transact business not contrary to the laws of the place. Bard v. Poole, 12 N. Y. 495; Blair v. Perpetual Ins. Co. 10 Mo. 559, 47 Am. Dec. 129; Kerchner v. Gettys, 18 S. C. 521; Ohio L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Merchants Ins. & T. Co. 11 Humph. 1, 53 Am. Dec. 742; Bank of Marietta v. Pindall, 2 Rand. (Va.) 465; Lathrop v. Commercial Bank of Scioto, 8 Dana, 114, 33 Am. Dec. 481; Frazier v. Wilcox, 4 Rob. (La.) 517; Wood Hydraulic Hose Mfg. Co. v. King, 45 Ga. 34; Saltmarsh v. Spaulding, 147 Mass. 224.

The presumption is in favor of the power of a foreign corporation to exercise the powers conferred by its charter. Alward v. Holmes, 10 Abb. N. C. 98.

A foreign corporation may make a note, unless prohibited by its charter or the laws of the place. New York Floating Derrick Co. v. New Jersey Oil Co. 3 Duer, 648.

Notes and mortgages may be taken by a foreign corporation, unless prohibited. Williams v. Creswell, 51 Miss. 817.

As to the power of a corporation to take mortgages on real estate, see note to Lancaster v. Amsterdam Imp. Co. (N. Y.) post, 322.

A note given to a foreign corporation carrying on the business of banking within the state was held a valid contract in Tombigbee R. Co. v. Kneeland, 45 U. S. 4 How. 16, 11 L. ed. 855.

The validity of negotiable paper purchased or discounted by the agent of a foreign banking company was declared in Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 274, in the absence of any legislation restricting the business of such foreign corporation. The court said that when called upon to declare contracts thus made to be void, upon the ground that they conflict with the policy of the state, the line of that policy should be very clear and distinct to justify the court in sustaining the defense.

A railroad corporation which has obtained and exercised the right to extend its road into a state other than that of its incorporation must be deemed, as to contracts in the latter state, to possess the powers and be subject to liabilities of similar corporations created by that state. Milnor v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 53 N. Y. 383.

In the case of Henriques v. Dutch West India Co. 2 Ld. Raym. 1522, 1 Strange, 612, the right of a foreign corporation to take a recognizance was sustained.

Pom. Rem. & Rem. Rights, 453.

The plaintiff's primary right is to receive the price of his goods, which were sold and delivered to the defendant; the defendant's primary duty is to pay for the goods as he promised to do; the delict or wrong is defendant's refusal to pay for the goods, which constitutes a breach of such primary right and duty.

Mr. W. H. Martin, for respondent:

Does the complaint show legal capacity in plaintiff to sue? This could only appear by express authority in its charter, or by necessary implication from the nature of the business it had authority to engage in. The complaint is silent as to both, and in the absence of these affirmative facts appearing on the face of the complaint, the demurrer was properly sustained.

Head v. Providence Ins. Co. 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 127, 2 L. ed. 229; Dartmouth College Trustees v. Woodward, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 636, 4 L. ed. 659.

The complaint does not show that plaintiff

For validity of contracts by foreign corporations which have not complied with statutory requirements, see note to Edison General Electric Co. v. Canadian Pacific Nav. Co., post, 315.

Ownership of property.

A foreign corporation may take a bequest of personal property. Sherwood v. American Bible Soc. 4 Abb. App. Dec. 227; Brown v. Thompkins, 49 Md. 423.

Even when domestic corporations are not allowed to do because the trust involved is prohibited by the statutes of that state. Presbyterian Church Trustees in United States v. Guthrie, 6 L. R. A. 821, 86 Va. 125; Vansant v. Roberts, 3 Md. 119.

Bequests to foreign corporations are upheld in Hollis v. Drew Theological Seminary, 95 N. Y. 166, and Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, 43 N. Y. 424, in which a will required a conversion of the estate both real and personal and a payment of legacies from the proceeds.

As to devise to and ownership of land by foreign corporations, see note to Lancaster v. Amsterdam Imp. Co. (N. Y.) post, 322.

Power to act as trustee, administrator, etc.

The capacity of a foreign corporation, which was a trust company, to act as committee of the estate of an habitual drunkard, under an appointment in the state of its creation, and to become and be made a party to a bill of interpleader respecting the estate, is sustained in Glaser v. Priest, 29 Mo. App. 1.

The power of a foreign corporation to act as a trustee was denied in United States Trust Co. v. Lee, 73 Ill. 142, 24 Am. Rep. 236, although it was entitled so to act in its own state on the ground that it could not hold real estate for that purpose in Illinois, but the law of that state is changed since by statute, July 1, 1879. Pennsylvania Co. for Insurance on Lives v. Bauerle, 143 Ill. 459.

And in Deringer v. Deringer, 5 Houst. (Del.) 416, suit by a foreign corporation as administrator was allowed.

Limitations by charter or statute of state where incorporated.

The general doctrine is that the charter limitations on the powers of a corporation follow it into every state in which it may do business. Bank of Edwardsville v. Simpson, 1 Mo. 184; Ohio L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Merchants Ins. & T. Co. 11 Humph. 1, 53 Am. Dec. 742; Blair v. Perpetual Ins. Co. 10 Mo. 559, 47 Am. Dec. 129.

But this doctrine that charter prohibitions are extraterritorial will not apply to defeat the title of a bona fide holder of railroad bonds issued by a foreign corporation by reason of the violation of the charter of the company in selling the bonds for less than the amount limited by the charter. Ellsworth v. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. 98 N. Y. 553.

And a general statute prohibiting banking does not affect the right of a corporation of that state to do banking business in another state. Ohio L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Merchants Ins. & T. Co. supra.

A statutory restriction on the amount of gifts to 94 L. R. A.

corporations by will does not apply to wills made in another state making gifts to corporations of the former state. American Bible Soc. v. Healy, 10 L. R. A. 766, 153 Mass. 197.

But it does apply to a gift by a resident to a foreign corporation. Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, 43 N. Y. 424; Hollis v. Drew Theological Seminary, 95 N. Y. 166.

In one case the statutory restriction on gifts by will made within one month of testator's death was held to limit the right of corporations of that state to take by will in another state. Kerr v. Dougherty, 79 N. Y. 327.

This seems to disagree with the doctrine that statutes of wills have no extraterritorial effect upon the capacity of corporations to take. See on this point more at large in the note to Lancaster v. Amsterdam Imp. Co. (N. Y.) post,—on the subject of the power of foreign corporations to take title to land.

Good faith of foreign incorporation.

A foreign corporation which is not allowed to do any business in the state which grants the charter, but is created with power to engage in business only in other states will not be recognized in another state, but will be regarded as a fraud. Land Grant R. & Trust Co. v. Coffey County Comrs. 6 Kan. 245.

A corporation organized under the laws of Colorado, with a stated capital of $1,000,000 when subscriptions had been secured only to the amount of $42,000, in order to evade the restrictions of the laws of Missouri, where the incorporators resided, which required all the stock to be subscribed and at least 50 per cent paid up before organization, is a fraud on the laws of both states, which will not protect the corporators from liability as partners, where the business of the company was to conduct an exposition or mammoth fair at St. Joseph, Mo. Cleaton v. Emery, 49 Mo. App. 245.

A company incorporated in New Jersey for the purpose of carrying on the business of quarrying in New Jersey was refused recognition as a corporation by the New Jersey court and the members regarded as partners, on the ground that their incorporation was a fraud on the law of New York. Hill v. Beach, 12 N. J. Eq. 51.

This is a leading case on this side of the question, but can hardly be reconciled with the generally established doctrine of comity in recognizing foreign corporations unless something more is shown than the mere fact of incorporation in one state to do business in another.

The same court in Central R. Co. of New Jersey v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 51 N. J. Eq. 475, declared that nonresidents might be incorporators in New Jersey under the statute which said that a majority of the directors must be residents.

In Montgomery v. Forbes, 143 Mass. 249, a person was liable as an individual for business in the name of a corporation where he had attempted to incorporate a company in another state but had not complied with the statute which did not allow one person to become a corporation while he in fact had the power to do business beyond the limits of the state of its creation. The complaint does not show that plaintiff had the authority under its charter to engage in the business alleged—in other words, to sell goods, wares, and merchandise.

Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 586, 10 L. ed. 306; Rece v. Newport News & M. V. R. Co. 3 L. R. A. 572, 32 W. Va. 164, and the authorities supra. For aught the court knows, the plaintiff may have been created by its charter for the purpose of building and operating a railroad as a steamship line or for other and foreign purposes to that of dealing in merchandise.

McIver, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented by this appeal arising upon a demurrer to the complaint, it is necessary to set forth the complaint, viz.: "(1) That the said plaintiff, Cone Export & Commission Co., is a corporation, created as such by and under the laws of the state of

was the only person interested. Here it is clear that the incorporation was a fraud and without regard to the residence of the incorporator he was rightfully regarded as an individual proprietor of the business.

A stockholder was held not liable as a partner in Stafford Nat. Bank v. Palmer, 47 Conn. 443, where an attempt to incorporate in Connecticut to continue a business in Massachusetts was made. The court did not discuss the effect in general of such an incorporation but held that the defendant at least was innocent of wrong if any had been done and that he took his stock in exchange for stock in a former corporation organized in Massachusetts and without knowing that the place of corporation had been changed.

The effect of a charter in one state, where the business of a corporation is entirely conducted in another, except its annual elections, is discussed at length in Merrick v. Van Santvoord, 34 N. Y. 28; Merrick v. Brainard, 38 Barb. 574,—in which the question directly decided was that a stockholder and director could not be held individually liable on the ground that the corporation had forfeited its charter by migration from another state. The court declared that a corporate franchise could not be revoked or annulled by the courts of another state, especially in a proceeding to which the corporation was not a party.

The fact that all the incorporators reside in another state and carry on all the business of the company there, will not make a corporation void if it complies with the laws of the state under which it is incorporated. Moxie Nerve Food Co. v. Baumbach, 32 Fed. Rep. 205.

A Kentucky corporation created mostly for Ohio business, but incorporated in Kentucky because the residence of the incorporators prevented them from being directors under the Ohio laws, is not a fraud on the laws of Ohio, so as to make the members personally liable, at least to one of its own officers. Second Nat. Bank of Cincinnati v. Lovell, 2 Cin. Sup. Ct. Rep. 397.

A corporation created in another state cannot be held to be a fraud because it has done nothing but organize in its own state. Hanna v. International Petroleum Co. 23 Ohio St. 622.

An Illinois corporation engaged in the business of leasing railroad cars, the entire business of which seemed to consist of periodical settlements with the leasing railroad company for the use of the cars, was held not to be falsely and fraudulently posing as a domestic corporation when it had in fact migrated, where its property was all located in the state and managed, used, and controlled there, with an office at which all its meetings of stockholders and directors were held, although it kept an office in another state, where its books were kept most of the time, and its corporators were residents of such other state. North & South Rolling Stock Co. v. People, 147 Ill. 234.

The incorporation in another state of a company composed of residents of New York is held not to constitute an evasion of the laws of New York, although the principal place of business is in that 24 L. R. A.

state, where there was no fraud or evasion of the law of the state of incorporation, and the certificate of incorporation was granted by the secretary of the state with knowledge of the facts. Demarest v. Grant, 13 L. R. A. 854, 128 N. Y. 205.

While the fact that citizens of Rhode Island go to Kentucky for the act of incorporation is one that naturally excites curiosity if not suspicion as to the motives and good faith of the concern, yet so long as it pursues a lawful business and violates no law of Rhode Island the courts of that state will not refuse to recognize it. Oakdale Mfg. Co. v. Garst (R. L.) 23 L. R. A. 639.

The court adds: "We can hardly deny the right of a foreign corporation to do business in this state upon considerations of public policy when our own statutes (Pub. Laws, chap. 1200) expressly provide for corporations formed in this state for carrying on business out of the state."

In Empire Mills v. Alston Grocery Co. (Tex.) 12 L. R. A. 366, the incorporation in Iowa of persons engaged in mercantile business in Texas was allowed to be fraudulent with intent to evade the laws of Texas, and this was found to be true, but it was also declared that the statutes of Texas prohibited the operation of such corporations in the state. The court made the further declaration,—not entirely necessary to the decision, and contrary to the doctrine of the majority of decisions on the subject,—that "a corporation cannot incorporate in one state for the purpose of carrying on all of its corporate business in another."

Statutory exclusion of or restrictions upon foreign corporations.

That discrimination against foreign corporations is lawful is decided expressly or by implication in all the decisions on the subject except so far as such discrimination may violate constitutional provisions, such as those relating to interstate commerce, and the equal protection of the laws.

That a corporation is a person within the constitutional guaranty of equal protection of the laws, but is not a citizen within the guaranty of equal privileges and immunities, see note to Louisville Safety Vault & T. Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Ky.) 14 L. R. A. 580, 585.

As to the effect of state restrictions or burdens on foreign corporations, as unconstitutional regulations of commerce, see note to Kindel v. Beck & P. Lithographing Co. post, 811.

The restrictions on the right of foreign insurance companies to do business within a state are in most states applicable to insurance companies alone, and are separately treated in a note to State v. ACKERMAN, post, 298.

In respect to a statute providing that no corporation should engage in mercantile or agricultural business, nor any commission, brokerage, stock jobbing, exchange or banking business, the court said "It is highly probable that it does not apply to a corporation created by and under the laws of" another state. Graham v. Hendricks, 23 La. Ann. 523.

But a banking company incorporated in another

New Jersey; (2) that on the days and dates, and at the prices, set forth in an itemized, verified copy of account (herein attached and made a part of this complaint), the said plaintiff, under its corporate name, sold and delivered to the said defendant, at his request, and the said defendant bought of said plaintiff, goods, wares, and merchandise of the value of one hundred and fifteen and 88-100 dollars; (3) that the said goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered and bought, as aforesaid, were reasonably worth the sum of one hundred and fifteen and 88-100 dollars, and the said defendant promised and agreed to pay the said sum for same within sixty days after the sale and delivery of said goods, wares, and merchandise; (4) that said account for said goods, wares, and merchandise is past due and wholly unpaid, and the said defendant is now justly due and owing said plaintiff on said account the sum of one hundred and fifteen and 88-100 dollars,"—and a regularly itemized copy of the account was attached to the complaint. The defendant filed a de-state was held subject to the New York statute forbidding the exercise of banking business in the state, except as authorized thereby. Pennington v. Townsend, 7 Wend. 276.

In Texas it was held that the repeal of a statute granting the privilege of organizing mercantile organizations was a direct prohibition against the operation of such corporation within the state, and therefore the law of comity did not require that a mercantile corporation organized under the law of another state should be allowed to do business in Texas. Empire Mills v. Alston Grocery Co. (Tex.) 12 L. R. A. 386.

De facto foreign corporations.

The question whether or not a foreign corporation can be regarded as a de facto corporation has arisen in different phases.

In Re Comstock, 38 Sawy. 218, it is declared that in respect to the validity of contracts of foreign corporations which are doing unauthorized business because they have not complied with statutory conditions the rule as to de facto corporations does not apply, but it is a question of corporate power. This is the necessary position of those courts which hold that prohibited contracts of foreign corporations are void.

In harmony with this it is said in Semple v. Bank of British Columbia, 5 Sawy. 88, that until compliance with statutory conditions a foreign corporation was to be considered neither a de jure nor a de facto corporation.

But on the contrary it has been held in South Dakota that a foreign corporation doing business within the state, without complying with the statutory conditions, under laws declaring that it shall not do any business until it has complied with them, is to be regarded as a de facto corporation. Wright v. Lee (S. Dak.) July 29, 1893, affirming on rehearing March 16, 1892.

This case denies the right of private individuals to question the right of the foreign corporation to make contracts because of failure to comply with the statutes.

This disagreement is only another phase of the conflict among the decisions as to the validity of unauthorized or prohibited contracts by foreign corporations which have not complied with statutory requirements. As to this, see note to Edison General Electric Co. v. Canadian Pacific Nav. Co. post 315.

The question of de facto corporations arises also in respect to fraudulent incorporation in another state to evade the laws of the state in which business is to be carried on. Such an organization will be held to be a partnership with respect to individual liability of members. Empire Mills Co. v. Alston Grocery Co. (Tex.) 12 L. R. A. 386; Hill v. Beach, 12 N. J. Eq. 81.

This is another phase of the question of good faith of foreign incorporation, as to which see above under that heading.

For de facto domestic corporations defectively organized, see note to Rutherford v. Hill (Or.) 17 L. R. A. 542.

Designation of agent and place of business.

The designation by a foreign corporation of its agent sufficiently states his "known place of business" within the meaning of the Alabama constitution, by stating the place in which he resides, without designating any particular office or other place in the city. McLeod v. American Freehold Land Mortg. Co. of London (Ala.) Dec. 21, 1893.

The constitutional requirement of a known place of business and an authorized agent is complied with by establishing a place of business at which a person is empowered to receive service of process, and posting a sign or placard in his office stating his character as agent. New England Mortg. Secur. Co. v. Ingram, 91 Ala. 387.

The agent designated need not be a person who is authorized to exercise any of the contractual powers of the company. Neils v. Edinburgh American Land Mortg. Co. 92 Ala. 157; McCall v. American Freehold Land Mortg. Co. (Ala.) April 5, 1893.

The failure to give the name of its general manager in the state appointed by a foreign corporation as agent on whom process may be served does not make the certificate insufficient. Goodwin v. Colorado Mortg. & Investment Co. of London, 110 U. S. 1, 28 L. ed. 47.

License tax.

The exaction of a license fee to enable a foreign corporation engaged in general mining and milling business to have an office in the state for the use of its officers, stockholders, agents, and employees is clearly within the competency of the legislature. Pembina Consol. Silver Min. & Mill. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S. 181, 31 L. ed. 650.

Having the absolute power of excluding a foreign corporation, a state may impose such conditions on permitting it to do business within its limits as it may judge expedient; and it may make the grant or privilege dependent on the payment of a specific license tax, or a sum proportioned to the amount of its capital. Horn Silver Min. Co. v. New York, 143 U. S. 305, 36 L. ed. 164, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 57, affirming People v. Horn Silver Min. Co. 105 N. Y. 76; People v. Equitable Trust Co. of New London, 96 N. Y. 387.

An annual tax by way of license for the exercise of a corporate franchise may be imposed upon foreign corporations doing business in a state. State v. Berry, 52 N. J. L. 308.

A state tax upon a corporate franchise or business of a foreign corporation, the amount of which is to be determined by the capital stock and dividends of the company is not a tax on the capital stock of property of the company, but on its corporate franchise and may be fixed at any sum that the legislature may choose. Home Ins. Co. v. New York, 134 U. S. 594, 33 L. ed. 1025, affirming People v. Home Ins. Co. 92 N. Y. 323; People v. Horn Silver Min. Co. 105 N. Y. 76.

A tax on the amount of capital stock of a foreign corporation, which maintains a sales agency and office in the state and keeps a bank account there for convenience of local transactions, is sustainable murrer in writing, upon the ground "that it appears upon the face of the complaint (1) that the plaintiff had no legal capacity to sue; (2) that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." The circuit judge, in a short order, and without stating his reasons or on which of the grounds he acted, rendered judgment sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the complaint. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals upon two grounds, substantially, the third ground set out in the record being merely the legal consequence of the other two grounds, viz.: (1) Because of error in holding that the complaint showed upon its face that the plaintiff had no legal capacity to sue; (2) because of error in holding that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

As to the first ground, it is very apparent that all that the complaint shows upon its face is that the plaintiff is a foreign corporation; and, unless it can be shown that the mere fact that a plaintiff is a foreign corporation under a statute authorizing such tax on a foreign corporation "doing business" within the state Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Wemple, 44 Fed. Rep. 24.

A tax on foreign companies "having an office or place of business within the commonwealth for the direction of its affairs or transfer of shares" is no unconstitutional, although it is based on the percentage of the par of the capital stock. Atty-Gen. v. Bay State Min. Co. 99 Mass. 148, 96 Am. Dec. 717.

The right of the state of Pennsylvania to impose on the New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. as a condition of doing business in the state the duty of paying a state tax on corporate bonds held by resident holders, was sustained in Com. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 129 Pa. 463. But this case was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States in New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 153 U. S. 638, 38 L. ed. —, on the ground that the state having given to the railroad company upon a valuable consideration the right to extend its road into the state could not withdraw the assent after the road had been built as this would impair the obligation of a contract. There was another reason for the decision, that as to payment of interest made in New York, although on bonds held by residents of Pennsylvania the latter state could not impose any burdens by way of taxation because the property was out of the state.

A tax on the capital stock of a foreign corporation was held not to be a license tax, and to be valid only as to so much of its stock as was invested in the state. Com. v. Standard Oil Co. 101 Pa. 119.

A license tax imposed on any agent of a foreign express company is held constitutional in Woodward v. Com. 9 Ky. L. Rep. 670, where it seems to have been attacked on the ground that it discriminated against nonresidents, and it was held valid on the ground that a corporation was not a citizen entitled to equal privileges and immunities. No question seems to have been raised in the case as to the effect of the license tax to interfere with interstate commerce.

A statute exempting from license tax, manufacturing or mining companies carrying on business in the state is not an unconstitutional discrimination against those which carry on business outside the state. State v. Under-Ground Cable Co. (N. J.) Nov. 8, 1889.

A foreign corporation cannot object that a license tax imposed upon it is the same that should have been demanded of a home corporation. State v. Liverpool, London & Globe Ins. Co. 40 La. Ann. 463.

The payment of a percentage on the capital stock of the corporation at or before filing its articles of incorporation, under Minn. Gen. Laws 1889, chap. 225, is required of an Iowa railroad company on filing its articles, as required by Minn. Gen. Laws 1877, chap. 14, in order to extend and build its road into the state. State v. Sioux City & N. R. Co. 43 Minn. 17.

The subject of taxation of foreign corporations is not here considered except so far as it is in the nature of a license tax imposed as a condition of permission to do business in the state. The same question so far as it relates to burdens on interstate commerce is also presented in other cases as to taxation.

Conditions against invoking federal jurisdiction.

A state statute denying the right of a foreign corporation to do business in the state, unless it stipulates in advance that it will not remove to a Federal court any suit brought against it by a citizen of the state, is repugnant to the constitution and laws of the United States. Home Ins. Co. v. New York v. Morse, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 445, 22 L. ed. 65; Barron v. Burnside, 121 U. S. 186, 30 L. ed. 915, 1 Intera. Com. Rep. 295, reversing Goodrel v. Kreichbaum, 70 Iowa, 362; Southern Pac. R. Co. v. Denton, 146 U. S. 202, 38 L. ed. 942; Texas Land & Mortg. Co. v. Worsam, 76 Tex. 556; Railway Passenger Assur. Co. of Hartford v. Pierce, 27 Ohio St. 155; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Cary, 28 Ohio St. 208; Rece v. Newport News & M. V. R. Co. 3 L. R. A. 572, 32 W. Va. 164.

The case of Barron v. Burnside, supra, was one of three decided together by the supreme court of Iowa, and reported under the title of Goodrel v. Kreichbaum, 70 Iowa, 362, in which, the court being doubtful as to the constitutionality of the state statute, upheld it "to the end that the questions presented may be determined by the Supreme Court of the United States," by which the decision of the state court was reversed. The Iowa statute involved in that case made it a misdemeanor for an agent, officer, or employé of any foreign corporation "for pecuniary profit other than for carrying on mercantile or manufacturing business," to transact business for such corporation when it has no valid permit to do business. And the petitioners in the three cases above mentioned were arrested for performing services as employés of an interstate railroad.

Before the question had been settled by the above decision of the United States Supreme Court several state courts held that a statute prohibiting the removal of a suit against a foreign corporation to a federal court, when the corporation had accepted its provisions, was valid. People v. Judge of Jackson Circuit Ct. 21 Mich. 579, 4 Am. Rep. 504; Home Ins. Co. v. Davis, 29 Mich. 228; Goodrel v. Kreichbaum, supra.

So in Ohio a statute requiring a waiver of the privilege of invoking the federal jurisdiction by a foreign corporation was held valid. New York L. Ins. Co. v. Best, 23 Ohio St. 105.

These decisions are of course rendered obsolete by the decisions above.

A state statute providing a penalty for removal by a foreign corporation of a suit to a federal court is unconstitutional. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Becker, 32 Fed. Rep. 849.

Since a statute requiring a foreign corporation to agree not to remove a case against it into a federal court as a condition of a permit to do business in the state is void, it was held in Texas that the corporation may lawfully do business in the state without such permit, at least to the extent of asserting rights and recovering property already ac-deprives such plaintiff of the capacity to sue in the courts of this state, it is quite certain that the demurrer cannot be sustained on the first ground. No authority to sustain such a proposition has been, and, we may venture to say, can be cited. On the contrary, the authorities are abundant to show that a foreign corporation does have the capacity to sue in states other than the state from which its charter has been obtained. Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 88 U. S. 18 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 274, in which Mr. Chief Justice Taney, in delivering the opinion of the court, uses this language: "We think it is well settled that, by the law of comity among nations, a corporation created by one sovereignty is permitted to make contracts in another, and to sue in its courts; and that the same law of comity prevails among the several sovereignties of this Union." See also American & Foreign Christian Union v. Yount, 101 U. S. 352, 25 L. ed. 838, and in our own state see Bank of Cape Fear v. Stinemetz, 1 Hill, L. 44; Kerchner v. Gettys, 18 S. C. 531. It is clear, therefore, that the dequired. Texas Land & Mortg. Co. v. Worsham, 76 Tex. 554.

But the Supreme Court of the United States held that while a state statute prohibiting a foreign corporation from removing a case against it from a state to a federal court is invalid, the state officers cannot be prevented by injunction from canceling the license of a foreign corporation to do business in the state when required to do so by state statute, because the corporation has made such removal of suit. Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co. of New York, 94 U. S. 535, 24 L. ed. 143. This decision proceeds on the theory that a state has an absolute right to exclude a foreign corporation or revoke a license when given to it, for any cause whatever, or without any cause, and that the motive or intention of the state in so doing is not open to inquiry.

The case of Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co. of New York, supra, overrules, without mentioning it, the case of Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Doyle, 6 Biss. 461, in which the circuit court had granted an injunction restraining the secretary of state from attempting to forfeit the license of a foreign insurance company because of an attempt to remove a case to a federal court.

In Barron v. Burnside, 121 U. S. 186, 30 L. ed. 915, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 236, no agreement by the foreign corporation that it would not remove a case to the federal court had been made, but an agent of a foreign corporation arrested for transacting business for it without a permit was held entitled to his discharge on habeas corpus, because the statutory provisions as to permit were void. It is said in this case that the point of the decision in Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co. of New York, "seems to have been that, as the state had granted the license, its officer would not be restrained by injunction by a court of the United States from withdrawing it. All that there is in the case beyond this, and all that is said in the opinion which appears to be in conflict with the adjudication in Home Ins. Co. of New York v. Morse, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 445, 22 L. ed. 365, must be regarded as not in judgment."

A state statute making appearance, even for the purpose of objecting to jurisdiction, a waiver of immunity from jurisdiction by reason of nonresidence, does not apply to a foreign corporation when sued in a federal court. Horn Silver Min. Co. v. New York, 143 U. S. 306, 36 L. ed. 164, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 57.

So a statute requiring a foreign insurance company to assent to service in a certain manner was held not to prevent removal to a federal court. Hobbs v. Manhattan Ins. Co., 56 Me. 417, 96 Am. Dec. 472; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Dickinson, 40 Ind. 444, 18 Am. Rep. 295.

And a contract with the foreign corporation to be amenable to suits in the state did not prevent it from bringing suit in a federal court. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. Harper, 3 Hughes, C. C. 260.

A foreign insurance company is not precluded from removing to a federal court a case brought against it in a state court because it has not complied with Mass. Gen. Stat., chap. 58, § 63, and appointed a general agent on whom process may be served "with like effect as if the company existed in the state," and stipulated that process served on him "shall be of the same legal force and validity as if served on said company." Morton v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. of New York, 105 Mass. 141, 7 Am. Rep. 605.

Remedies against.

Quo warranto is a proper remedy to oust a foreign insurance company from the exercise of franchisees and privileges without authority of law. State v. Fidelity & Casualty Ins. Co., 16 L. R. A. 611, 49 Ohio St. 440; State v. Western U. Mut. L. & Acc. Soc. of United States, 8 L. R. A. 129, 47 Ohio St. 187; State v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 39 Minn. 538; Wright v. Lee (S. Dak.) July 29, 1893, affirming on rehearing (S. Dak.) March 16, 1892.

Information in the nature of quo warranto is also the proper remedy for eachest of lands unlawfully acquired by a foreign corporation. Com. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 114 Pa. 340.

A foreign corporation doing insurance business in the state unlawfully without license, under a name which is liable to be confused with that of another corporation, may be enjoined on application of the latter against continuing the business. Employers Liability Assur. Corp. v. Employers Liability Ins. Co., 61 Hun. 553.

What constitutes "doing business" prohibited by statute.

The making in Colorado of a single contract by which an Ohio corporation, having no place of business in Colorado, agreed to build and deliver in Ohio certain machinery for which the other party agreed to pay, did not constitute a carrying on of business in Colorado within the meaning of a statute requiring foreign corporations to comply with certain conditions in order to be authorized "to do business" in the state. Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, 113 U. S. 727, 23 L. ed. 1137.

A foreign corporation which makes a contract in the state for machinery to be manufactured and erected in another state does not thereby engage in business in the state, within the meaning of a statute prescribing conditions for doing business, although it may be sufficient to render the corporation amenable to jurisdiction, if it can be obtained, as provided by the laws of the state by serving process on an agent or representative. Colorado Iron Works v. Sierra Grande Min. Co., 15 Colo. 499.

A sale of goods in another state by a foreign corporation, and a suit within the state for the purchase price, do not come within the provisions of the Texas Act of April 3, 1889, requiring a foreign corporation for pecuniary profit desiring to transact business in the state to file its articles and obtain a permit and declaring that "hereafter no such corporation can maintain any suit . . . upon any demand," unless it has thus filed its articles. Reed v. Walker, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 92.

Notes executed in the state to a foreign corporation for goods furnished in another state are not invalid, under Dak. Civ. Code, § 597, providing that murrer cannot be sustained on the first ground.

We infer, however, from the argument here, that respondent's counsel did not intend to question the general proposition which we have been considering,—whether a foreign corporation has capacity to sue in the courts of this state,—but that his real point is that, unless a complaint brought by a foreign corporation contains allegations showing that such corporation has, by its charter, been invested with the power to contract and to sue, it cannot maintain an action in the courts of this state. But this point cannot be raised by a demurrer, upon the ground that the complaint shows on its face that the plaintiff has no capacity to sue, for the complaint does not show anything of the kind. The most that can be said is that the complaint fails to show that the plaintiff has been invested with power to sue; but such omission affords no ground for demurrer, as it is based upon a defect (if defect it be) in the complaint, and not upon what it shows on its face. The Code, in section 165, allows a demurrer only when it appears upon the face of the complaint "that no foreign corporation shall "transact any business" until it has complied with the conditions of the statutes. Fuller & J. Mfg. Co. v. Foster (Dak.) Oct. 4, 1886.

For transactions of foreign corporations which are protected as interstate commerce, see note to Kindel v. Beck & P. Lithographing Co. (Colo.) post, 311.

The fact that a foreign corporation may be conducting a banking business in violation of the laws of the state will not prevent a loan by it on mortgage security from being valid, when not connected with its banking business. Bard v. Poole, 12 N. Y. 496.

The violation by a foreign corporation of the restrictive law of New York as to banking business does not make invalid a loan by the company on bond and mortgage, unless it is shown that this particular contract was entered into in violation of the law. Mumford v. American L. Ins. & T. Co. 4 N. Y. 468.

The mere taking of a bond and mortgage by a foreign insurance company, not in the course of transacting the business of insurance, is not a violation of the statute providing that no agent of a foreign company shall transact any business of insurance in the state, except on specified conditions. Bouliware v. Davis, 9 L. R. A. 601, 90 Ala. 207.

A loan of money by a foreign corporation is not doing business within the state, if the agreement was made, the notes and securities delivered, and the money paid in another state. Sorrigs v. Soot-tish Mortg. Co. 54 Ark. 566.

A single loan made in good faith by a foreign banking company, which has an office for exchange business in the state, is not a violation of a statute prohibiting the keeping of an office of discount and deposit. Suydam v. Morris Canal & Bkg. Co. 6 Hill, 217, affirming 5 Hill, 491, note.

The fact that officers of a foreign moneyed corporation came into the state and purchased mortgages, for which they paid partly by a draft and partly by circulating notes of the foreign corporation, with an understanding that they should be put into circulation, does not violate the New York statute prohibiting the foreign corporation from keeping any office for receiving deposits or discounting notes or bills, or issuing any evidence of debt to be loaned, or put into circulation as money. Western Reserve Bank v. Potter, Clarke's Ch. 451, 7 L. ed. 163.

A corporation which is shown to be merely engaged in loaning money upon note and mortgage is not thereby shown to be a banking corporation within the restrictions of the Oregon Act of November 21, 1884, against foreign insurance and banking corporations, etc. Oregon & W. T. & I. Co. v. Rathbun, 5 Sawy. 62.

The purchase of railroad securities secured by a mortgage upon property is not "doing business" in the state within the meaning of Mont. Comp. Stat. 1888, § 442, p. 720, prescribing conditions for a foreign corporation to perform before doing business in the state. Gilchrist v. Helena, H. S. & S. R. Co. 47 Fed. Rep. 538.

Compliance with statutory conditions of doing business by a foreign corporation is not necessary to allow it to take security for debts due. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. v. Sawyer, 44 Wis. 387.

That bringing a suit is not "doing business," see supra, heading "Right to sue."

The Indiana statutory provisions (Rev. Stat. 1881, §§ 3022, 3023), requiring agents of a foreign corporation to file evidence of authority with the clerk of the county in which they propose to do business, do not apply to a person coming into the state to appoint local agents. D. S. Morgan & Co. v. White, 101 Ind. 413.

A corporation formed under the laws of Maryland for the manufacture and sale of canned goods as a general agent for all its members, some of whom resided in Pennsylvania, is not, by reason of its contracts with them, doing business in Pennsylvania within the meaning of the constitutional and statutory provisions prohibiting any business by foreign corporations without compliance with certain conditions; and Pennsylvania stockholders cannot on that ground question the title of the corporation to goods which they had transferred to the corporation for sale. Kilgore v. Smith, 122 Pa. 48.

An act of agency for a foreign corporation must be performed within the state in order to bring it within the penalty of a statute which makes it an offense to act as agent for a corporation which has no right to do business in the state. Collier v. Davis, 94 Ala. 456.

A restraint on banking by foreign companies does not apply to business with a foreign corporation in another state. Bank of Marietta v. Pindall, 2 Rand. (Va.) 465.

Sending an insurance policy from another state is not carrying on business in the state. Marine Ins. Co. v. St. Louis, L. M. & S. R. Co. 41 Fed. Rep. 643; State v. Williams, 46 La. Ann. —; New Orleans v. Virginia F. & M. Ins. Co. 33 La. Ann. 11; New Orleans v. Rhenish Westphalian Lloyds, 31 La. Ann. 731.

But it is otherwise where the policies are transmitted to an agent in the State and delivered by him on receipt of the premium. Berry v. Knights-Templar & Masons' Life Indemnity Co. 46 Fed. Rep. 439.

A person in the insurance business who writes a letter to the office of a foreign corporation in another state, forwarding an application for insurance, and receives a policy which he delivers on receipt of the premium, retaining a part of it as commission, must be regarded as in some manner "aiding in transacting the insurance business" of a foreign corporation within the penal provisions of the Illinois statute, Insurance Act, § 22. Pierce v. People, 106 Ill. 11, 46 Am. Rep. 683.

An agent of a foreign insurance company, who has no authority to make an insurance but merely to receive an application, and who transmits an application to the company which is passed upon in the state of incorporation, from which a policy is sent to the applicant by mail, does not violate the Ohio statute prohibiting the sending, issuing, the plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue;" and, as that does not appear upon the face of the complaint in this case, it is clear that the demurrer cannot be sustained on the first ground, as the code does not provide for a demurrer on the ground of any omission in the complaint, except an omission to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

This brings us to a consideration of the second ground of demurrer, based upon subdivision 6 of section 165 of the Code. Taking up, first, the omission to allege in the complaint that the plaintiff was invested by its charter with the power to sue, that fact could relate only to the capacity to sue, and was not one of the facts necessary to constitute plaintiff's cause of action, and hence would afford no ground for a demurrer under subdivision 6 of section 165 of the Code, as was distinctly held in the recent case of G. Ober & Sons Co. v. Blalock (S. C.) 18 S. E. Rep. 264. Next, as to the allegations which do relate the facts constituting plaintiff's cause of action, we are unable to discover any omission there. It is distinctly alleged in the complaint that the plaintiff sold and delivered to the defend-or delivery of a policy except by a domestic corporation, or its authorized agent. Hyde v. Goodnow, 3 N. Y. 298.

But the agent is "doing business" when he takes a premium note for the foreign company, although not by merely forwarding an application. Hachemy v. Leary, 12 Or. 40.

See also as to place of insurance contract, the note to Phenix Ins. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co. (Ind.) 20 L. R. A. 405.

The adjustment of a loss on behalf of a foreign insurance company, which has not complied with the requirements of the New York statute so that it can lawfully do business, is not a transaction of the business of insurance within the meaning of that statute, and an agent is not liable to the penalty of the act for adjusting such loss. People v. Gilbert, 44 Hun, 523.

In respect to the defense that plaintiff was a foreign corporation doing business in the state without having complied with statutory requirements, the court said "there is nothing in the objection," reciting that the only business done related to a policy of insurance on which suit was brought. Tabor v. Goss & Phillips Mfg. Co. 11 Colo. 419.

But the doing of a single act of business, if it be in the exercise of a corporate function, as in the case of a loan of money on a mortgage by a mortgage security company, is within the prohibition of the Alabama constitution against doing "any business" by a foreign corporation in the state without a known place of business and authorized agent. Farrior v. New England Mortg. Secur. Co. 85 Ala. 275; Dundee Mortg. Trust & Investment Co. v. Nixon, 95 Ala. 318; Christian v. American Freehold Land Mortg. Co. 89 Ala. 198.

The conditional sale of a piano by a foreign corporation, which retained title to the instrument as security for the purchase price, was held to be within the prohibition of the Alabama constitution against doing business without conforming to the requirements of the law. Boulden v. Estey Organ Co. 93 Ala. 183. It would seem that the piano must have been within the state when sold, as nothing is said in the opinion about interstate commerce. See as to this note to Kindel v. Beek & P. Lithographing Co. (Colo.) post, 811.

A foreign corporation receiving land in a state by devise as trustee with power to sell, lease, or dispose of it, and asserting its ownership, assuming to sell and convey the land, and bringing suits in the state respecting it, must be held to be doing business within the state within the purview of Illinois Act concerning corporations, § 23, 1 Starr. & C. chap. 82, par. 22. Pennsylvania Company for Insurance on Lives v. Bauerle, 143 Ill. 449.

The ownership of interests in individual partnerships constitutes doing business in the state within the meaning of statutes relating to foreign corporations; but it is otherwise with the ownership of stock in corporations or limited partnerships. Neither does the purchase in the state by brokers of oil to be shipped to refineries outside 24 L. R. A.

the state constitute doing business in the state. Com. v. Standard Oil Co. 101 Pa. 119.

A tax on the capital stock of the American Bell Telephone Company to the extent that it was alleged to be doing business within the state of Pennsylvania was held invalid in Com. v. American Bell Teleph. Co., 129 Pa. 217, on the ground that it was not transacting any business in the state, although it owned telephone instruments which were leased to Pennsylvania corporations, and under some circumstances might be doing business in the state in enforcing rights under contracts with such lessees.

A foreign corporation does not do business within a state because it has an interest in the property rights and business of a local corporation which is equivalent to a partnership. United States v. American Bell Teleph. Co. 20 Fed. Rep. 17.

A foreign corporation which had not complied with the Pennsylvania statutes so as to be authorized to do business was refused the right to bid for a contract to furnish supplies to the state. Office Specialty Mfg. Co. v. Trenton Mfg. Co. 1 Pa. Dist. Rep. 578.

See further as to what constitutes "business" in note to State v. Ray (N. C.) 14 L. R. A. on page 530.

Estoppel to deny character or powers.

A borrower from a foreign corporation is estopped to deny its authority to loan money in the state, without showing that the loan violated its charter or some express prohibition of law. Pan-coast v. Travelers Ins. Co. 79 Ind. 172.

And in general the other party to a contract with a foreign corporation is estopped to deny the power of the corporation to make it. Newburg Petroleum Co. v. Wear, 27 Ohio St. 843.

But not to deny that the so-called foreign corporation is a fraud and not a legal corporation but that the members are partners. Empire Mills Co. v. Alston (Tex.) 12 L. R. A. 393.

It would seem that the question of estoppel against denying the corporate character or powers of a foreign corporation would in general be the same as in case of a domestic corporation, but as to denying the right of a foreign corporation to enforce a contract in a state in which the statutes prohibit it to do business, because it has not complied with specified conditions, see note to Edison General Co. v. Canadian Pacific Nav. Co. post, 315.

As to who may be served with process against foreign corporations, see note to Foster v. Charles Betcher Lumber Co. (S. Dak.) 23 L. R. A. 490.

This note does not touch the question how far the exercise of the charter powers of foreign corporations is subject to general laws of the state, as for instance the usury laws, nor does it touch the validity of acts done by a corporation at its domicile when questioned in another jurisdiction, but is intended to include only matters as to exclusion or recognition of foreign corporations and the conditions on which they may be admitted to a state.

ant, at his request, the goods specified at the prices named; that said goods were reasonably worth the amount charged; that the defendant promised and agreed to pay the sum charged within 60 days after the sale and delivery of said goods; and that, though the time limited for such payment has elapsed, no payment has been made, and the said sum is still due. If these allegations are not sufficient to constitute a cause of action in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant, we are at a loss to conceive what would be sufficient.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for the purpose of enabling the plaintiff to recover judgment for the amount which the defendant has, by his demurrer, admitted to be due by him to the plaintiff.

NOTE.—Restrictions on business of foreign insurance companies.

Although foreign insurance companies are allowed to do most kinds of business without restriction, the business of insurance is generally regarded as one which needs careful regulation and supervision for the protection of those who rely on insurers for indemnity against losses; and on this account the business of foreign insurance companies is in nearly, if not all, the states restricted by statute.

That insurance is not commerce within the constitutional provisions giving congress authority to regulate commerce and preventing state interference therewith has been fully established by the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, the final authority on the subject, as well as by decisions of the state courts. Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 6 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 367; Ducat v. Chicago, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 410, 19 L. ed. 972; Liverpool & L. Life & F. Ins. Co. v. Oliver, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 566, 19 L. ed. 1029; Home Ins. Co. of New York v. Augusta, 98 U. S. 116, 23 L. ed. 626; People v. Thurber, 18 Ill. 564; Farmers & M. Ins. Co. v. Harrah, 47 Ind. 236; List v. Com., 118 Pa. 322; State v. Phipps, 18 L. R. A. 657, 50 Kan. 609.

Therefore to insurance companies the general doctrine fully applies, that a state may exclude a foreign corporation, or impose upon it, as a condition of doing business, any burdens or restrictions that it chooses, reasonable or unreasonable.

As to assets.

The right to exclude insurance companies of other states or as a condition of admission to require not only the payment of a license tax but the deposit of securities with the state treasurer as a condition of doing business, is established in Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 6 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 367.

A statute requiring a foreign insurance company from the state, and the privilege it confers is a franchise; and any company or association carrying on its business here, without having obtained such authority, is unlawfully exercising a franchise.

4. To come within the purview of that provision of section 6760, of the Revised Statutes, which authorizes an action in quo warranto to be brought "against an association of persons who act as a corporation within this state without being legally incorporated," it is not necessary that the association, or persons composing it, avow a purpose to act as a corporation, or assume to do so; it is sufficient if the acts are such as appertain to corporations, or are done after the manner of corporations.

5. The defendants, without being legally incorporated, associated themselves together for the purpose of transacting the business of insurance, by articles of agreement, under which they issue to make a deposit of money to secure policy holders was construed without any question of the power of the state to make such requirement in Lancashire Ins. Co. v. Maxwell, 181 N. Y. 2-6.

Under Nebraska Comp. Stat. 1887, chap. 43, §§ 20 and 23, a foreign insurance company must possess at least $200,000 exclusive of any assets deposited in any other state or territory for the special benefit of those insured thereon, and must deposit in some of the United States or territories not less than $25,000 for the special benefit of policy holders. State v. Benton, 25 Neb. 834.

Under Vermont statutes a foreign mutual or co-operative insurance company must have assets amounting to $100,000 invested in good securities, with whatever additional amount may be necessary to balance its liabilities, in order to be allowed to do business in Vermont, or, as alternative to such addition, to have not less than 2,000 contributing members of sufficient ability to pay its stated benefits in full. Granite State Mut. Aid Asso. v. Porter, 58 Vt. 561.

Cash assets are not equivalent to cash capital, within the meaning of the Tennessee statute requiring a foreign fire insurance company to have at least $200,000 of paid-up actual cash capital. Mutual F. Ins. Co. v. House, 89 Tenn. 438.

Under Conn. Gen. Stat. 1898, § 2914, authorizing the state treasurer to receive in trust securities which a Connecticut corporation might be required by another state to deposit as a prerequisite of transacting business in that state, such securities are held under a special trust, and cannot be lawfully demanded from the trustees by a Connecticut receiver of the company. Cooke v. Warner, 58 Conn. 234. See also Employers Liability Assur. Co. v. Commissioners of Insurance, infra.

Under New York Laws 1882, chap. 367, requiring a deposit by a foreign insurance company of "not polices in an artificial name, the "Guarantee and Accident Lloyds, New York." Insuring persons for certain amounts on payment of specified rates, "against loss of life, eye or eyes, limb or limbs at or above the wrist or ankle," by accidents other than those excepted in the policy, or in the conditions indorsed on it; each member contributed an equal amount to a common fund for the payment of losses and expenses, and each stipulates with the others that no policy shall be issued unless it is executed in behalf of all, but that his liability shall be several only, and limited to the amount contributed or authorized by him; the interest of each member in the concern is made transferable by him if he wishes to withdraw, or by his personal representative after his decease, and the assignee takes the place of a member, thus making the association capable of perpetuity like a corporation; and the defendants are carrying on the business of insurance in that mode in this state, without having obtained a certificate of authority from the superintendent of insurance. Held, that in so conducting their business the defendants unlawfully exercise a franchise, within the meaning of subdivision 1 of section 6700 of the Revised Statutes, and act as a corporation, within the meaning of subdivision 8 of that section, and under either, may be ousted from transacting the business of insurance within the state.

less than $200,000 in stocks," any excess over that amount if deposited is not subject to withdrawal. Lancashire Ins. Co. v. Maxwell, 131 N. Y. 236.

License taxes.

As in Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 367, so in many other cases the validity of a license tax in some form has been upheld against foreign corporations and their agents.

The license tax imposed on the agencies of a foreign insurance company may be higher than those imposed on domestic corporations. Lexington v. Milton, 12 B. Mon. 212.

A constitutional requirement of uniformity in taxation on subjects of the same class is not violated by imposing a greater license tax on foreign insurance companies than on domestic companies. State v. Fiedick, 21 La. Ann. 424; State v. Ogden, 10 La. Ann. 402; Germania L. Ins. Co. v. Com. 85 Pa. 513.

A foreign insurance company does not belong to the same class as domestic companies, within the meaning of a constitutional provision for uniformity of taxes on franchisees. Hughes v. Cairo, 92 Ill. 330; Slaughter v. Com. 13 Gratt. 767; Milwaukee Fire Department v. Helfenstein, 16 Wis. 137.

See similar point under heading as to retaliatory statutes.

A statute prohibiting a license fee or tax on insurance companies does not constitute a contract with a foreign insurance company, or give it an exemption which cannot be taken away by subsequent statute. Atna F. Ins. Co. v. Reading, 119 Pa. 417.

A state tax of three per cent on a foreign insurance company, under the Pennsylvania Act of 1873, was not repealed by the Act of April 24, 1874. Germania L. Ins. Co. v. Com. 85 Pa. 513.

A tax on the gross amount of premiums for insurance by nonresident corporations is not unconstitutional. Tatem v. Wright, 23 N. J. L. 420. 34 L. R. A.

Statement by Williams, J.:

The petition is filed against C. F. Ackerman and ninety-nine other persons, who are transacting the business of guarantee and accident insurance in this state, under the name of the "Guarantee and Accident Lloyds, New York," to oust them from the carrying on of that business, because they have not complied with the laws of the state, or received any authority from it to do a business of that kind.

The character of the organization, and its plan of business, are shown by the following "articles of agreement," executed by the members.

"The undersigned being desirous of entering into the business of individual guarantee and accident insurance:

"1st—Do each individually agree to deposit with an advisory committee to be appointed by the undersigned as hereinafter provided, the sum of one thousand dollars.

"2d—Such sum or sums so subscribed by each individual subscriber shall be held by the advisory committee for the individual account of each subscriber, together with all earnings thereon, as a fund to meet any loss which each such subscriber may sustain upon any policy of insurance subscribed by him beyond the net amount of premiums earned and received on said policy.

"3d—Such advisory committee shall consist of five of the subscribers to this agreement, or such further subscribers as may hereafter adopt and execute this agreement, and may be selected and appointed once in

A state may authorize municipal license taxes on foreign insurance companies. Leavenworth v. Booth, 15 Kan. 627.

And a city ordinance in a city of the second class in Missouri may compel the payment of a license tax by an agent of a foreign insurance company, although the foreign company is also compelled to pay a tax on its income. St. Joseph v. Ernst, 95 Mo. 390.

But a municipal corporation under the general statutes of Illinois has no power to impose a special license tax on a foreign insurance company. Chicago v. Phoenix Ins. Co. of Brooklyn, 26 Ill. App. 650.

Imposing upon the agent of a foreign insurance company a license tax of a percentage on the premiums received at his agency is not unconstitutional. People v. Thurber, 13 Ill. 554; Milwaukee Fire Department v. Helfenstein, 16 Wis. 137.

But an agent in Louisiana cannot be compelled to pay the license fee for the company. State v. Woods, 40 La. Ann. 177; State v. Williams, 46 La. Ann. —.

A foreign insurance corporation, under chapter 25 of the Tennessee Acts of the Extra Session of 1891, must pay a privilege tax of $10, and under the Act of March 26, 1891, must also file a copy of its charter with the secretary of state in addition to the filing of such a copy with the commissioner of insurance and register abstracts thereof in each county where it does business. State v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 92 Tenn. 420.

Charges for fire department or firemen's fund.

Requiring the agent of a foreign insurance company, as a condition of doing business, to pay a percentage of the premiums received by him for the benefit of the fire department at the place of his agency is constitutional. *Trustees of Ex-empt Firemen's Benev. An annual meeting shall be called by the advisory committee, by mailing or handing to each subscriber a notice for such meeting at least five days before the time fixed therefor. The advisory committee to act until the Wednesday succeeding the first Monday of January, 1891, shall be composed of "Such advisory committee and every member of such committee shall continue to act as such until a new member or a new committee shall be appointed.

"All questions shall be determined by a majority of such committee, and three members thereof shall constitute a quorum. Each member attending a meeting shall be paid $5 in gold for each attendance. Such committee shall meet at least once in each month; and oftener if they deem it necessary.

"4th—Such committee shall have the custody and management of the subscription fund above provided for, and the general charge and supervision of all the business to be done; shall supervise and direct the attorneys in fact who may be appointed by the subscribers, exact and receive accounts from such attorneys in fact, examine, audit, and pass upon the same, receive from said attorneys in fact and receipt for any earnings applicable to the several accounts of either of the undersigned, and make such use, disposition, and investment of the fund and earnings as they shall deem most advantageous and secure.

"5th—If any member of such committee shall cease to be an insurer under the terms of this agreement, he shall cease to be a member of such committee and the remaining members thereof shall select from among the other subscribers at the time being some person to fill the vacancy thus occasioned. Any vacancy in the committee shall be filled in the same manner.

"6th—The business management of the insurance to be effected for and on behalf of each of the individual subscribers hereto shall be in charge of Aaron H. Hathbone, Frederick W. Satterlee, Cleveland D. Fisher, and John G. Dorrance, as attorneys in fact of each subscriber hereto; such business shall be carried on at an office to be known as the office of the Guarantee and Accident Lloyds; each subscriber shall execute and deliver to them a power of attorney, in form and effect to be approved by the advisory committee, and by Messrs. Condit Brothers, counselors at law, giving to said attorneys the necessary power for the purpose indicated. The powers thus conferred on said attorneys shall be subject to and shall be exercised under the direction, supervision, and control of the advisory committee above referred to, and all policies or other instruments binding the subscribers must be signed by at least two of said attorneys. The compensation of said attorneys jointly shall be a commission of ten per cent on the amount of the premiums—

ment of New York v. Noble, 3 E. D. Smith, 440; Fire Department of New York v. Wright, Id. 458.

On the other hand, in Pennsylvania, such a charge for the benefit of an association for the relief of disabled firemen was held invalid on the ground that it was not for a public purpose. Philadelphia Assn. for Relief of Disabled Firemen v. Wood, 39 Pa. 73.

An act to require foreign insurance companies to pay certain premiums to counties and cities as a fireman's relief fund, and which was claimed to be a condition of permitting them to do business in a state discriminating against them in favor of domestic corporations, was held invalid in San Francisco v. Liverpool & Globe Ins. Co., 74 Cal. 113, on the ground that it violated the state Constitution, article 11, section 12, denying to the legislature power to impose taxes for county or municipal purposes. It was argued that the power of the state to impose conditions on foreign corporations was not limited by general provisions of the state constitution, and that they had no rights under such constitution except such as were expressly guaranteed to them eo nomine as foreign corporations, but this was denied by the court.

In Illinois, such a statute providing for the payment of a percentage of premiums received at an agency of a foreign insurance company for the benefit of a firemen's benevolent association, was involved in several cases, which enforce the statute without any question of its constitutionality. Firemen's Benev. Assn. v. Lounsbury, 21 Ill. 511, 74 Am. Dec. 115; Van Inwagen v. Chicago, 61 Ill. 81.

And the Illinois Act of February 13, 1863, section 5, requiring two per cent of the premiums of such company to be paid to the city treasurer was repealed by the Act of March 10, 1869, section 30, allowing a tax on the net receipts of the agency in lieu of a license, with the power of the city to impose a two per cent charge for the benefit of the fire department. Van Inwagen v. Chicago, supra.

But a municipal license tax on a foreign insurance company for the support of "its fire department" was held not to be authorized by a statute giving power to impose such a tax for the purpose of procuring apparatus for extinguishing fires and establishing reservoirs. Alton v. Aetna Ins. Co., 82 Ill. 45.

The provision of the Illinois Act of 1872, § 110, requiring the payment of two per cent of the net receipts of an agency of a foreign insurance company in a city to the treasurer, was repealed by the Act of 1879, chap. 73, § 30, making the net receipts of such agency taxable as other property, with a proviso authorizing a tax or license fee by a city not exceeding two per cent for the support of the fire department. Chicago v. James, 114 Ill. 479; Springfield v. London Ins. Co., 21 Ill. App. 156.

A city or town in Indiana cannot recover from a foreign insurance company for the use of its fire department a per cent of the premiums received from the risks taken upon property within the municipality, since the interior regulation of such companies belongs to the state under the Indiana statutes. Blackmer v. Royal Ins. Co., 115 Ind. 201.

Certificates.

A statute requiring a certificate of the right to do business before an agent of a foreign insurance company can lawfully act is constitutional. Farmers & Merchants Ins. Co. v. Harrah, 47 Ind. 235.

Under the Indiana Act of December 21, 1865, a foreign insurance company may file renewals of certificates at any time between January and July, and if filed before the expiration of such month the business done during the month is valid. American Ins. Co. v. Pettibohn, 62 Ind. 383.

received in each year; in consideration of which the said attorneys agree to defray all charges of office rent, salaries, stationery, advertising and all other expenses incident to the proper care and prosecution of the business, except agent's and broker's commissions, loss, legal expenses, taxes and the pay of inspectors employed under the direction of the advisory committee. Such attorneys shall be entitled as further compensation for their services, to twenty-five per cent of the net profits of each year's business as found and determined by the advisory committee. Such profits may be determined and paid over quarterly.

"7th—Such attorneys shall at all times, when so required, furnish to the advisory committee full statements of all insurance expenses and premiums, whether due or collected, and every member of the committee shall at all times have access to all the books and papers of the attorneys. The attorneys shall keep separate accounts for each of the subscribers to this agreement, and each subscriber shall at all times have access to his individual account.

"8th—The advisory committee shall cause to be made up on the 31st day of December in each year all the accounts of the several subscribers hereto. If there should be any balance to the credit of the several subscribers over and above the amount of each subscription, the advisory committee shall determine how much, if any thereof, it is advisable to pay to each subscriber; and no part thereof shall be paid to or withdrawn by any subscriber hereto, so long as he shall remain a party to this agreement, except upon the order or direction of the advisory committee. Each subscriber shall, however, be entitled to receive from such advisory committee at the end of each calendar year a certificate showing the amount to his credit at the end of such year. If account of any subscriber hereto shall show upon such annual statement that the amount to his credit is insufficient to cover the current liabilities against him, the advisory committee shall have the power and authority to call upon such subscriber for the payment of such an amount as will in the judgment of such committee be sufficient to meet the deficiency, and such amount when paid shall be credited to each individual subscriber in like manner with his original deposit and if not paid within three months from the date of such call such subscriber shall thereupon cease to be a party to this agreement except in regard to transactions already entered into on his behalf.

"9th—In case any of the subscribers hereto should desire to withdraw from this agreement, and shall give thirty days' notice in writing of such desire to the advisory committee, and in case any of such subscribers shall become insolvent or embarrassed in business or in case of any other reason, it should be deemed advisable in the opinion of a majority of the advisory committee that any subscriber should withdraw from this agreement, the attorneys aforesaid shall upon written notification by the advisory commit-

The determination of an insurance commissioner in issuing certificates to foreign corporations to do business in the state is not judicial and final, but merely ministerial. State v. Fidelity & Casualty Ins. Co., 30 Minn. 538.

The revocation of a license to a foreign insurance company by the state insurance commissioner is a mere ministerial duty which may be conferred upon him by the legislature, and is not an exercise of judicial power. Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Raymond, 70 Mich. 485.

But the failure of the auditor of state to furnish an agent a certified copy of papers filed with him, as required by statute, does not defeat the right of the foreign corporation to do business in the state. American Ins. Co. of Chicago v. Butler, 70 Ind. 1.

The failure to embrace a copy of the act of incorporation in the statement furnished by a foreign corporation to the auditor as item 14, in accordance with the statutory requirement literally construed, is not fatal, where such copy was actually furnished to him. American Ins. Co. of Chicago v. Pressell, 78 Ind. 443.

A premium note given to a foreign insurance company February 24, 1880, is not void on the ground that the company had no license or permission to do business in the state, where the company is required by law to send its statement for the preceding year within sixty days from the first of January in order to continue business, and an arrangement for a future examination of its affairs was made by the commissioner, who sent a license in April dated the first of January, but canceled the license subsequently because the company withdrew from the state before he fixed a date for making his examination. Looming F. Ins. Co. v. Langely, 62 Md. 198.

Other requirements.

officer a valuation made in its own state, thereby complying with Ohio Rev. Stat., § 279, need not pay the Ohio officer for making any valuation. State v. Reimund, 45 Ohio St. 214.

It may be made a condition of a license to a foreign insurance company that it agree not to make any contract directly or indirectly with other companies or agents, the object or effect of which is to prevent free or open competition. Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Raymond, 70 Mich. 485.

A state statute requiring agents of a foreign insurance company, when losses occur, to retain possession of moneys of the corporation coming into their hands until the losses are adjusted, or to abide the event of the suit, is not unconstitutional. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Burdett, 112 Ind. 204.

By Mass. Stat. of 1847, chap. 273, § 2, prohibiting insurance by mutual companies incorporated elsewhere, unless the provisions in chapter 37 "so far as they are applicable" have been complied with, and providing for filing a statement by such companies of the capital or reserve and the whole amount of risk, etc., the provisions of chapter 37, as to public statements in a newspaper, are applicable; and a contract of insurance cannot be made before this provision is complied with which will authorize an assessment by the company. Washington County Mut. Ins. Co. v. Dawes, 6 Gray, 376.

A foreign insurance company is not within the provisions of the Arkansas Act of April 4, 1889, requiring a stipulation for service to be filed with the secretary of state as the Act of March 28, 1887, specifically provides for filing such stipulation by foreign insurance companies with the auditor of state. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Commercial Union Ins. Co. 129 U. S. 223, 35 L. ed. 154.

Other "states."

The District of Columbia is a "state" within the meaning of a statute making it unlawful for as tee, cease to act as the attorneys for such subscriber, except in regard to transactions already entered into on his behalf, and such subscriber shall thereupon cease to be a party to this agreement, except in regard to such previous transactions. In case of the withdrawal of any subscribers for either of the reasons above stipulated, and in case of the death of any subscriber, his account shall not be closed until three months after the expiration of all risks in which he may have been concerned as such subscriber, and all sums to his credit, either in the hands of the advisory committee, or of the attorneys, shall be irrevocably pledged to the payment of any losses for which he may be or become liable, and of any amount which may be due or unpaid by him growing out of the insurance business herein contemplated; and neither such subscriber nor his assigns or legal representatives shall have the right to withdraw any part of such sum to his credit, until all such losses or other debts are fully satisfied and discharged. At the expiration of all such risks and upon payment and satisfaction of such other indebtedness, the balance remaining to the credit of such subscriber shall be paid over to him or his legal representatives or assigns.

"10th—In case, however, any subscriber who duly withdraws from this agreement, or the legal representatives of any deceased subscriber, should procure a new subscriber satisfactory to the advisory committee, then, upon such new subscriber assuming, in writing, all the liabilities and indebtedness of the former subscriber under this agreement, or arising from any business contemplated therein, and duly executing this agreement, the former subscriber, or his legal representatives, shall be released and discharged from all responsibility as a party hereto.

"11th—At the annual meeting of the subscribers already provided for, any and all questions arising under this agreement, or in reference to the business herein contemplated, may be called up and disposed of. Special meetings may be called by a majority of the advisory committee, or by any ten subscribers, in the manner provided for annual meetings. The subscriber may waive a five days' notice, and accept in writing a shorter notice. Matters brought before any meeting shall be determined by the vote of a majority of those represented at such meeting, either in person or by proxy. At any meeting, annual or special, a quorum shall consist of the representatives of a majority of the subscribers. No change, however, can be made in the terms of this agreement except by the vote of three fourths of all the subscribers hereto at a meeting specially called for the purpose by notice stating the exact terms of the change proposed.

"12th—All claims for losses shall be disposed of by the attorneys under the supervision of the advisory committee, and shall be paid out of the funds in their hands, and when these are insufficient, then out of the funds in the hands of the advisory committee. Any suit brought upon any claim arising out of the business contemplated by this insurance company incorporated by any other state to do business in Indiana without compliance with certain conditions. State v. Briggs, 116 Ind. 55.

This overrules in effect the decision or dictum in Daily v. National L. Ins. Co. of United States, 64 Ind. 1, to the effect that while an insurance company created by congress is a foreign corporation within the meaning of the Indiana Act of June 17, 1852, restricting business by such companies without complying with statutory conditions, yet such company is not an insurance corporation of "any other state" or "any government foreign to the United States," within the provisions of the Act of December 21, 1865.

The Michigan act requiring a deposit by an insurance company of at least $100,000 with the chief financial officer or insurance commissioner of the state where the company is organized in trust for the benefit of policy holders is not satisfied in case of a British company by a deposit in New York state. The word "state" in such statute means a state of the Union, and the word "organized" means incorporated and not merely licensed to do business. Employers' Liability Assur. Co. v. Commissioners of Insurance, 64 Mich. 614.

What companies within the statutes?

Under the Illinois statutes which prohibit foreign insurance companies from doing business without complying with the provisions of the statutes or obtaining a license, and which provide for only two kinds of fire insurance, namely, joint-stock and mutual companies, a foreign company which is not mutual and which has not complied with the provisions respecting the capital of joint-stock companies cannot be granted a license. New York Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Swigert, 120 Ill. 36.

A mutual company is within the provisions of 24 L. R. A.

the Indiana statute against business by foreign insurance companies. Lamb v. Lamb, 18 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 17.

A foreign insurance company insuring lives on the plan of assessment on surviving members, but not limiting the benefits to families and heirs of the members, must comply with Ohio Rev. Stat., § 2604, and is not exempt under section 3630, as a company for the relief of members, their families and heirs. State v. Moore, 38 Ohio St. 7.

Mass. Rev. Stat., chap. 37, § 42, prohibiting insurance by foreign corporations, except under certain conditions as to capital, is, by chapter 273, section 8, made inapplicable to foreign companies doing business on the mutual principle. Williams v. Cheney, 8 Gray, 215.

A mutual company issuing certificates to members who pay an admission fee, and also assessments on the death of members, is an insurance company within the meaning of the Massachusetts Statute of 1867, chap. 267, § 5, prohibiting, under a penalty, acts of agency for unauthorized foreign insurance companies. Com. v. Wetherbee, 105 Mass. 149.

A corporation of Illinois called the "Fraternal Alliance" which consists of a secret order, under the supervision of a grand or supreme lodge, securing members through the lodge system exclusively, is excepted by Mich. Act 1887, § 25, from the control of the insurance commissioner. Rensselaire v. Seeley, 72 Mich. 608.

The Knights Templars' & Masons' Life Indemnity Co., incorporated under the laws of Illinois to furnish benefits to widows, relatives, legatees, etc., of deceased members on policies issued in amounts ranging up to $5,000 and paid by assessments on members, is a life insurance company subject to the Missouri laws, and not a "co-operative benevolent insurance society" nor a "fraternal brotherhood" having a community interest, but is an in-agreement, and any questions arising as to any legal liability upon any such claims, shall be referred to Messrs. Coudert Brothers, as counsel, under the supervision of the advisory committee, and such committee, with the advice and concurrence of said counsel, shall have power to settle, compromise, or contest any such suit or claim as to them shall seem expedient, and are authorized, upon the advice and concurrence of said counsel, to stipulate for and on behalf of each several subscriber hereto, that such subscriber will abide by the event of any such suit, whether at the time of such stipulation such subscriber be or not a party to this agreement.

"13th—In the policies issued under the present arrangement, neither of the subscribers shall be made jointly liable with the others, nor with either of the others, but each subscriber shall only be made severally and separately liable to the amount authorized by him individually in the power of attorney, given by him to the attorneys above mentioned. Nor shall any joint liability be created on behalf of the subscribers hereto, in any matter arising out of the business to be carried on under this agreement, but only a several liability on behalf of each individual subscriber. No policy, however, shall be issued on behalf of any individual subscriber hereto, unless each of the individual subscribers insures for a like amount on said policy.

"14th—All receipts or earnings of the business contemplated by this agreement shall be kept by the attorneys in fact in a separate bank account, in their name as such attorneys, and not in any way mingled with their own funds. They shall render accounts to the advisory committee at least once in each month, or oftener if required, and shall make returns and payments of balances to such advisory committee at least once in every three months, and oftener if required by the said committee.

"15th—All funds in the hands of the advisory committee shall be kept separately, and a separate bank account shall be kept by the committee for all uninvested funds, which bank account shall be in the names of such committee.

"Each of the undersigned, in consideration of the premises and of the execution of this agreement by the others, does hereby severally agree for himself, individually, to and with the others, and with each of them, that he and his representatives and assigns, will faithfully abide by and carry out his obligations and covenants hereunder.

"In testimony whereof, each of the subscribers has hereto set his hand and seal, on the day and year set opposite his name.

"Each member of the association also executed a power of attorney in the form following, viz.:

insurance company on the co-operative assessment plan. Berry v. Knights Templars' & Masons' Life Indemnity Co. 46 Fed. Rep. 439.

The Pennsylvania Act of 1849 allowing any mutual fire insurance company of an adjoining state to become insurer, with certain exceptions, subject to the laws of the commonwealth, was held in Huntley v. Merrill, 32 Barb. 628, by the supreme court of New York, to repeal, so far as it affected mutual companies, the Act of 1810, prohibiting insurance by foreign companies.

The character and the nature of the business of domestic companies has been considered in cases not here collected but which by way of comparison and analogy have some bearing on the question what companies of other states are excluded?

As to the nature of "assessment" insurance, see State v. Root (Wis.) 19 L. R. A. 271.

As to benefit certificates as policies of insurance, see Brace v. Chartrand (Colo.) 12 L. R. A. 209, and note.

As to business by unincorporated associations, partnerships, or individuals, see State v. Stone (Mo.) 25 L. R. A. 248, and Noble v. Mitchell (Ala.) 25 L. R. A. 238, and note.

Violation of statute.

A foreign insurance company is not liable to the penalties prescribed by Wagner's Mo. Stat., p. 777, art. 3, § 43, for doing business without the requisite certificate, as these penalties are imposed on the resident agents of the company. State v. New York L. Ins. Co. 51 Mo. 89; State v. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. 9 Mo. App. 384.

A person pretending to act only as agent of the applicants may be found to be in fact an agent of a foreign insurance company to which he sends the applications contrary to a statute prohibiting acts as agent for foreign insurance companies who have 24 L. R. A.

not complied with the statute. People v. Imlay, 20 Barb. 68.

A state may make it a misdemeanor to act as agent of a foreign insurance company which has not complied with the laws of the state so as to be entitled to do business therein. Moses v. State, 65 Miss. 60.

Insuring one's own property in an unauthorized foreign company is not criminal under the Pennsylvania Act of 1887, subjecting to a penalty any person "paying, or receiving, or forwarding any premiums, applications for insurance, or in any manner securing, helping, or aiding in the placing of any insurance, or effecting any contracts of insurance" in such companies. Com. v. Biddle, 11 L. R. A. 561, 139 Pa. 609.

As to what constitutes "doing business" within the state, see note to Cone Export & Com. Co. v. Poole (S. C.) ante, 289.

Retaliatory statutes.

A statute imposing on an insurance corporation of another state the same burdens by taxes, fines, fees, and otherwise (if greater than those charged in that state upon domestic corporations), which are imposed by the state in which the foreign corporation was created on similar corporations of the former state, is not unconstitutional as a denial to the foreign corporation of the equal protection of the laws. Fire Assn. of Philadelphia v. New York, 119 U. S. 110, 30 L. ed. 942.

Nor is such a statute unconstitutional as an unlawful delegation of legislative power. People v. Fire Assn. of Philadelphia, 93 N. Y. 811, 44 Am. Rep. 390; Phoenix Ins. Co. of New York v. Welch, 29 Kan. 672; contra, Clark v. Port of Mobile, 67 Ala. 217.

And it is not void for uncertainty. State v. Insurance Co. of North America, 115 Ind. 257.

Such burdens are regarded generally as in the against all lawful risks, injuries, losses, and liabilities, excepting marine losses, losses by fire and death from natural causes, upon such conditions as they may deem to my interest; for such purpose to make and issue all binding contracts and policies of insurances; to subscribe such policies in my name, with the amount insured by me thereon, which shall in no case exceed the sum of five hundred (500) dollars on any one risk, unless such excess shall have been provided for by re-insurance; to change or modify the terms of any policy so issued; to annul or cancel the same; in their discretion to re-insure any and all such risks so taken and insured in such manner as shall be deemed by them most advantageous to my interests; provided always, that no such insurance or policy or re-insurance shall be made in my name or for my account unless a like insurance policy or re-insurance on the same risk be made at the same time and on the same terms, for and in the name of each and every other person for whom they shall at the time be acting as attorneys under power similar to this, severally and not jointly, for an equal amount, as provided in the articles of agreement entered into by me with various other persons on the _____ day of _____, 189-, of which agreement copy has been furnished to said attorneys.

"This power is given, and the exercise of all faculties thereunder is subject to the control and direction of the advisory committee acting under the provisions of the articles of agreement hereinabove referred to, and the said attorneys are instructed and directed to turn over to such advisory committee all premiums, notes, moneys, or things of value belonging to me which shall come into their possession in the premises at least once in every three months, and as much oftener as they may be thereto required by said advisory committee.

"To demand, collect, sue for, receive and receipt for all premiums which may at any time become due to me.

"Also to receive notices and proofs of loss and interest, and all other notices and proofs under any policy issued by virtue hereof, and in all respects to manage and do in and about such insurance and all notices or claims thereunder, as they shall deem best for my interests.

"Also to adjust and pay out of any moneys in their hands belonging to me any loss, claim, or demand that may arise from or under any policy issued in my name under this power. And in case of suit being brought against me on any such loss, claim, or demand, to appear for me and in my name to defend or compromise such suit. Also, with the advice and concurrence of the advisory committee, to stipulate in my name that I will abide by the event of any suit which may be brought against any other party to the articles of agreement already mentioned, upon any policy which shall have been likewise subscribed in my name by virtue hereof.

"Also to do and perform for me and in my name every other act and thing, in relation nature of a license and not as taxes, and therefore not within the constitutional provision of uniformity of taxation. Goldsmith v. Home Ins. Co. 62 Ga. 379; State v. Ins. Co. of North America, supra; Blackmer v. Home Ins. Co. 115 Ind. 596; Blackmer v. Royal Ins. Co. Id. 291; contra, Clark v. Port of Mobile, supra.

Or, if it is a tax, that the requirement of uniformity does not prevent classification, and that foreign insurance companies are not necessarily in the same class so as to prevent a difference in burdens according to the laws of their own states. Home Ins. Co. v. Swigert, 104 Ill. 663.

A retaliatory statute was also enforced in New Hampshire in respect to a Massachusetts company doing business in that state, but its constitutionality was not discussed. Haverhill Ins. Co. v. Prescott, 42 N. H. 547, 80 Am. Dec. 123.

The fact that a foreign corporation comes into the state on payment of a certain annual license tax does not prevent it from being charged a greater license in subsequent years by virtue of the provision as to equal protection of the laws when such greater tax is imposed by its own state on similar corporations of other states. Fire Asso. of Philadelphia v. New York, 119 U. S. 110, 80 L. ed. 342.

A retaliatory statute imposing on insurance companies of another state or nation the same obligations and prohibitions that are imposed in such other state or nation upon corporations of the former state must be confined to cases fairly within its letter. State v. Fidelity & Casualty Ins. Co. 16 L. R. A. 611, 49 Ohio St. 440.

In construing the retaliatory statute of Minnesota respecting foreign insurance companies, it was held that, as against a New York corporation which had complied with the state statutes, a judgment of ouster would be refused, where it was doubtful whether the New York statutes would be given effect to exclude a Minnesota corporation in such a case. State v. Fidelity & Casualty Ins. Co. 39 Minn. 533.

The retaliatory law is held to apply only when it is shown that the statute of a state which created a foreign corporation imposes greater burdens on Ohio corporations than the Ohio statute does. State v. Reinmund, 45 Ohio St. 214.

To make a case for the retaliatory provision of Ohio Rev. Stat., § 232, as to insurance companies of a state which imposes prohibitions upon Ohio companies "doing business in such state," it must appear at least that an Ohio company has been formed to do substantially the same kinds and lines of insurance as the foreign company wishes to do in Ohio. State v. Fidelity & Casualty Ins. Co. supra.

The question whether or not an Illinois company is actually engaged in business in another state in which there are restrictions on the business of foreign companies is immaterial in determining the application and operation of an Illinois statute requiring a foreign insurance company doing business in Illinois to make a deposit or payment of taxes and license fees, etc., at least equal to that which would be required by the laws of the state of its incorporation of Illinois insurance companies "having agencies in such other state." Germania Ins. Co. v. Swigert, 4 L. R. A. 473, 128 Ill. 287.

Whether or not the state of New York had ever enforced against an Iowa corporation its law prohibiting an insurance company to do more than one kind of business is immaterial in respect to the right to prevent a New York corporation in Iowa from transacting more than one kind of insurance business under the Iowa retaliatory statute, imposing on insurance companies of other states the same prohibitions that are or would be imposed on Iowa companies in such other states under their to any policy made by virtue hereof, as fully as I could personally do.

"Provided always, that my said attorneys shall in no case make any policy of insurance by virtue of these presents, by which I shall be made to insure jointly with any other person or which shall in any way make me liable for the acts of any other person or insurer, or which shall bind or affect me otherwise than by a several and individual liability to the amounts insured or subscribed by me individually or in my name.

A Maryland statute imposing on insurance companies of other states the same obligations and prohibitions imposed in such other states upon Maryland companies will authorize the refusal of a license in Maryland to a company from another state on the ground of discretion of the insurance commissioner, although there is no express authorization or refusal on such ground, where a Maryland company has been refused a license on that ground in the other state. Talbot v. Fidelity & Casualty Co. 13 L. R. A. 584, 74 Md. 538.

A prohibition by a statute of another state, applicable to foreign as well as domestic insurance companies, against issuing policies to persons more than sixty years old, will not, by virtue of the New York Act of 1883, chapter 175, imposing on the corporations of another state the same obligations that are imposed on New York corporations by the laws of such other state, make a policy issued in New York by a company of the other state invalid because issued to a person more than sixty years old, since the retaliatory enactment of New York imposes obligations and not prohibitions upon such foreign corporations. Griess v. Massachusetts Ben. Asso. 39 N. Y. S. R. L.

A New York corporation not being permitted in Ohio to do business on the assessment plan, except when benefits are limited to members, their families and heirs, the New York commissioner would have the right to exclude Ohio companies, and therefore a New York company must be excluded from Ohio, under the Act of April 18, 1883, § 8630e, excluding corporations of a state in which Ohio corporations are not permitted to do business on substantially the same basis and limitations as in Ohio. State v. Moore, 30 Ohio St. 493.

only when they specify a fixed amount and do not permit endowment policies by assessment companies, while such companies in Ohio are allowed to issue endowment policies at a fixed sum, if they have complied with the statutes relating to mutual life companies, the Ohio companies are not allowed to do business in Michigan on substantially the same basis and limitations as in Ohio, and therefore under the proviso of Ohio Rev. Stat., section 3830e, Michigan assessment insurance corporations are not entitled to a license to do business in Ohio. State v. Western Union Mut. L. & Acc. Soc. 8 L. R. A. 129, 47 Ohio St. 167.

The New Hampshire retaliatory statute requires the court to hold that a Massachusetts company cannot recover on a premium note in New Hampshire until it has complied with the statutory conditions where Massachusetts statutes restricting foreign companies are construed in that state to defeat the recovery by a foreign company in a similar case. Haverhill Ins. Co. v. Prescott, 42 N. H. 547, 80 Am. Dec. 123.

For unconstitutional provisions as to waiver of the right to invoke the jurisdiction of federal courts as a condition of a license to a foreign corporation to do business, in respect to which insurance companies stand on the same footing as other corporations, see the note to *Cone Export & Commission Co. v. 15. The loss of one or both eyes, feet or hands, or failure duly to pay any premium, will immediately terminate this insurance.

16. Each of the subscribers hereto shall be and is individually liable for one-hundredth part of the amount insured hereunder.

17. Affirmative proofs of loss and proof of insurable interest under subdivisions, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 10 and 11 shall be furnished to the attorneys of the subscribers within four months of the happening of the accident causing the same, and under subdivisions 6 and 12 within one month after termination of total disability, and no proceeding in law or equity shall be brought to recover payment under this policy unless such suit or proceeding shall be commenced within six months of the filing of such affirmative proofs and against only one of the underwriters at one time. A final decision in any suit so brought shall be decisive of such claim against each of the underwriters, and each underwriter hereto waives any limitation as to costs, and agrees to abide, by the event of any such suit, and authorizes the attorneys to pay the assured out of any funds in their hands the amount due under this policy. Each of the underwriters hereby authorizes the attorneys to receive and admit service of process for him in any suit brought as aforesaid.

18. In the assured shall be fatally or nonfatally injured, while temporarily or otherwise exposed to a hazard pertaining to an occupation or employment classed by the subscribers as more hazardous than that here given, the liability hereunder shall be only for such amount as is provided for the class in which such more hazardous occupation or exposure is rated, in the manual of the Guarantee and Accident Lloyds.

19. All losses under this policy are payable at the Home Office in New York, ninety days after receipt of proofs of loss satisfactory to the attorneys of the subscribers.

Each of the present subscribers as a separate underwriter binds himself severally and not jointly with any other for the true performance of the premises for the amount expressed to be insured by him.

CONDITIONS.

Not Writable by Agents.

"The conditions under which this policy is issued and accepted by the assured are as follows:

"This insurance shall not be held to extend to or cover disappearances, nor to any injuries received while engaged temporarily or otherwise in any act or thing pertaining to blasting, wrecking or to the manufacture, transportation or handling of gunpowder, or any explosive substance or article in any way, shape or manner, except the use of firearms by sportsmen, nor while riding on a railroad train in any place or places except those provided for the transportation of passengers, or while walking or being upon any bridge or road bed of any railway.

"The assured suffering a loss for which a special sum is stated herein, shall not be entitled to any other indemnity, for the same injury, and the total amount of indemnity hereunder in any one year (twelve months) shall not exceed the sum named herein as death indemnity.

"In the event of an accident or injury for which or from which, directly or indirectly, any claim may be made under this policy, notice shall be given in writing signed by the assured, his attending physician, or beneficiary, mailed within ten days of the happening of such accident, and addressed to the Manager of the Accident Department of The Guarantee and Accident Lloyds at New York, stating the full particulars as to when and where and how it occurred, and the occupation of the assured at the time, his policy number and his address.

"A representative of the subscribers shall be allowed to examine the person or body of the assured in reference to any injury or cause of death, when and as often as may be reasonably required in their behalf.

"The subscribers or their attorneys shall have a right to terminate this policy and insurance, by mailing to the assured at his address as furnished, a notice of such termination, and a check or draft on New York for all unearned premiums standing on the books of the Lloyds to his credit.

"This insurance shall not be held to extend to or cover injuries received, whether fatal or nonfatal, that are caused wholly or in part, directly or indirectly, by or in consequence of disease; fighting, scuffling, lifting or over-exertion, unnecessary exposure to danger (voluntary or otherwise); war, riot, or in consequence of violating the law, by inhalation or otherwise (voluntary or involuntary) of any form of gas or gases; injuries intentionally inflicted; injuries received while under the influence of intoxicating drinks, or narcotics or in consequence thereof; sunstroke, freezing, suicide (felonious or otherwise, sane, or insane); contact with any poisonous substance.

"In the event that a claim shall be made under this policy for loss of one hand or one foot, and the assured shall have more than one other policy of accident insurance covering such loss, the liability hereunder shall be only for such proportionate part of the amount of such loss of hand or foot named herein as one policy bears to the total number of policies held by the assured.

"By the acceptance of this policy the assured absolutely agrees and consents that in any action, proceeding or investigation in which this Lloyds is interested, any physician who has been or may be at any time consulted by him professionally, may testify under oath, before any court, tribunal or officer, concerning any ailment, disease, injury or affliction, bodily or mental, constitutional or otherwise, that he is or has been or may be suffering from.

"Should the assured engage in an occupation more hazardous than that named herein, it shall operate immediately to reduce the indemnity named herein to that provided for such more hazardous occupation according to the manual of the Guarantee and Accident Lloyds then in use, with the same effect as if the policy had been canceled and a new one issued accordingly, the premiums however remaining the same.

"DIVIDEND BOND NOTICE.

"This policy participates in the benefits of the dividend bond class, when the premiums are paid annually in advance.

"W. D. CHASE,

"Guarantee and Accident Lloyds."

In addition to the foregoing facts, the petition alleges that:

"Prior to the third day of May, 1891, the defendants, acting in pursuance of the articles of agreement and power of attorney aforesaid, and under the name of the 'Guarantee and Accident Lloyds,' carried on the business of guarantee and accident insurance in states of the United States other than Ohio; and on said third day of May, 1891, they made application to the Hon. W. H. Kinder, superintendent of insurance of the state of Ohio, for a license or certificate of authority to carry on in said state, the business of guarantee and accident insurance, in accordance with the articles of agreement above set forth. The license and authority to do such insurance business was refused by the said superintendent of insurance; whereupon the defendants in this suit, acting as relators, instituted proceedings in mandamus in this court, asking the court to compel the superintendent of insurance of the state of Ohio to issue such license and authority.

"Upon the final hearing of said action in mandamus, this court denied the application and refused the writ of mandamus prayed for, and rendered judgment against the relators for costs; but notwithstanding the refusal of the superintendent of insurance to issue to the defendants a license or certificate of authority as requested, and notwithstanding the decision of this court sustaining the superintendent in so refusing, the defendants, acting under and in pursuance of the articles of agreement and powers of attorney aforesaid, and while so associated, have been and are transacting the business of guarantee and accident insurance in the state of Ohio, without having complied with the requirements of the laws of the state of Ohio regulating insurance, and without having been licensed or authorized to do such business by the superintendent of insurance of Ohio. A sample copy of the policies which are being issued by the defendants, while thus associated as the Guarantee and Accident Lloyds, is attached to and made part hereof, marked 'Exhibit A.'

"The defendants are citizens of the state of New York, and the articles of agreement and powers of attorney aforesaid, were entered into in that state; and said agreements constituted and constitute the defendants an association, under the name of the Guarantee and Accident Lloyds, with a principal office and place of business in the city of New York, under which style and name, and from which point the said association has been and is operating in the transaction of the business of guarantee and accident insurance.

"In thus transacting the business of insurance in the state of Ohio, without having complied with the laws of Ohio regulating insurance and without license or authority from the superintendent of insurance of Ohio to do so, the defendants have been and are usurping and unlawfully exercising a franchise of public concern, which has been reserved by the state for its control.

"Plaintiff prays for the advice of the court in the premises and that the defendants be compelled to answer to the state of Ohio by what warrant they claim to have, use, and enjoy the liberties, privileges and franchises aforesaid, and that they be ousted from using and exercising the same."

The defendants have interposed a general demurrer, and upon that the parties have submitted the case for final determination.

Messrs. Hiram D. Peck and Franklin T. Cahill, for defendants, in support of demurrer to information:

A franchise is a special privilege conferred by government upon individuals, and which does not belong to the citizens of the country of common right.

Quo warranto has always been the proper remedy where an individual usurps a franchise.

The right to be a corporation is a franchise, and all the powers the corporation is vested with are but part of its franchise, and were it to enter into insurance contracts without having the right so to do, it would be usurping a privilege not granted to it, and would be subject to an action in quo warranto. But this does not apply to an individual.

That the business of insurance is one of public interest and concern, is apparent from the amount and character of the legislation on the subject, not only in this state, but in all the states, and in all countries.

Special laws have been passed for their organization, and no insurance company can be organized in this state under the general provisions of section 8235.

State v. Pioneer Live Stock Co. 38 Ohio St. 347.

Foreign companies, whether incorporated or unincorporated, are required to make application to the superintendent of insurance, submit to him a statement of the condition of the company, satisfy him that it is sound and complies with the laws of Ohio both in the securities it furnishes and the mode of business it does, and procure from him a certificate of authority.

Foreign companies also pay a special tax in the nature of a franchise tax on the amount of business done in this state. Section 2745 as construed in State v. Reinmund, 45 Ohio St. 214.

The Michigan statutes are similar to ours.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action of quo warranto may be maintained under our statute (1) against a person who unlawfully exercises a franchise, and (2) against an association of persons who act as a corporation within the state without being legally incorporated; and the present action is prosecuted on both of these grounds. The position taken in support of the demurrer is, that the defendants, in transacting the business of insurance in the manner alleged in the petition, do not exercise a franchise, or act as a corporation, but are pursuing as individuals, an occupation, in which any person may of natural and common right engage; which right, it is contended, cannot be abridged or controlled by legislation, and hence, the defendants are not subject to the conditions and regulations imposed by the laws of the state on companies and associations doing an insurance business.

Insurance in its early existence, when the nature of the risks assumed were few, and the amount of business small, was done chiefly, if not entirely, by individuals. But in more recent times it has been extended until it embraces almost every kind of risk, and has grown to such proportions that it enters into every department of business, and affects all classes of people, and their property; and has, in consequence, everywhere, become the subject of legislative regulation and control. The several states have enacted laws designed to place the business, within their limits, on such substantial basis as will afford adequate protection to the citizens and their property. There can be no doubt of the power of the state to do so; nor, that the power extends to the enactment of such laws as its legislative body may deem wise and proper for the purpose, not in conflict with the fundamental law; and, therefore, within the legitimate exercise of that power, foreign companies may be excluded altogether from doing business in the state, or admitted on their compliance with such terms and conditions as its legislature chooses to impose. There has been enacted in this state an extensive code or system of laws, covering the whole subject of insurance; regulating the incorporation and organization of companies and associations for the transaction of the various kinds of insurance, and prescribing their powers and duties, defining the scope and effect of their policies, and otherwise regulating their business. They are required, as a means of protection of those who deal with them, to deposit adequate securities and invest their capital and earnings in designated modes, in the state, make periodical reports of their financial condition and business affairs, submit to visitations, and examinations of their affairs, by a public officer charged with the duty of enforcing the insurance laws, and comply with other specified requirements; a compliance with all of which by companies and associations organized in the state is essential to their right to carry on the business. Foreign companies, before doing business in the state, are required to conform to the same regulations, and others peculiarly applicable to them, among which latter are those which prohibit any "insurance company, association, or partnership, incorporated, organized, or associated under the laws of any other of the United States, or of any foreign government," from doing an insurance business "in this state, until it procures from the superintendent a certificate of authority to do so," and forbid any person or corporation to "act as agent in this state for any such company, association, or partnership, directly or indirectly, either in procuring applications for insurance, taking risks, or in any manner transacting the business of insurance, until it procures from the superintendent a license to do so, stating that the company, association, or partnership has complied with all the requirements of," the insurance laws, "applicable to such company, and depositing a certified copy of such license in the office of the recorder of the county in which the office or place of business of such agent or agents is established." Rev. Stat. § 3656.

The chapter of the Revised Statutes which established the department of insurance, and places it under the management of the superintendent, provides, among other things, that officer shall be appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the senate. He holds his office for a fixed period, and is paid a stated salary; he is provided with an office in the state house, and is specifically charged with the duty of seeing to the execution and enforcement of all laws relating to insurance; he is authorized to investigate the business and affairs of all insurance companies, whether foreign or domestic, and employ skilled and competent persons to assist him; it is made his duty when he has reason to suspect that the affairs of any company are in an unsound condition, to cause them to be investigated, and its officers and agents are required to submit themselves to examination under oath, and their books and business to his inspection, and in every other way facilitate the investigation; and when satisfied the company is in an unsound condition, his duty is to revoke its authority to do business, and from his decision there is no appeal. State v. Moore, 42 Ohio St. 103. He must keep a record, and preserve in permanent form his proceedings, including a concise statement of the condition of each company, and make reports to the legislature of the conduct and condition of each company doing business within the state, with such suggestions as he may deem expedient. In short, his department is a branch of the state government, and his functions are derived from the state, and exercised in the public interest. Every insurance company, before commencing business, is required to pay into the department certain fees and charges for filing its charter, and others for filing its preliminary statement for admission, and for its certificate of authority to do business, and for licenses to its agents; and after the company commences business, it "shall publish, at least once a year, in some newspaper of general circulation, in every county where such company has an agent, a certificate from the superintendent of insurance that such company has, in all respects, complied with the laws of the state relating to insurance." It is made unlawful for any person, company, or corporation not licensed by the superintendent of insurance, to receive or forward applications for insurance in any foreign company, or in any manner aid in the transaction of its business; and severe penalties are attached to the violation of any of the provisions of the chapter which provides for the appointment of the superintendent, including those already pointed out, all of which are made applicable expressly "to individuals and parties, and to all companies and associations, whether incorporated or not, now or hereafter engaged in the business of insurance;" and it is further made unlawful for any "company, corporation, or association, whether organized in this state or elsewhere, either directly or indirectly, to engage in the business of insurance, or to enter into any contracts substantially amounting to insurance, or in any manner to aid therein. In this state, without first having complied with all the provisions of this chapter." Rev. Stat. § 289.

These are some of the many statutory provisions, showing the extent to which the state has taken control of the business of insurance. They are reasonable and just, and were adopted for the laudable purpose of protecting the public against imposition by unreliable and untrustworthy companies and associations. Compliance with them is made the condition upon which foreign companies and associations are allowed to transact the business of insurance within the state. There is not such compliance until the company or association has obtained from the superintendent of insurance the necessary certificate of authority, and licenses to its agents. Companies and associations that have not received such certificate are denied the privilege of doing business here. The certificate of authority so granted by the superintendent, so long as it remains in force, confers on the company or association receiving it the right and privilege of carrying on its business of insurance in the state. The authority emanates from the state, and the privilege granted is a franchise.

The author of a recent and well prepared work, treating of this subject says: "Where by statute the legal exercise of a right, which at common law was private, is made to depend upon compliance with conditions imposed for the security and protection of the public, the necessary inference is that it is no longer private, but has become a matter of public concern, that is, a franchise, the assumption and exercise of which without complying with the conditions prescribed would be a usurpation of a public or sovereign function. In this case the legislature has done no more than was done by the court in the other instance, when it, from considerations of a public nature declared, as a principle of the common law, that facts brought to its notice, or of which it then took judicial notice, warranted the application of principles existing independently of the legislative declaration to the effect that the right claimed was matter of public and not exclusively of private concern." Spelling, Extraordinary Relief, § 1807. The same author further says: "There was no class of business, the transaction of which, as a matter of private right, was better recognized at common law than that of making contracts of insurance upon the lives of individuals. But now by statute in almost, if not quite all the states, stringent requirements as to security of the persons dealing with insurers and the making and filing reports with public officers for public information, are provided, and must be strictly observed and complied with before any person, association or corporation, may make any contract of life insurance. The effect of such statute is to make that a franchise which previously had been a matter purely of private right." Id. § 1808.

It is claimed, however, that the laws of Ohio do not apply to the defendants, because they are not an organized corporation, company, or association, or acting as such, but that in making contracts of insurance each individual acts for himself. A careful consideration of their plan of business, as shown by the articles of agreement and powers of attorney executed by the defendants, has brought us to a different conclusion. They have associated themselves together in a business undertaking, under a company name, in which, viz.: "Guarantee and Accident Lloyds, New York," all of their policies are issued. Each subscriber to the articles have contributed an equal amount to the capital stock of the concern, which is placed in the control of a board of managers, called an advisory committee, to meet losses arising on the policies. This board of managers is chosen by the subscribers, like the directors of a corporation, and invested with powers quite as plenary. All the subscribers have executed powers of attorney to the same individuals, investing them with the business management of the insurance, under the supervision of the advisory board. The powers conferred on the attorneys in fact are analogous to those of the executive officers of a corporation. They execute the policies, keep accounts of the business and expenses, which are open to the inspection of the advisory board, adjust all losses, and prosecute and defend all suits growing out of the business. Each member stipulates with the others that no policy shall be issued unless it is executed in behalf of all, and yet, that his liability shall be several only, and limited to the amount contributed to the fund, or authorized by him; so that, if some of the members become insolvent, and their contribution is exhausted in losses, or otherwise, the policy shall be enforceable against the others, only for an aliquot part, equal to the proportion of the solvent to the insolvent members. The liability of a stockholder of a corporation is not more restricted. Then the interest of each member in the concern is made transferable; a member who wishes to withdraw is authorized to procure another to take his place, and the representative of a deceased member may transfer the latter's share in like manner, and in that way, the organization may be made as enduring as it is possible for any corporation to be. The association has the appearance, and some of the characteristics of a corporation formed for the purpose of doing a general insurance business in its line, and its form of policies, and mode of conducting its business are calculated to impress one who does not make a critical examination, with the belief that it is a corporation, conforming to the usages of such companies. The character of the organization under which the defendants are operating, and their method of business, bring them, we think, within the purview of that clause of section 6760, of the Revised Statutes, which authorizes an action in quo warranto to be brought "against an association of persons who act as a corporation within this state without being legally incorporated." To be within the operation of that provision it is not necessary the association, or persons composing it, should avow a purpose to act as a corporation, or assume to do so; it is sufficient that the acts are such as appertain to corporations, or are done after the manner of corporations.

Under a statutory provision identical with that of section 6760, quoted above, it was held by the supreme court of Illinois, that "an association, or number of persons, who, in conducting the business of insurance profess to limit their liability to the amount of money contributed by each, and assume to give perpetuity to the business by making membership certificates transferable by the assignment of the member or his personal representatives, are 'acting as a corporation,' so as to authorize a judgment of ouster in quo warranto under Illinois Revised Statutes 1874, chapter 112, where they are not legally incorporated." Greene v. People (Ill.) 21 N. E. Rep. 605.

The case is much in point; and we fully concur in the doctrine announced by Scholfield, J., in the opinion, where it is said: "The question here is whether, under the facts presented by this record, 'any association or number of persons are acting within this state, as a corporation, without being legally incorporated.' If they are, the judgment below is authorized by our statute, entitled 'Quo Warranto' (Rev. Stat. 1874, chap. 112, p. 787), and must be affirmed; otherwise it must be reversed. We think it clear that, in two respects at least, these respondents are acting as a corporation, and it is not pretended that they are actually incorporated, namely: First, in professedly limiting their liability to the amount of money contributed by each; second, in assuming to give perpetuity to the business by making membership certificates transferable by the assignment of the member or his personal representative. It may be, as contended by counsel, that individuals may insure property against loss by fire. They cannot limit their liability to any given amount of capital they choose to set apart for that purpose, nor can they perpetuate the business without change of capital, beyond their own lives indefinitely. These things can only be done by a corporation. Ang. & A. Priv. Corp. 9th ed. § 41; 2 Kent, Com. 8th ed. 296, 298; Parsons, Partn. 2d Am. ed. 544; Gow, Partn. 2d Am. ed. 17.

"The fact that these respondents may be legally held individually liable upon any policies they may have issued does not relieve them of the charge of having acted as a corporation. They are, if individually liable, only liable because they have no statutory authority to do what they have assumed to do, because, instead of being a corporation in fact, they have usurped the powers of a corporation. Were we to hold that these respondents can do, without any legislative authority, what they here assume to do, our insurance laws ought to be repealed; for individuals, then, by organizing in this manner, could escape both individual and corporate liability beyond the amount of assets they might choose to place in the hands of their trustee as the basis of their liability. No public officer could investigate whether the amount is in fact paid in, how it is invested, or how secured, and the public would thus have practically no protection against dishonest companies. These respondents, if they will carry on the business of insurance, must either openly act upon their responsibility, as individuals, or they must become incorporated, and subject themselves to the laws governing such corporations." The judgment below was accordingly affirmed. The grounds held sufficient for ousting the respondents in that case are present in the case before us.

The averments of the petition sufficiently show that the defendants in transacting the business of insurance in this state are unlawfully exercising a franchise within the state, and are acting as a corporation therein without being legally incorporated.

Demurrer overruled and judgment of ouster.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

George J. KINDEL, Appt.,
v.

BECK &amp; PAULI LITHOGRAPHING CO.

(.....Colo.....)

1. The entry, by the clerk, of a judgment for a larger amount than asked for in the complaint, when the order for judgment follows the language of the prayer, is to be regarded as a clerical and not a judicial error in determining the power of the court to correct it.
2. The trial court may correct a clerical error in the amount of the judgment entered after the record has been removed to a higher court by appeal.
3. An appellant cannot insist on having clerical errors in the judgment corrected by the appellate rather than by the trial court, although the correction by the trial court deprives him of his ground for appeal.
4. Imposing a penalty on the officers, agents, and stockholders of a foreign corporation for doing business in the state without filing a certificate does not render void a contract by the corporation to manufacture articles at its domicile and deliver them to the purchaser in the state imposing the penalty.
5. Failure to pass upon a demurrer to a defense and entering judgment for plaintiff on the pleadings is not prejudicial to defendant when the defense was insufficient and the defect such that it could not have been cured by amendment.

(December 23, 1898.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Arapahoe County in favor of plaintiff, and from an order correcting the judgment in an action brought to recover the contract price of certain calendars which had been furnished by plaintiff to defendant. Affirmed.

Statement by Hayt, Ch. J.:

The contest in this case is over $7.78. The controversy arose as follows: In the year 1889 the appellee, the Beck & Pauli Lithographing Company, entered in a contract with appellant, Kindel, by the terms of which appellee agreed to furnish appellant 5,000 calendars at 17½ cents each, or for a total of $875. The calendars were duly furnished, and accepted by appellant. When the bill for the same was presented it contained a charge of $15.27 for boxing and freight. This bill appellant refused to pay, and thereupon suit was instituted. Appellee, in its complaint, for a first cause of action alleges the furnishing of the calendars under the contract, and the payment of the sum of $15.27 for boxing and freight upon the same, and asks for judgment for these sums, with interest. It is with the first cause of action alone that we have to deal upon

NOTE.—Exclusion of foreign corporations as an interference with interstate commerce.

Telegraph companies.

A foreign corporation operating a telegraph line between states, and which has accepted the Act of Congress of July 24, 1866, giving it the privilege of using post-roads, cannot be excluded from a state; and an attempt of the state to grant an exclusive franchise for telegraph business is void. Pensacola Teleg. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 96 U. S. 1, 24 L. ed. 708, affirming 2 Woods, C. C. 643; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Atlantic & Pacific States Teleg. Co. 5 Nev. 102.

But a Pennsylvania case denied the validity of the lease of a franchise by a telegraph company to a foreign corporation so as to authorize the latter to open new lines. Philadelphia v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 2 W. N. C. 455.

This case, however, also decided that post-roads, which a foreign company had the right to use under the act of congress, did not include streets and highways belonging to the state, the fee of which was generally owned by individuals. But on this point the case is fully overthrown by the cases above cited.

No license fee can be demanded by a municipal corporation as a condition of doing business by a foreign telegraph company acting under the act of congress. Bradford v. Postal Teleg. Co. (Pa.) 11 Ry. & Corp. L. J. 54; Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 137 U. S. 640, 32 L. ed. 81, reversing Port of Mobile v. Leloup, 76 Ala. 481.

But for purely private business between points in the same state, a license tax imposed on such a company is not unconstitutional, even if it is also engaged in interstate business which cannot be prevented or burdened by state authorities. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Charleston, 153 U. S. 632, 38 L. ed.—.

For business done by government officers and agents by a telegraph company, under the act of congress, no license fee or burden can be imposed. Charleston v. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. (S. C.) 9 Ry. & Corp. L. J. 449.

A foreign corporation may be given the right to build a telegraph line across the public domain, but not upon private property without just compensation. Southwestern R. Co. v. Southern & Atlantic Teleg. Co. 46 Ga. 43, 12 Am. Rep. 585.

A state constitutional provision requiring a known place of business and an authorized agent of a foreign corporation before it can do business in the state is a valid police regulation and is not unconstitutional as to commerce in respect to a foreign telegraph company "as it does not impede or obstruct unreasonably any right conferred on foreign telegraph corporate companies by the Act of Congress of July 24, 1866. American U. Teleg. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 67 Ala. 23, 43 Am. Rep. 90.

But no interstate business was involved in this case nor any business for the government, and it would seem that as to such kinds of business the decision would necessarily be otherwise in view of the federal decisions denying the power of states to interfere with commerce or government agencies.

So, such company, at least where it has not acquired any property in the state or attempted to construct any telegraph line therein, has no right to maintain suit to enjoin interference with its business. American U. Teleg. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. supra.

A tax on gross receipts of a foreign telegraph company and other forms of taxation such as a charge on each pole and each mile of wire which are not made conditions of doing business within the state, although presenting questions quite similar to those respecting the lawfulness of con-

this appeal. To this first cause of action the defendant, by answer, interposed two defenses. The first consists of allegations to the effect that plaintiff was a foreign corporation, and had not complied with the laws of the state of Colorado with reference to filing a certificate as required by the statutes. The second plea to this cause of action consists merely of an offer on the part of the defendant to pay the sum of $875, and a denial that he was indebted in any larger amount. And the defendant further says "that, as to said $875, he is still willing to pay, and offers to bring same into court." The plaintiff filed a general demurrer to the first defense. It replied to so much of the second defense as constituted an answer to that part of the first cause of action which related to the item of $15.27. In this state of the pleadings, plaintiff, upon notice, moved for judgment by default for the undisputed portion of his claim. The court sustained this motion, and rendered judgment accordingly on April 23, 1890. From this the defendant prayed an appeal, which was allowed, and the amount of the bond fixed by the court. An appeal bond was filed and approved on May 1, 1890. Thereafter, before the record had been lodged in this court, and at the same term of the district court at which the judgment was rendered, after due notice, plaintiff's counsel moved the court to correct the entry of the judgment by deducting therefrom the sum of $7.73, which was accordingly done. The defendant thereupon prayed another appeal, which was allowed on the condition that he file an appeal bond within a certain time. The entire proceedings appear in the record now before the court.

Messrs. Markham & Carr, for appellant:

This court had said in People v. Adams, 13 Colo. 551, in speaking of appeals "the order of the district court in relation to the appeal having been complied with, the jurisdiction of the supreme court clearly attached, unless some fatal irregularity existed."

The filing of the appeal bond within the time required by the statute perfects the appeal.

Carbonate Town Co. v. Ives, 10 Colo. 81.

After the appeal was perfected under the former system, the cause was then pending here, and the court below was without jurisdiction to enter new orders with a view to a code appeal.

Eicholtz v. Wilbur, 4 Colo. 435.

When the party appealing has entered into the appeal bond, and the same is accepted and approved, the appeal is taken.

Svensen v. Grand Fire & Marine Ins. Co. 4 Colo. 480; Daniels v. Miller, 8 Colo. 542.

When the appeal is perfected, the judgment or decree in the court below is thereby vacated and the case is regarded as being transferred to the court above. An appeal perfected suspends all proceedings upon the judgment appealed from.

Powell, Appellate Proceedings, § 19, p. 371.

Messrs. Riddell, Starkweather & Dixon, for appellee:

A plea of tender has always been regarded as an admission of liability to the amount of the sum tendered.

ditions on which foreign corporations may do business, are not considered here. As to this see note on the power of the state to impose burdens on interstate telegraph and telephone companies with the case of Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Baltimore, ante, 161.

Insurance companies.

That the business of insurance is not commerce which a foreign corporation has a right to engage in under federal laws is fully established in Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 567; Ducat v. Chicago, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 410, 19 L. ed. 972; Liverpool & L. L. & F. Ins. Co. v. Oliver, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 566, 19 L. ed. 1029; Home Ins. Co. of New York v. Augusta, 93 U. S. 116, 23 L. ed. 825; People v. Thurbur, 13 Ill. 554; Farmers & Merchants Ins. Co. v. Harrah, 47 Ind. 238; List v. Com. 118 Pa. 322; State v. Phipps, 18 L. R. A. 657, 50 Kan. 609.

As to restrictions on foreign insurance companies, see note to State v. Aokerman, ante, 298.

Packet company.

The provision of article 236 of the Louisiana Constitution requiring foreign corporations before doing business in that state to have a known place of business and an authorized agent is an unlawful interference with interstate commerce when applied to a packet company engaged in interstate transportation with vessels licensed under act of congress for the coasting trade. New Orleans & M. Packet Co. v. James (C. C. R. D. La.) 1 Intern. Com. Rep. 569, 22 Fed. Rep. 21.

Express companies.

In Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 640, 33 L. ed. 81, it was said that in view of the course of decisions subsequently made, the ordinance involved in the case of Osborne v. Mobile, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 479, 24 L. R. A.

21 L. ed. 470, which imposed a license tax on an express company or railroad company having a business extending beyond the limits of the state greater than that imposed on such companies whose business was confined to the state or city, and which was there held constitutional, "would now be regarded as repugnant to the power conferred upon congress to regulate commerce among the several states."

A privilege tax imposed on a foreign express company engaged in interstate transportation is invalid as to such business but valid as to business performed exclusively within the state. United States Exp. Co. v. Hemmingway, 39 Fed. Rep. 60.

No license tax can be imposed by a state on an express company of another state engaged in interstate transportation so far as that business is concerned, but it is otherwise as to merely local business within the state. Wells, Fargo & Co. v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 23 Fed. Rep. 469.

Railroad companies.

A tax upon a foreign railroad corporation for the privilege of keeping in the state an office for the use of its officers, stockholders, agents, and employees is unconstitutional as a tax upon commerce, where its railroad is a link in a through line of interstate transportation. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 136 U. S. 114, 34 L. ed. 394, 3 Intern. Com. Rep. 178, reversing 114 Pa. 256.

To similar effect is the decision in McCall v. California, 136 U. S. 104, 34 L. ed. 391, 3 Intern. Com. Rep. 181, in which a license tax imposed upon an agent of a railroad doing business between New York and Chicago for the privilege of doing business in San Francisco, which consisted in procuring passengers for that line, but not in selling tickets or receiving or paying out money for the company, was a tax upon interstate commerce.

Supply Ditch Co. v. Elliott, 10 Colo. 381; Denver, South Park & P. R. Co. v. Harp, 6 Colo. 424; Brown v. Fink, 48 N. C. 378; Frank v. Coe, 4 G. Greene, 555, 61 Am. Dec. 145; Moynahan v. Moore, 9 Mich. 9, 77 Am. Dec. 483, also note containing a full collection of authorities.

If a debt or duty be not discharged by a tender and refusal, the tender must be pleaded with a proferat in curia.

Spinn v. Baltzell, 1 Fla. 801, 46 Am. Dec. 857; 5 Bacon, Abr. title Tender, H 4; Carley v. Vance, 17 Mass. 392.

No proferat in curia being either alleged or proven, it was proper for the court, on the motion of the plaintiff, to enter judgment for the plaintiff, for that portion of the "first cause of action," which was admitted to be due by the averments of the "second defense."

Monroe v. Chaldeck, 78 Ill. 432; Carley v. Vance, and Spinn v. Baltzell, supra.

A foreign corporation, although it has not complied with the requirements of the statutes, in respect to filing of the certificates, may yet carry on business in this state, acquire and hold real and personal property, and maintain suits in our courts. The only penalty thereby incurred is the rendering of the officers and agents of the corporation liable for the debts of the corporation.

Uiley v. Clark-Gardner Lode Min. Co. 4 Colo. 869; Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Overholt, 4 Dill. 287; Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, 113 U. S. 527, 28 L. ed. 1137; Frittle v. Palmer, 182 U. S. 282, 88 L. ed. 817.

Under these decisions, the "first defense" of the defendant would appear to have constituted no defense at all to plaintiff's action. It was utterly and hopelessly insufficient. It presented no issuable facts. It was frivolous in the extreme. The court was justified in regarding it as a mere nullity.

Fitzgibbon v. Calvert, 39 Cal. 261; Felch v. Beaudry, 40 Cal. 448; Gale v. James, 11 Colo. 540; Brown v. Fink, 48 N. C. 378.

The "first defense" raised no issuable fact. It was hopelessly insufficient; it presented no defense, no bar to the action. If the court had passed upon the demurrer before entering judgment by default, it must have been sustained. Were this court to reverse the judgment and remand the cause, the district court would then be obliged to sustain the demurrer, nothing would be gained. The same judgment would again be rendered on the pleadings.

Peahine v. Shapperson, 17 Gratt. 473, 94 Am. Dec. 470; Greef v. Brown, 1 Rob. (Va.) 265.

During the term wherein any judicial act is done, the record remaineth in the breast of the judges of the court, and in their remembrance, and therefore the roll is alterable during that term, as the judges shall direct; but when the term is passed, then the record is of roll, and admitted no alteration, averment, or proof to the contrary. Co. Litt. 260a. Of the law thus laid down, the only part remaining unshaken to the present time is, that during the term, the proceedings remained in the breast of the judges. Not only the records, during that time, are subject to the revision of the court, but the judgment itself may be altered, revised, or revoked, as well as amended in respect to clerical errors and matters of form.

Bridge company.

A New York corporation authorized by act of congress to construct a bridge across Staten Island sound or "Arthur Kill" cannot be prevented by statute of New Jersey from constructing a bridge at that place. Stookton v. Baltimore & N. Y. R. Co. 32 Fed. Rep. 9.

The validity of a tax on a foreign corporation in any form is not here touched upon, except so far as the tax is in the nature of a license tax imposed as a condition of permitting the company to do business in the state, though very similar questions arise in cases of taxation in other forms which is alleged to constitute a burden on interstate commerce.

Trading companies.

But a foreign corporation selling its manufactured goods in a state by traveling solicitors was held, by an opinion of the attorney-general, in Pennsylvania to be bound by the Pennsylvania statute requiring the corporation to file a statement of a known place of business and a known agent within the state. Re Goulds Mfr. Co. of New York, 14 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 179. This opinion seems to be very clearly wrong in the light of the other authorities on the question.

It is held by the courts as in the main case a sale of goods in another state by a foreign corporation and a delivery of them in the state constitutes interstate commerce which cannot be affected by state statute requiring a foreign corporation to file its articles, etc., as a condition of doing business. Lyons-Thomas Hardware Co. v. Reading Hardware Co. (Tex.) Feb. 7, 1893; American Starch Co. v. Bateman (Tex.) May 31, 1893; Bateman v. Western Star Mill Co. 1 Tex. Civ. App. 90, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 260; Reed v. Walker, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 92.

The same doctrine was declared by two of the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States in Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, 113 U. S. 527, 28 L. ed. 1137, but the decision was based by the majority of the justices on other grounds without passing upon this question.

Following this decision in a parallel case but without discussing the subject of commerce, was the decision in Fuller & J. Mfg. Co. v. Foster (Dak.) Oct. 4, 1893.

In Boulden v. Ester Organ Co., 22 Ala. 182, the conditional sale of a piano by a foreign corporation was held to be invalid because the corporation had no right to do business in the state; but nothing was said about interstate commerce and it does not appear that the piano was sent from another state.

In Webber v. Virginia, 108 U. S. 347, 26 L. ed. 566, a license tax on a sewing machine agent selling machines for a corporation of another state was held void as an unconstitutional interference with commerce. The statute discriminated against manufacturers of other states and was held void on this account. The fact that the manufacturer was a corporation did not affect the question.

This is established doctrine as to drummers or commercial travelers, and it is immaterial whether they are traveling for corporations or individuals. See cases on this point in note on peddlers and drummers as related to interstate commerce, with the case of Re Spaul, 14 L. R. A. 97, 47 Fed. Rep. 268.

And in the main case KINDEL V. BECK & PAULI LITHOGRAPHING CO. it is declared that to give a state constitution and statutes as to foreign corporations a construction which would not permit a foreign corporation to bring an action in the state for goods delivered in the state under a contract made in another state would make them an unconstitutional regulation of commerce.

Freem. Judgm. § 69; Sherman v. Nixon, 37 Ind. 154; Hughes v. Hinds, 69 Ind. 94; White v. Blake, 74 Me. 493, and cases cited; Sidener v. Coons, 88 Ind. 188; Latta v. Griffith, 57 Ind. 329; Miller v. Boyce, 60 Ind. 192; Mitchell v. Lincoln, 78 Ind. 584; Conway v. Day, 79 Ind. 318; Rickman v. Rickman, 6 Lea, 485.

The court below had the undoubted right, upon motion, to correct or amend the judgment, inasmuch as the same had been entered for the wrong amount.

Doane v. Glenn, 1 Colo. 456; Wolfley v. Lebanon Min. Co. 3 Colo. 296.

A judgment, or any other material part of a record may be amended or corrected in the court below while the cause is pending in another court on appeal or writ of error.

Rew v. Barker, 2 Cow. 408, 14 Am. Dec. 515; Freem. Judgm. § 71, and cases cited; Wolfley v. Lebanon Min. Co. supra; State v. Delafield, 69 Wis. 268; Morris v. Peck, 78 Wis. 482.

Hayt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first assignment of error has reference to the judgment of April 23, 1890, for $882.73. That this judgment was excessive to the amount of $7.73 has at all times been admitted by appellee, and the only question to be considered with reference thereto is as to the right of the court below to correct the same, as was attempted by the judgment entered June 30, 1890. It is apparent from the record before us that the excess in the amount of the first judgment resulted from a clerical mistake of the clerk in entering the same.

Therefore a statute prohibiting a foreign corporation from doing business without a known place of business and an agent in the state does not apply to a sale of goods and delivery of them in the state, and a suit for the purchase price. Wile & Brickner Co. v. Onsel, 1 Pa. Dist. Rep. 187.

In an action by a foreign corporation for a debt due for shoes sold and shipped from another state to the defendant, the fact that the corporation had not an agent and known place of business in the state as required in order to be permitted to do business there is immaterial (Ware v. Hamilton Brown Shoe Co., 22 Ala. 145), since any attempt to interfere with such business would be an interference with interstate commerce.

And the amount due from an agent of a foreign corporation on an account for sewing machines which he had sold can be recovered by the corporation, although it had failed to comply with the requirements of a state statute imposing conditions on the right to do business, since the transaction is a commercial one which was lawful notwithstanding the statute. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Hardee, 4 N. M. 175.

So a sale of brick to be delivered by a foreign corporation within the state and sent from another state is an act of interstate commerce which cannot be affected by state statute prescribing conditions on the doing of business by a foreign corporation. Cook v. Rome Brick Co. 96 Ala. 409.

The court in Williams v. Hintermeister, 26 Fed. Rep. 889, inclined to the opinion that the business of a piano and organ company incorporated in another state was of a commercial nature, which the company was entitled to carry on without complying with conditions of the state laws.

The business of manufacturing and selling patented machines by a foreign corporation which owns the patents was held not subject to state restriction, in Shook v. Singer Mfg. Co. 61 Ind. 520; Grover v. Butler, 53 Ind. 454; Walter A. Wood Mowing Mach. Co. v. Caldwell, 54 Ind. 270, 23 Am. Rep. 641.

But in Webber v. Virginia, 108 U. S. 347, 26 L. ed. 586, it was established that the mere fact that articles were patented did not prevent a state from imposing a license tax on their sale by agents of foreign manufactures. Yet the statute was held void as an unconstitutional interference with commerce because it was aimed at manufactures from outside the state. In this case the agent of a sewing machine company of another state was held entitled to sell its machines without paying the license tax.

An agent of a foreign corporation is not exempt on the ground that he is engaged in interstate commerce from a license tax imposed on agents selling stove ranges, provided the ranges sold by him have been previously brought into the state. Hynes v. Briggs, 41 Fed. Rep. 488. See note as to peddlers and drummers, with Re Spain (C. C. E. D. N. C.) 14 L. R. A. 97.

Publishing companies.

Soliciting and receiving subscriptions for a newspaper in another state is not doing business therein by a foreign corporation. Beard v. Union & American Pub. Co. 71 Ala. 60.

Lending companies.

That the loaning of money by foreign corporations engaged in that business is not a matter of interstate commerce, but may be subjected to conditions by a state, is declared in Nelms v. Edinburg Land Mortg. Co. 22 Ala. 157.

For recognition or exclusion of foreign corporations generally, see note to Cone Export & Commission Co. v. Poole, ante, 289.

and the amended judgment certified to the appellate court, and a reversal thereby avoided. In the case before us the error was purely clerical. The motion of plaintiff was not for a judgment for $882.78, but for a judgment for that part of the first cause of action not controverted, and the order of the court follows closely this language. It is as follows: "It is ordered by the court that judgment by default be entered herein against said defendant upon that part of plaintiff's 'first cause of action' not controverted by said defendant's answer, and let the same be recorded in the judgment book." If anything additional is necessary to establish the fact that the excess in the amount of the judgment of April 28, 1890, resulted from a mistake on the part of the clerk, it is to be found in the judgment of the district court rendered on the 30th day of June, 1890, in which it is specifically adjudged that the error in the former judgment resulted entirely from a mistake in the entry thereof. It has been held by this court that a judgment "is what is considered and ordered by the court, and not necessarily what is entered by the clerk." Gaynor v. Clements, 16 Colo. 209. Appellant cannot, by appealing from a judgment never rendered, compel this court to decide such an appeal, or deprive the trial court of the power of correcting the unauthorized act of its clerk. In so far as the views expressed in Breene v. Booth, 3 Colo. App. 470, are inconsistent herewith, they do not meet with the approval of this court. The claim of appellant to the effect that he has a right to have the first judgment corrected in this court, rather than the court below, has no foundation in logic or law. Reviews are had and appeals allowed for the purpose of correcting errors that the trial court is unwilling or unable to correct. In this case the error was fully corrected in the trial court, and the occasion for an appeal on account of the excess in the amount of the judgment was thereby avoided.

The remaining assignments of error may be considered together. They relate to the right of the court to enter judgment without first disposing of the demurrer to the first defense. Undoubtedly good practice required a ruling directly upon this demurrer. But to entitle appellant to any relief in this court by reason of the omission he must not only show that error intervened, but also that he was prejudiced thereby. The first defense is based upon the failure of appellant, a corporation organized under the laws of another state, but doing business in this state, to file a certificate as required by section 10, art. 15, Const., and by sections 499, 500, Mills' Anno. Stat. Although by such failure all officers, agents, and stockholders of the company subject themselves to certain personal liabilities, it is no defense to the present action. In case of noncompliance, the penalty of personal liability of officers, agents, etc., was deemed sufficient by the legislature, and will not be enlarged by the courts. This has been decided in a number of cases. Utley v. Clark-Gardner Lode Min. Co. 4 Colo. 389; Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Overholt, 4 Dill. 287; Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, 113 U. S. 727, 28 L. ed. 1137; Fritts v. Palmer, 132 U. S. 283, 33 L. ed. 317. In this case appellee contracted to make the calendars at its place of business in Wisconsin, and deliver them to appellant in Colorado. To give the state constitution and statutes the construction claimed by appellant would be to permit a state to regulate commerce among the states, authority for which is conferred exclusively upon congress. U. S. Const. art. 1, § 8. See opinion by Mr. Justice Matthews in Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, supra. For these reasons the first defense ought to have been held insufficient, and the demurrer thereto sustained. The same result was, however, reached upon the motion for judgment upon the pleadings. The defect in this defense was not such as could have been cured by amendment hence appellant is in no way prejudiced by the course adopted. The error in the proceeding was one of form, and not of substance, and will not avail. Civil Code 1887, § 78.

The judgment will be affirmed.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT

EDISON GENERAL ELECTRIC CO.,
Respondent,
v.

CANADIAN PACIFIC NAVIGATION
CO., Appellant.

(..... Wash. ....)

1. A provision of a statute imposing a penalty "for every day that business is done by a foreign corporation without registering" as required by law does not of itself make void contracts made by such corporation while unregistered.

2. Retaining and making use of materials and neglecting to return or offer to return them will not authorize a recovery for their price, under a contract providing for payment when the work is "in good working order."

3. That the light complies with the con-

NOTE.—Validity of contracts made by foreign corporations which have not complied with statutory conditions of the right to do business in a state.

Much confusion exists both in the reports and text-books as to the validity of a contract made by a foreign corporation which has not acquired the right to do business in the state by complying with 24 L. R. A.

conditions imposed by statute. Treatises on corporations have hardly touched the question or have stated a rule without noticing decisions to the contrary. Much of the confusion existing in the reports has arisen from the failure of the courts in some of the earlier cases to distinguish between the right of the foreign corporation to set up its tract at the moment the equipment is completed will not entitle the seller to the price under a contract to furnish an electric light equipment of certain power which provides for payment when the work is "found to be in good working order," if a practical test within a reasonable time thereafter demonstrates that the required power has not been attained.

4. Interest from the time the action was brought may be added in case of the recovery by the seller of the contract price of an electrical equipment.
5. A contract to pay for the services of one expert in putting in an electrical equipment will not authorize a recovery at contract rates for the services of two.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

own default as a defense and the right of the other party to set up such failure of the corporation, when the corporation itself attempted to enforce the contract. This same confusion has led the author of one text-book to state that the weight of authority is in favor of the validity of a contract made by a foreign corporation which has not complied with statutory conditions of the right to do business, where the statutes do not expressly declare such contracts void, but have merely prohibited such corporations from doing business until compliance with the conditions, and imposed a penalty for violation of the statute. This writer obtained a supposed weight of authority to this effect only by including among the decisions cited to support this statement, cases in which a foreign insurance company has not been allowed to defeat its own liability on a policy because of its own failure to comply with statutory conditions. These cases are manifestly based properly on the doctrine of estoppel, denying the right of the corporation to set up its own wrong as a defense against its own contract. Nevertheless, after all allowances and explanations, considerable conflict exists among the decisions.

Where a penalty is imposed.

The statutes of several states, with some differences of language, declare that foreign corporations shall not be permitted to do business until compliance with certain conditions, and further provide a penalty for violation of the statute.

Under such statutes the courts in numerous cases have held that contracts made by foreign corporations which had not complied with the statutory conditions would not sustain a right of action in favor of the corporation. Dudley v. Collier, 87 Ala. 481; Cary-Lombard Lumber Co. v. Thomas, 82 Tenn. 587; Pennington v. Townsend, 7 Wend. 276; Dundee Mortgage Trust & Investment Co. v. Nixon, 95 Ala. 318; Boulden v. Estey Organ Co. 92 Ala. 182.

Some of the cases are insurance cases in which the same doctrine is applied to defeat a right of action by the corporation for the premium, where the business was done without complying with the statutory conditions under statutes providing a penalty for so doing. Cincinnati Mut. Health Assur. Co. v. Rosenthal, 55 Ill. 85, 8 Am. Rep. 638; Franklin Ins. Co. v. Louisville & A. Packet Co. 9 Bush, 590; The Manatee, 5 Bias. 382; American Ins. Co. v. Stoy, 41 Mich. 386; American Ins. Co. v. 24 L. R. A.

Mears, Hughes, Hastings & Stedman, for appellant:

The contract was illegal.

Messrs. Preston, Albertson & Donworth and Burke, Shepard & Woods, for respondent:

A corporation chartered by one state can recover in the courts of another on a contract made and performed in the latter state, in the absence of a local prohibitory statute.

Story, Conf. L. § 48; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 591, 10 L. ed. 809; 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. §§ 960-962; 2 Beach, Corp. § 614.

The penalty provided by the statute for a failure to comply with the registration laws is exclusive of any other.

2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. §§ 65, 66; 2 Beach, Priv. Corp. § 415; Sedgw. Stat. & Const. L.

Smith, 73 Mo. 388; Stewart v. Northampton Mut. Live Stock Ins. Co. 34 N. J. L. 438.

In Indiana, the decisive under such a statute, imposing a fine upon the agent of a foreign insurance company for doing unauthorized business, and in addition declaring that the corporation shall not enforce such contracts before compliance with the conditions, hold that the contract is not void in such case, but its enforcement suspended until compliance. Walter A. Wood Mowing Mach. Co. v. Caldwell, 54 Ind. 270, 23 Am. Rep. 641; Smith v. Little, 67 Ind. 549; Singer Mfg. Co. v. Brown, 64 Ind. 548; Domestic Sewing Mach. Co. v. Hatfield, 68 Ind. 187.

Applying the same doctrine exactly are cases which deny the right of foreign corporation to recover on a bond of its agent where the business is prohibited under a penalty. Thorne v. Travellers Ins. Co. 80 Pa. 15, 21 Am. Rep. 89; Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Bales, 92 Pa. 352; Daniels v. Barney, 22 Ind. 207; Barney v. Daniels, 32 Ind. 18.

The insolvency of the statement by a foreign express company to show the entire amount of capital employed in its business, as required by such a statute, the statement being merely of the probable amount employed in the state, prevents the company from doing lawful business, and consequently it cannot maintain an action on the bond of its agent. Barney v. Daniels, supra.

But a foreign express company may sue its agent for money received in his business for the company, although the statutory provisions have not been complied with, and the business is illegal. The agent in such case is estopped to deny the right of the company. United States Exp. Co. v. Lucas, 36 Ind. 361.

So in Thorne v. Travellers Ins. Co., supra, holding that the agent and his sureties are not liable on his bond to a foreign corporation, where his business is forbidden under a penalty, the court remarked that it was not an action against the agent alone for money had and received, implying that the rule might be different in such a case. So the agent's own default is no defense to suit on his bond. Manhattan Ins. Co. v. Ellis, 23 Ohio St. 388.

All contracts made by a foreign corporation and all business transacted by it before it has complied with the conditions of the statute are illegal under the Tennessee statutes, which expressly declare that they shall be unlawful, and provide a penalty

A party that has had the benefit of a contract fully performed by a corporation is estopped to plead that the contract was ultra vires on the part of the corporation.

Petition for rehearing.

The record here shows that the verdict rendered is fully sustained by the testimony,—to such an extent indeed, that appellant has at no time sought to attack it on the ground of insufficient evidence.

The uncontradicted proof shows that all materials and labor specified in the contract sued upon were actually furnished, and there is ample evidence that the plant when completed and afterwards was in good working order and produced every result that the plaintiff contracted to bring about.

therefor. Cary-Lombard Lumber Co. v. Thomas, 22 Tenn. 587.

A foreign corporation which has violated the laws of a state by attempting to do prohibited banking business cannot recover upon a check which it has discounted, although the statute merely prescribes a penalty for its violation and does not expressly declare that contracts in the prohibited business shall be void. Pennington v. Townsend, 7 Wexl. 276.

An agent of a foreign corporation which has not complied with conditions of the right to do business under a statute declaring it "shall not be lawful" to act as agent and providing a penalty for so doing cannot recover on a contract for services in procuring a loan of money from such corporation. Dudley v. Collier, 87 Ala. 451.

On the other hand a few cases have decided to the contrary, that the imposition of a penalty for violation of a statute providing that a foreign corporation shall not do business until certain conditions have been complied with is to be taken as excluding an intention to make contracts in such unauthorized business void. It is argued that to do this would be to impose an additional penalty. Such was the decision in Dearborn Foundry Co. v. Augustine, 5 Wash. 67; Toledo Tie & Lumber Co. v. Thomas, 83 W. Va. 566; Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Overholt, 4 Dill 287; Clark v. Middleton, 19 Mo. 53.

But the case of Toledo Tie & Lumber Co. v. Thomas, supra, cites as authority a number of cases, none of which in reality support the doctrine. The one which most nearly supports it is that of Columbus Ins. Co. v. Walsh, 18 Mo. 229, in which the court indeed said that the agent's failure to comply with the conditions required by statute would "not disable the company to maintain an action, or render it unable to make proper defense to an action," but the action which the court upheld in that case was for the recovery back of money paid on a policy under mistake, and was therefore not based on the contract.

On this case of Columbus Ins. Co. v. Walsh, supra, is apparently based also the decision in Clark v. Middleton, 19 Mo. 53, in which the court holds that the agent's failure to comply with statutory conditions would not defeat the right of a foreign insurance company to recover on a premium note. This decision stands against a very large number of decisions which deny the right to recover premium

Even if this retention and use of the plant did not alone constitute an acceptance and establish the liability of the defendant the jury were not charged to that effect by the court.

Although detached expressions in the court's charge to a jury if considered as independent expressions may be technically erroneous, yet if the instructions as a whole and as considered together fairly state the law, in no wise misleading the jury, there is no prejudicial error.

Seattle Gas & Electric Light & Motor Co. v. Seattle, 6 Wash. 101.

The only effect of furnishing two experts instead of one was to lessen by half the time of completing the work, a result plainly to the advantage of the defendant. The proof showed that these two men were equally expert and that they did the work in half the time that one alone would have been obliged to expend.

Hoyt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover for materials furnished, and labor performed, in pursuance of a written contract between the

where the foreign insurance company has failed to comply with statutory provisions. See note to Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co. (Ind.) 30 L. R. A. 406.

The case of Dearborn Foundry Co. v. Augustine, supra, was one in which a foreign corporation brought an action for the price of goods shipped into the state from Chicago, and although the contract was made within the state, it would seem to be one within the protection of the federal laws to interstate commerce (See note to Kindel v. Beck & P. Lithographing Co. (Colo.) ante, 811, and on this ground the decision might be upheld irrespective of the ground on which it was put by the court.

The main case, EDISON GENERAL ELECTRIC CO. V. CANADIAN PACIFIC NAV. CO., is decided on the ground that the particular language of the clause imposing the penalty has no tendency to show an intent to prohibit the business, or declare it unlawful. The penalty prescribed in that case was "for every day that business is done" and in this respect was like the case of Toledo Tie & Lumber Co. v. Thomas, supra, in which the penalty was "for each month its failure so to comply shall continue." The language in such cases has some tendency to imply that the legislature contemplated the possibility of such business without compliance.

The case of Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Overholt, 4 Dill 287, was as to the right of a foreign corporation to take a mortgage on real estate in Colorado. This was held not to be defeated by a statute requiring foreign corporations to file a copy of their charter or other evidence of incorporation, and the failure of the corporation to comply therewith, where there was nothing to indicate that this was a condition on which a corporation might continue in business, but, on the contrary, a penalty was given for the default.

The cases in which foreign corporations have been held liable on their contracts are very clearly distinguishable from those in which the contract is held void in favor of the corporation, and are mentioned below under the heading as to estoppel.

While in the last analysis the question is one of legislative intent and may be determined by slight indications in the context, it seems absurd to say as a general doctrine that a contract will be void if it is merely prohibited by statute but will become legal if the statute in addition to its prohibiplaintiff and the defendant. Such contract was in substantially the following form: "This agreement, made and entered into this 24th day of December, 1890, by and between the Edison General Electric Co., hereinafter called the 'company,' and the Canadian Pacific Navigation Co., Ltd., hereinafter called the 'purchaser.' The terms and conditions of this agreement are such that the company agrees for the sum of three hundred and fifty ($350) dollars, and in consideration of the mutual promises made below, to furnish the following apparatus and material necessary to change the existing electric light system on board the said purchaser's steamer Islander, to conform to the Edison system as regards lamps and sockets: 220 Edison key sockets; 220 Edison 16 c. p. lamps; the necessary fittings required to fit with Edison sockets the existing chandeliers and brackets; the necessary wire to renew circuit in stoke-room. The company will furnish the services of an expert to make the necessary changes from the existing system to the Edison system, to overhaul the wires where necessary, for the sum of five ($5) dollars per day from the time he leaves Seattle until his return, and the necessary living expenses while employed on steamer and during time en route from and to Seattle, and traveling expenses from and to Seattle. In case any material not included in this contract is desired, the purchaser agrees to give the company a written order for the same, and a charge for said extras is to be mentioned in said order. In consideration of the above the purchaser agrees to pay the said company for all material and labor furnished under this agreement when the work has been completed and found to be in good working order." The answer of the defendant put in issue many of the allegations of the complaint, and alleged, by way of affirmative defense, that the contract in question was made and to be performed in the province of British Columbia; that, by the laws of said province, a foreign corporation may register in the manner provided, and thus secure-tion imposes a punishment for its violation. It would seem that the more penalties the statute imposed for its violation the more condemnation of the business and the more determination to prevent it were shown.

Here prohibition of business.

In numerous cases where the statutes have merely provided that foreign corporations should do no business before such compliance, but without providing any penalty for violation of the statute, at least so far as the cases show, the courts have held that the statutory prohibition, expressed or implied, made the business unlawful and that the corporation cannot recover on its contracts made before compliance with the statute. But other cases hold that the contracts are valid.

In some of these cases it may be that fines or penalties were prescribed for a violation of the statute, but if so, they are not mentioned by the court as an element in the decision.

Under the Oregon statute which provides that a "foreign corporation before transacting business in the state must duly execute and acknowledge a power of attorney," etc., a corporation has no power to make a contract, such as a loan of money, within the state until this condition is complied with. Re Comstock, 8 Sawy. 215.

Under section 8 of the Oregon Act of 1890, to regulate foreign banking, insurance, and other corporations, providing that a "foreign corporation before transacting business in this state must" perform certain conditions, but providing no penalty, it was held that there was an implied prohibition against business by such companies before compliance with the statute; and that an unauthorized contract was void. The argument of the court was that, unless the contract should be held void, the statute would have no effect. Bank of British Columbia v. Page, 6 Or. 481.

Although the statute allows foreign corporations to do business, and merely provides that "they shall first comply" with certain conditions, the corporation cannot enforce a contract made by such agent. Hacheney v. Leary, 12 Or. 40.

A note and mortgage to a foreign corporation loaning money in the state without having complied with the conditions prescribed by statute as a condition of the right to do business is void. Semple v. Bank of British Columbia, 5 Sawy. 88; Farrior v. New England Mortg. Secur. Co. 88 Ala. 275.

The same doctrine is found in a large number of insurance cases in which the right of the company to recover premiums on contracts made without complying with the statutes is denied. Thus in Massachusetts, Jones v. Smith, 3 Gray, 500; Williams v. Cheney, Id. 215, 8 Gray, 203; Washington County Mut. Ins. Co. v. Dawes, 6 Gray, 876; General Mut. Ins. Co. v. Phillips, 13 Gray, 90; Washington County Mut. Ins. Co. v. Chamberlain, 16 Gray, 165; Washington County Mut. Ins. Co. v. Hastings, 2 Allen, 306. (Although later decisions in Massachusetts upheld the right to premium, because a later statute had expressly declared that such unauthorized policies should be valid, and the courts therefore regarded the right to recover the premium as following therefrom. National Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Pursell, 10 Allen, 231; Provincial Ins. Co. v. Lapeley, 15 Gray, 202; Hartford Live Stock Ins. Co. v. Matthews, 102 Mass. 221. And to the same effect are the New Hampshire decisions on such a statute, making the unauthorized insurance valid. Connecticut River Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Whipple, 61 N. H. 61; Connecticut River Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Way, 62 N. H. 622.)

Decisions elsewhere also deny the right of a foreign insurance company to recover premium for unauthorized insurance. Aetna Ins. Co. v. Harvey, 11 Wis. 394; Lamb v. Lamb, 6 Bies. 420, 13 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 17; Ford v. Buckeye State Ins. Co. 6 Bush, 133, 99 Am. Dec. 663; Barbor v. Boehm, 21 Neb. 450; Lycoming F. Ins. Co. v. Wright, 55 Vt. 423.

Following the Massachusetts decisions, it was held in Haverhill Ins. Co. v. Prescott, 43 N. H. 547, 80 Am. Dec. 123, that by force of the New Hampshire retaliatory statute, a Massachusetts company doing business in New Hampshire could not recover on a premium note, because a New Hampshire company would be denied the right to do so in Massachusetts.

In some of the cases the denial of the right to recover premium is put on the ground that the contract of insurance is void, but whenever that question has fully arisen, almost without exception, the courts have refused to relieve the insurance company from its contract because of its own failure to comply with the statutes. See note to Phenix Ins. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co. (Ind.) 20 L. R. A. 405.

The Indiana cases in respect to the validity of premium notes taken by foreign insurance companies having no right to do business in the state practically the rights of a domestic corporation as to the transaction of business in the province; that, if it transact business in the province without having so qualified itself, it shall incur a penalty not exceeding five dollars for every day during which business is so carried on; that plaintiff company was a foreign corporation, and had not in any manner complied with the provisions of such laws; and that, by reason of such noncompliance, the contract entered into was void. These facts were set out in detail in the answer, so that the question of the validity of the contract under the laws of said province was fully presented. The court, upon motion, struck out one of the paragraphs of said defense, and its action in so doing is the first error assigned by appellant. This ruling had no effect upon appellant's rights, and it is not necessary that we should decide as to its correctness.

The next error assigned is founded upon the action of the court in sustaining respondent's demurrer to this affirmative defense.

are declared by the supreme court of that state, in Phenix Ins. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co. 30 L. R. A. 406, 134 Ind. 218, to be "in the utmost confusion," adding that "it is utterly impossible to reconcile them." It repeatedly appears that some of these cases ignore prior inconsistent ones and cite still earlier ones, while the cases ignored may be the basis of a still later decision. But all these Indiana cases hold either that the premium note is void, or that the right of action thereon is suspended until the statutory conditions are complied with.

The right to recover on such a note was denied on the ground that the contract was illegal, in Cassaday v. American Ins. Co. 72 Ind. 96; Farmers & Merchants Ins. Co. v. Harrah. 47 Ind. 236; Hoffman v. Banks. 41 Ind. 1; while the denial of the remedy on the ground that the enforcement was suspended during failure to comply was the doctrine in Behler v. German Mut. F. Ins. Co. 68 Ind. 847; American Ins. Co. v. Wellman. 69 Ind. 413.

And these Indiana decisions are some of them based on the Act of 1852, applying to foreign companies generally, and others on the Act of 1866, applying to foreign insurance companies. But the decisions on these statutes are cited indiscriminately in the later decisions.

Under Indiana Rev. Stat. 1881, § 8060, requiring a compliance with conditions of doing business by foreign insurance corporations, and § 8763, saying it shall not be lawful for an agent to do business without compliance, neither the company nor its receiver can recover dues for an unauthorized policy. Wiestling v. Warthin. 1 Ind. App. 217.

Another Indiana case held that as the statute said it should not be lawful for an insurance company to do business without compliance with the statute, premium paid might be recovered back. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Thomas. 46 Ind. 44.

On the other hand there are a few cases which hold contracts of foreign corporations to be valid although made in the course of business which the statutes give no permission to engage in until after compliance with certain conditions.

A bona fide holder of negotiable promissory notes is not subject to a defense that the payee was a foreign corporation which had no right to do business in the state, because it had not complied with statutory conditions. City Bank of Hartford v. Press Co. Limited. 56 Fed. Rep. 200. But in the above case an unreported decision in the case of Thorne Typesetting Co. v. Record Pub. Co. by the court of common pleas No. 4 of Philadelphia County 24 L. R. A.

It held that the terms of the law therein pleaded were not such as to make void contracts of foreign corporations that had not complied with its provisions. The only provision in the statute set out in the defense which tended materially to sustain the contention of the appellant was that in which it was provided that for every day that business was done by a foreign corporation without having complied with the statute it should pay a penalty, as therein provided. There is some diversity among the cases in the construction of laws of this kind, but the weight of authority seems to establish the doctrine that it is the duty of the courts to look at the whole statute, and therefrom determine as to what was the intent of the legislature. If, by the terms thereof, the act is made unlawful, it will usually be construed to amount to a prohibition of said act, and the imposition of a penalty will also amount to a prohibition if, from the language used, such seems to have been the intent of the legislature. But in the case at ty is referred to as sustaining such a defense to similar notes as between the original parties.

The provisions of North Dakota Comp. Laws, § 8190, that no foreign corporation shall transact any business or acquire or hold any property in the state until it has filed its articles, etc., and section 8192, requiring it to appoint an agent, do not make contracts by such corporation before compliance with the statute unenforceable and void. Washburn Mill Co. v. Bartlett (N. Dak.) Dec. 23, 1893.

This statute is prohibitory in form, but seems to be without penalty or expressed consequences. Ibid.

Under constitutional and statutory provisions of South Dakota declaring that no foreign corporation shall do business within the state until certain provisions are complied with, but not declaring any penalty for violating those provisions, a contract made by a foreign corporation which has not thus complied with the conditions is not void as between the parties. Wright v. Lee (S. Dak.) July 29, 1893, affirming on rehearing (S. Dak.) March 18, 1892.

The Montana statute requiring foreign corporations "before they proceed to do business" to file their charters, and providing that, in case of failure, any person should not be allowed to prove the incorporation in a suit against it, does not make the business of such a corporation, before complying with the statute, unlawful. King v. National M. & Exp. Co. 4 Mont. 1.

A federal court also held that contracts made in Alabama by a foreign corporation are not void even if voidable because the company has not a place of business or authorized agent as required by Ala. Const., art. 14, § 4, declaring that until this condition is complied with "no foreign corporation shall do any business." American L. & T. Co. v. East & West R. Co. 37 Fed. Rep. 242.

But this decision was based on the doctrine declared but not necessarily decided by the supreme court of the state in Sherwood v. Alvia. 38 Ala. 115, which was overruled by the later decisions of that court.

Under Colorado statutes prescribing no penalty for business of a foreign corporation which has not complied with its statutes except to make officers and agents personally liable upon contracts, a conveyance of Colorado real property to a Missouri corporation, which has not complied with the statutes of Colorado is not void. Fritts v. Palmer. 122 U. S. 232, 38 L. ed. 217.

bar, while the company is liable to the penalty provided in the statute, there is nothing in the act which in terms prohibits the transaction of business or declares it to be unlawful, and the particular language of the clause which imposes the penalty has no tendency to establish either of said propositions. On the contrary, its language, fairly construed, would seem to contemplate that the company might do business without such registration, but that, if it did, it should pay the penalty therein prescribed for the privilege of so doing. The cases cited by appellant, when applied to the facts of this case, have little tendency to sustain its contention. The investigation which we have been able to give to the adjudged cases tends to support the statement made by respondent, in its brief, that a provision like the one under consideration has never been held to render contracts

The language of the statute was "no foreign or domestic corporation established or maintained in any way for pecuniary profit of its stockholders or members shall purchase or hold real estate in this state except as provided for in this act." Justice Miller dissented from the decision on the ground that this language was strong enough to make a conveyance to a foreign corporation which had not complied with the statutes void. Ibid.

It appears by consideration of all the cases that a very small part of them only have upheld contracts of foreign corporations in their favor where they have failed to comply with statutes of the kind above considered.

Contracts expressly declared void.

A foreign corporation which is expressly prohibited from keeping an office in the state for the purpose of discount or deposit cannot under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat., § 73, § 2, recover for moneys loaned by it in the state in the course of the prohibited business, as that section expressly denies a right of action based on acts of corporations prohibited by law. New Hope Delaware Bridge Co. v. Poughkeepsie Silk Co. 25 Wend. 648.

In Mo. Rev. Code 1855, p. 235, § 14, declaring void all notes for loans by a foreign banking company, a note in renewal of such a debt is also void. Bank of Louisville v. Young, 37 Mo. 398.

The Ohio Act of January 27, 1818, declaring every bank not incorporated in that state to be unauthorized, and that notes or contracts payable to or at such bank should be void, was held to apply to a bank incorporated in Michigan on territory which was in dispute between the states at that time. Myers v. Manhattan Bank, 20 Ohio, 281.

There is plainly no chance for conflict of decisions under statutes of this class.

A purchaser at a sale under a power in a mortgage given to a foreign corporation, which had not acquired the right to do any business in the state, can enforce his title against the mortgagor. Sherwood v. Alvis, 38 Ala. 115.

This decision proceeds on the theory that the contract with the foreign corporation was not invalid, although the corporation had no right to do business in the state, but on this subject it is overruled by Dudley v. Collier, 89 Ala. 431; Farrior v. New England Mortg. Secur. Co. 88 Ala. 275; and other Alabama cases above cited, but is reaffirmed on a different theory in the case following.

After foreclosure by executing a power of sale of a mortgage executed to a foreign corporation, which had not acquired the right to do any business within the state, the mortgagor cannot contest the right of the mortgagee which had purchased the land, at least without first opening up the foreclosure by disaffirming the sale. Craddock v. American Freehold Land Mortg. Co. of London, 88 Ala. 231.

So in Indiana, the failure of the agent of a foreign corporation to comply with the conditions of the Indiana Act of June 17, 1852, will not defeat title obtained by a purchaser on foreclosure of a mortgage to the corporation, but if this was a defense it should have been pleaded as ground of abatement to the suit. Elston v. Pigott, 94 Ind. 14.

On the other hand, in a federal court in Oregon it was held that a sale to a foreign corporation under a decree foreclosing a mortgage which it had taken without having acquired the right to do business in the state was also held insufficient to defeat the title of the mortgagor. Sample v. Bank of British Columbia, 5 Sawy. 83.

Estoppel.

On the question whether or not a party to a contract with a foreign corporation is estopped to deny that the corporation has complied with the conditions on which the statute allows it to do business in the state, the decisions are in conflict.

In several cases it is held that the other party is estopped to deny that the corporation has complied with the conditions of the statute so as to have the right to make the contract (Wright v. Lee (8. Dak.) March 18, 1892; Washburn Mill Co. v. Hartlett (N. Dak.) Dec. 23, 1893); but the contrary doctrine is expressly declared in Re Comstock, 3 Sawy. 213, and is necessarily implied in all the decisions above cited, in which the right of a foreign corporation to recover on a contract has been denied because of its failure to comply with statutory conditions.

A distinction, however, may be taken in respect to the right of the company's agent to deny its power to do business in the state when suit is brought against him for money received in such business. He is held estopped to deny the right of the company. United States Exp. Co. v. Lucas, 35 Ind. 351.

The corporation itself is estopped to deny its right to contract as a defense to an action against it upon a contract which it has made. Phenix Ins. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co. 20 L. R. A. 405, 134 Ind. 215; Germania F. Ins. Co. v. Curran, 8 Kan. 9; Brooklyn L. Ins. Co. v. Bledsoe, 52 Ala. 538; Clay F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Huron Salt & Lumber Mfg. Co. 31 Mich. 346; Ehrman v. Teutonia Ins. Co. 1 McCrary, 123, 1 Fed. Rep. 471; Berry v. Knights Templars' & Masons' Life Indemnity Co. 46 Fed. Rep. 430, affirmed in Knights Templars' & Masons' Life Indemnity Co. v. Berry, 50 Fed. Rep. 511; Ganser v. Firman's Fund Ins. Co. 34 Minn. 872; Swan v. Watertown F. Ins. Co. 96 Pa. 37; Watertown F. Ins. Co. v. Simons, 96 Pa. 520; Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. McMillen, 24 Ohio St. 67.

The same principle of estoppel is applied to prevent a foreign corporation from setting up its own failure to comply with statutory conditions as to appointment of a person to receive service of process when process has been served on an agent in the state. Hagerman v. Empire Slate Co. 97 Pa. 534; Ehrman v. Teutonia Ins. Co. 31 Mich. 346; Funk v. Anglo-American Ins. Co. 27 Fed. Rep. 336.

And to similar effect upholding service on an agent in such cases though not expressly based on the doctrine of estoppel is the decision in Moch v. Virginia F. & M. Ins. Co. 10 Fed. Rep. 606; and Clews v. Rockford, R. L. & St. L. Railroad, 49 How. Pr. 117.

As to estoppel to deny character or powers of foreign corporation irrespective of such statutory prohibitions, see note to Cons Export & Com. Co. v. Poole (S. C.) ante, 239.

B. A. R.

void, though entered into without the authority of the statute. Some of the cases cited by appellant contain expressions to the effect that the imposition of a penalty for the performance of an act is equivalent to declaring it unlawful; but an examination of the facts will show that the provisions which they were construing were clothed in far different language than the one under consideration. The demurrer was properly sustained.

The next error assigned is that the court erred in giving the following instruction: "If the jury believe and find from a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff furnished the materials, and performed the work, specified to be furnished and performed in the contract in suit, and in all respects substantially performed all the conditions on its part, and that the defendant retained said materials in its possession, and made use of the same and of the fruits of such work performed, and did not return, or offer to return, said materials to the plaintiff, then the plaintiff would be entitled to a verdict of the jury for the amount of the contract price for said labor and materials specified in said contract." This error seems to us to be well assigned. There was nothing in the pleadings or testimony which justified the court in giving any instruction as to the retention by the appellant of the materials furnished, and the fruits of the work performed under the contract, and, such being the fact, the instruction in regard thereto had a tendency to mislead the jury. By it they must have been led to suppose that there was some duty on the part of the defendant to have returned the materials if it wished to avoid liability. It is true that the first part of the instruction, which required that the plaintiff should establish the fact that it had substantially done all that was required on its part, was joined with what was said as to the retention of the materials by the conjunctive "and" instead of the disjunctive "or," and for that reason, in a technical sense, was perhaps not changed thereby to the prejudice of appellants; yet we are not prepared to hold that the jury must necessarily have so construed it. They would be much more likely to take the instruction as a declaration by the court that there was a duty resting upon appellant to return the property if it would escape liability on account thereof. They would not be likely to assume that what was said about the retention of the property was idle talk on the part of the court. Besides, when construed in the light of the contract as defined by the court in another instruction, this one is technically incorrect, for the reason that by such other instruction the jury are told that, if they find that the materials and work were furnished and performed as required by the contract, and that the work was completed, and was then found to be, or was in fact, in good working order, the plaintiff will be entitled to a verdict; from which it will be seen that the court recognized the fact that not only must the contract have been substantially complied with, but that, in addition thereto, the work must have been found to be in good working order. Hence, the instruction under consideration, investigated in the light of the other, would warrant the jury in concluding that, under the law, the retention of the materials by appellant would be equivalent to a finding that the plant was in good working order. The jury are told, in one of the instructions, that if the work has been substantially performed, and the plant found to be in good working order, the plaintiff is entitled to recover, and, in the one under consideration, that, if the contract has been substantially performed and the materials retained, the plaintiff is entitled to recover. From the two instructions the jury may well have understood that if the contract had been substantially performed, and the benefits thereof retained, the plaintiff could recover, regardless of the question as to the plant being found in good working order. Any other construction of the language used would make the two instructions inconsistent.

The next instruction complained of was in the following language: "If the jury believe and find from a preponderance of the evidence that the materials and work specified in the contract in suit were furnished and performed as required by the contract, and that work was completed, and was then found to be, or was in fact, in good working order, then the plaintiff will be entitled to a verdict of the jury for the amount of the contract price specified in the contract, even if the light produced at subsequent times by the operation of the lamps furnished under the contract were not equal to sixteen candle power light from each lamp. The defendant is not entitled, under the issues raised upon the pleadings in this action, to any reduction or abatement from the contract price specified in the contract, merely by reason of inferior quality of the light produced by the lamps furnished at times subsequent to the completion of the work, if the jury believe and find from a preponderance of the evidence, that at the time of the completion of the work it was found to be in good working order." This instruction, in substance, told the jury that if the contract had been substantially performed, and was, at the moment of its completion, found to be in good working order, the plaintiff could recover, even although events almost immediately succeeding the completion of the work conclusively established the fact that the result accomplished was not that contemplated by the contract. In so doing it construed that clause in the contract which provided that payments should not be made until the plant was found to be in good working order, to relate to its condition at the moment of completion. This was not a fair construction of that clause in the contract. It was the evident contemplation of the parties that the work should not only be done as provided for therein, but that, after it was done, there should be reasonable opportunity given, and time allowed, to have it ascertained as a fact that the plant was found to be in such a condition as to fairly fulfill the object for which it was put in. The plaintiff occupied the position of an expert in determining what was necessary to make the plant perform the work required of it, and upon it was cast the responsibility, not only of putting in the material provided for in the contract, but also that of requiring the defendant to furnish such additional material as was necessary to make the plant reasonably fit for the use for which it was intended. The defendant did not profess any expert knowledge as to the plant to be put in, and relied entirely upon the plaintiff as to what was required. Under these circumstances, the contract, when fairly construed, contemplated that there should be full opportunity, by actual practical test, to determine whether or not the plant was in good working order before the contract price therefor should be paid. This instruction did not put the matter to the jury in that light, and was, therefore, erroneous.

The next instruction as to which error is alleged is one in which the court instructed the jury that, if they found for the plaintiff, they might include interest. The claim of the plaintiff was for a definite, liquidated sum, and from the time the action was brought we think it would draw interest, and that the court properly so instructed the jury.

The other errors alleged grow out of the modification by the court of one of the instructions asked by defendant, and of the refusal to give various other instructions asked by it. In modifying the instruction in reference to the services of an expert the court committed error. The contract contemplated the services of only one expert, and the plaintiff was thereby in no manner authorized to put two experts to work on the job, and recover for their services at the contract price. Some of the instructions asked by the appellant, and refused by the court, correctly stated the law; but the court, in other instructions given to the jury, substantially covered the same questions, and for that reason it was not reversible error to refuse to instruct in the language of the requests.

The judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Frederick J. LANCASTER

v.

AMSTERDAM IMPROVEMENT CO.

(140 N. Y. 576.)

1. The right of a de facto corporation to transact business under a franchise which another state has attempted to confer cannot be questioned by individuals.

NORM.—Right of foreign corporations to own real estate.

The above case fully completes the recognition by New York courts of corporations of other states on substantially the same footing as citizens of other states, except so far as the statutes expressly restrict their powers. The case is also a strong one, if not the very strongest of all that have been decided in this country, in respect to the particular matter of real-estate ownership by foreign corporations, yet the doctrine of this case is very fairly sustained by the weight of authority.

It is very clear and fully established that the power of a corporation to hold real estate outside of the state in which it was incorporated, if contemplated by its charter, must depend on the assent or permission, either express or implied, of the state in which the land lies. Bunyan v. Coster, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 122, 10 L. ed. 332.

But it is equally true that until a state denies the right, a foreign corporation may own real estate. New York Dry Dock v. Hicks, 5 McLean, 111.

That a foreign corporation having power under the laws of the state in which it was created to become the owner of lands in another state may do so, unless it is prohibited by the laws of the latter state, is declared in Thompson v. Waters, 25 Mich. 214, 12 Am. Rep. 243, in which it is held that no affirmative permission by the laws of the place is necessary.

This case cites Ives v. Bank of Lansingburgh, 12 Mich. 361, as authority, but in that case the question was not discussed or expressly decided.

2. The power of a corporation created by another state to deal in the purchase and sale of real estate cannot be questioned by a party dealing with it, on the ground that such dealing is in excess of the powers granted to it by the laws under which it is incorporated.

3. A foreign corporation incorporated for the purpose of dealing in the purchase and sale of real property is not

In Thompson v. Waters, supra, the right of a foreign corporation to own lands is sustained in respect to lands taken for the satisfaction of a debt.

The general doctrine of the power of a foreign corporation to own lands is also sustained in Lumbard v. Aldrich, 8 N. H. 31, 28 Am. Dec. 351, and is declared to follow from the right of such a corporation to sue and enforce judgment, since to obtain satisfaction of the judgment it might have to buy lands on execution sale.

Even where corporations were allowed to hold only what real property was necessary for their business, a foreign corporation could lawfully take the lease for an office. Baltimore & P. S. B. Co. v. McCutcheon, 13 Pa. 13.

A foreign corporation engaged in transportation has the right to occupy and hold as lessee, or otherwise, such property as is necessary or convenient for the transaction of its business. Northern Transp. Co. of Ohio v. Chicago, 7 Biss. 45.

In Lathrop v. Commercial Bank of Scioto, 8 Dana, 114, 38 Am. Dec. 481, the right of a foreign corporation under the statute to take a devise of lands was conceded, and the decision was that it might also hold real property by mortgage or by purchase.

A foreign corporation need not be shown to have the right to hold real estate under the laws of the state of its incorporation in order to be allowed to do so in the state where the land is situated, but such power will be presumed at least in favor of its grantees. Tarpey v. Deseret Salt Co. 5 Utah, 426.

prevented by the statutes or public policy of the state of New York from transacting such business in that state.

4. A foreign corporation can transact any lawful business in New York state which a nonresident natural person can do.

(January 16, 1894.)

CROSS-APPEALS from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, upon a question submitted to it upon an agreed statement of facts to determine the validity of the title to certain real estate which defendant had attempted to convey to plaintiff, the plaintiff appealing from the whole of the judgment, and defendant appealing from so much thereof as held that the title conveyed was subject to the superior title of the people of the state of New York. Reversed on defendant's appeal.

Statement by Gray, J.:

This was a submission of a controversy to the general term in the first department upon agreed facts.

The Amsterdam Improvement Company was incorporated under the laws of the state of New Jersey in May, 1891, by five persons, of whom one only was a resident of that state, the others being residents of this state. Its certificate of incorporation, filed that day, contained the following article:

"Second. That the places in this state, where the business of such company is to be conducted, are Jersey City and the city of Hoboken, in the county of Hudson. The principal part of the business of said company within this state is to be transacted at Jersey City, in the county of Hudson, and the places out of this state where the same is to be conducted and where the company proposes to carry on operations are the cities of New York and Brooklyn, in the state of New York; and that the objects for which said company is formed are the purchase and sale of real property, both improved and unimproved, the improvement of such property as may be purchased, and which, when purchased is unimproved, the exchange of property for other property, the lending of moneys upon first and second mortgages, secured by bonds, and the purchase and sale, by assignment or otherwise, of such mortgages and bonds. The portion of the business of said company which is to be carried on out of this state in the said cities of New York and Brooklyn will be such as will come under the head of the objects for which this company is formed. The principal office or place of business of said company, out of this state, is the city of New York, in the county and state of New York."

On December 21, 1892, the secretary of state of the state of New York issued a certificate, of which the following is a copy:

"State of New York.

"Office of the Secretary of State, Albany. }

"It is hereby certified that the Amsterdam Improvement Company, which appears from the papers filed in this office on the twenty-first day of December, 1892, to be a foreign

So in Alward v. Holmes, 10 Abb. N. C. 28, a foreign banking corporation, authorized to hold real estate requisite for its accommodation in the convenient transaction of business, and such as might be mortgaged or conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts, or bought at judicial sale, is held to be presumed to have such power outside of the state of incorporation.

The fact that a foreign corporation is not shown to carry on any business in the state of its incorporation is held in New Hampshire Land Co. v. Tilton, 19 Fed. Rep. 73, to be insufficient to defeat its right to own land in New Hampshire.

In Illinois the statutes restrict the powers of corporations generally in respect to holding real property, to what is necessary to carry out the general purposes of their incorporation, and under such statutes a Connecticut land company, empowered to own and deal in lands, was denied the right to take title to land in Illinois: and a deed to such a company, and its deed to another were held not to transfer any title. Carroll v. East St. Louis, 67 Ill. 568, 16 Am. Rep. 582.

So a trust company incorporated in another state was refused appointment as a trustee in Illinois on the ground that it was not entitled to hold real estate, although in the state where it was incorporated it was authorized to become such trustee. United States Trust Co. v. Lee, 73 Ill. 142, 24 Am. Rep. 236.

But the Illinois Act of July 1, 1877, as amended July 1, 1879, gives to corporations power to act as trustees, and therefore under the general corporation act a foreign corporation with powers of that sort may take a devise in Illinois as trustee. Pennsylvania Co. for Insurance on Lives v. Baurer, 143 Ill. 459.

A conveyance of real estate in Illinois to a benevolent or missionary corporation of another 24 L. R. A.

state cannot be presumed to be against the public policy of Illinois, since it allows similar domestic corporations to take title to real estate by devise or otherwise. American & Foreign Christian Union v. Yount, 101 U. S. 352, 25 L. ed. 888.

And as the provision of the Illinois Act concerning corporations, section 23, subjecting foreign corporations to the same liabilities imposed upon domestic corporations, and that they "shall have no other or greater powers," implies that foreign corporations shall have the same powers as domestic corporations, a Connecticut trading corporation clothed with power to take and hold real estate, for certain specified purposes may, like an Illinois corporation, acquire real estate in Illinois necessary for the transaction of its business. Barnes v. Suddard, 117 Ill. 237.

A foreign corporation may acquire real estate in satisfaction of debts to it under the same circumstances that a domestic corporation can do so, under the Illinois corporation act. Columbus Buggy Co. v. Graves, 108 Ill. 459.

A corporation created under the laws of Pennsylvania to explore, locate, and improve lands, transfer emigrants, colonize and form settlements in Utah, Arizona, or adjoining states and territories lying west of the Mississippi, was held in Cowell v. Colorado Springs Co., 100 U. S. 55, 25 L. ed. 547, to have power to acquire title to land in Colorado and transfer the same to a grantee, in the absence of any affirmative legislation or expression of the policy of the laws of that place against such corporation, and that condemnation could not be inferred by the failure of the legislature to provide for such corporations, and a provision that allowed corporations to be formed only by general laws.

A foreign corporation organized prior to the passage of the Washington Act of March 23, 1890, stock corporation, organized and existing under the laws of the state of New Jersey, has complied with all the requirements of law to authorize it to do business in this state, and that the business of such corporation to be carried on in this state is such as may be lawfully carried on by a corporation incorporated under the laws of this state, for such or similar business."

The statute under which this company was incorporated provided that: "It shall be lawful for three or more persons to associate themselves into a company to carry on any kind of manufacturing, mining, chemical, trading or agricultural business, agricultural fairs and exhibitions for the encouragement of competition in agriculture, horticulture, breed of stock and development of speed in horses, the transportation of goods, merchandise or passengers upon land or water, inland navigation, the building of houses, vessels, wharves or docks, or other mechanical business, the reclamation and improvement of submerged land, the improvement and sale of lands, etc."

This statute also provided that corporations shall have the power "to hold, purchase, and convey such real and personal property as the purposes of the corporation shall require, not exceeding the amount limited in its charter, and all other real estate which shall have been bona fide mortgaged to the said company by way of security, or convey to them in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of dealings, or purchased at sales upon judgment or decree which shall be obtained for such debts."

Other provisions authorized a company organized under the statute to carry on a part of its business, and to have offices out of the state, and that "they may hold, purchase, and convey real and personal property out of the state, the same as if such real and personal property were situated in the state of New Jersey, provided that the certificate of organization shall state," etc. Another provision authorized any New Jersey corporation, incorporated under any general or special act, to conduct its business outside the state.

May 23, 1891, Arthur P. Smith was the owner of a lot of vacant and unimproved land in the city of New York, which, by a deed dated that day and duly recorded May 25, 1891, he conveyed to the defendant. On the 15th day of January, 1893, the plaintiff and the defendant entered into a written contract whereby they agreed to exchange said lot of land for another lot of land owned by the plaintiff. The land of the plaintiff was valued at $72,000, and the land of the defendant at $49,500, and the difference, $18,500, the defendant agreed to pay to the plaintiff at the times and in the manner specified in the contract. It was agreed that the deeds should be exchanged at a place named on or before February 15, 1893. Pursuant to said contract the defendant executed a deed in due form by which it assumed to convey the premises to the plaintiff.

It is conceded that the defendant has done is expressly exempted from its provisions against foreign corporations dealing in land and engaged in brokerage business. Realty Co. v. Appolonio, 5 Wash. 497.

A foreign corporation owning a toll-bridge across a river which forms a state boundary may take a deed of the right to control passage over land in Vermont to prevent passage over it in evasion of the toll-bridge by crossing on the ice, etc. Claremont Bridge Props. v. Royce, 42 Vt. 736.

The federal government is denied power to take a devise of land in New York, under a statute providing that a devise may be made "to any person capable by law of holding real estate, but no devise to a corporation shall be valid, unless such corporation shall be expressly authorized by its charter or by statute to take by devise." The term "person" in this place means a natural person only, and the term "corporation" applies only to a corporation created under the laws of the state. United States v. Fox, 94 U. S. 815, 24 L. ed. 182.

The power of a foreign corporation to take a devise of property must depend on the laws of the state where the land lies. White v. Howard, 46 N. Y. 144.

It is not sufficient in such a case to show that it had power by its charter to take such gift. Ibid.

An educational corporation in Wisconsin, having power to acquire and hold real estate, may take a devise of land in Illinois, as a similar corporation in that state could do. Santa Clara Female Academy v. Sullivan, 116 Ill. 579, 56 Am. Rep. 776.

In respect to a devise to a foreign charitable corporation, which was prohibited by local statute from holding real estate directly or by any trustee, it was held that the court would raise up a trustee to support the gift who might use the corporation to distribute the income according to the intent of the donor or testatrix. Frazier v. St. Luke's Church, 10 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 53, 28 W. N. C. 307.

So a bequest to a foreign corporation of the proceeds of both real and personal property is lawful unless prohibited by statute. Holls v. Drew Theological Seminary, 85 N. Y. 166; Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, 48 N. Y. 424.

The right of a foreign corporation to take a bequest is also upheld in Sherwood v. American Bible Soc. 4 Abb. App. Dec. 237.

Limitation by charter or laws of the state of incorporation.

Comity does not require the grant of privileges to a foreign corporation beyond its charter powers. A state may tolerate but a part of the charter powers of a foreign corporation, or a limited rather than a full exertion of them, but it will never concede permission to go beyond the charter. Diamond Match Co. v. Powers, 51 Mich. 145.

Therefore it was held in the above case that unless the state of incorporation allowed a foreign corporation to deal in land and land titles, it could not engage in such affairs in Michigan, and could not demand access through an agent to real estate records, on the ground that it was constantly engaged in purchasing lands, where it did not show that it was entitled to engage in such business in the state of its incorporation. Ibid.

The right of a foreign corporation (a bank) to hold land was denied, where the act under which it was incorporated directed that some officer should be designated to whom all conveyances should be executed. Metropolitan Bank v. Godfrey, 23 Ill. 579.

Where the charter of a foreign corporation authorized it to take property to colonize "free people of color" in Africa, and for "no other purpose," it was held that this restriction was operative in Georgia, and that a devise of slaves for the purpose of being thus colonized did not come within the charter power respecting "free people no business in the state of New Jersey, and that the only business or transactions in which it has been engaged since its organization have been carried on in the city and county of New York.

The following question was submitted to the general term: "Whether said defendant, the Amsterdam Improvement Company, possessed and has conveyed to Frederick J. Lancaster, the plaintiff herein, a good and sufficient title to the premises described in said contract and deed." That court has adjudged that the defendant's deed did not convey to the plaintiff a good title, and that its title was subject to the right, title, and interest of the people of the state, whose title was, at the time of the execution and delivery of the deed, superior and prior to that of the defendant.

Mr. Thomas S. Bassford, for plaintiff:

The defendant, a New Jersey corporation, cannot lawfully operate ad libitum in real estate located within the state of New York.

While the propositions laid down in the decision of Merrick v. Van Stantvoord, 84 N. Y. 208, and Demarest v. Grant, 18 L. R. A. 854, 128 N. Y. 218, appear broad enough to cover the present transaction, it will at once appear on an examination of the facts on which these cases were founded, that they involved merely a question of individual liability of a director for the tort of the foreign corporation, and did not in any wise involve the question how far the special restrictions relative to real estate tenure affected the transaction.

of color" and was invalid. American Consol. Soc. v. Gartrell, 23 Ga. 448.

The New York statutes (3 Rev. Stat. 183, 5th ed. § 3), denying the power of a corporation to take lands by devise, unless expressly authorized to do so by its charter or by statute, prevents a devise to a city incorporated in another state without any such power conferred upon it and a New York court will construe the charter for itself. Boyce v. St. Louis, 20 Barb. 650. This applies to a devise in trust for charity.

But the incapacity of a town in another state to take a charitable devise will not prevent it from taking in Massachusetts if subsequently authorized to do so by statute. Fellows v. Miner, 119 Mass. 541.

That charter restrictions follow a foreign corporation is also decided, although not with reference to real property, in Blair v. Perpetual Ins. Co. 10 Mo. 559, 47 Am. Dec. 123, and Ohio Life Ins. & T. Co. v. Merchants Ins. & T. Co. 11 Humph. 1, 53 Am. Dec. 742.

Butsee Whitman Gold & Silver Min. Co. v. Baker, infra.

While the cases seem to be unanimous in holding that the charter limitations of a foreign corporation in respect to the ownership of land follow it wherever it goes, there is a lack of uniformity as to the effect of limitations by general laws, such as a statute of wills, in the statute of incorporation, upon the power of the corporation to take lands outside of the state.

In Starkweather v. American Bible Soc., 72 Ill. 51, 23 Am. Rep. 133, it was held that a New York corporation, which, under the New York statute of wills, could not take a devise of lands, was precluded by that statute from taking such a devise in Illinois, although the court recognized the fact that the decisions in other jurisdictions were to the contrary.

All legislation is jealous, and jurisprudence exclusive as to land.

Jackson v. Ingraham, 4 Johns. 182; Story, Conflict Laws, 868, and citations.

It would be absurd to say that it ever was the spirit of our law that a foreign corporation could come here and deal in real estate ad libitum. This is not the policy pursued by a sister state under like circumstances.

Carroll v. East St. Louis, 67 Ill. 568, 16 Am. Rep. 632.

Comity of states will enforce the contracts of foreign corporations, in any event, only so far as they are enforceable at home.

People v. Fire Asso. of Philadelphia, 92 N. Y. 815, 44 Am. Rep. 880; Plimpton v. Bigelow, 98 N. Y. 592.

Laws 1877, chap. 450, § 1, reads as follows: "Any foreign corporation created under the laws of the United States, or of any state or territory thereof, and doing business in this state, may acquire such real property in this state as may be necessary for its corporate purposes in the transaction of its business in this state, and convey the same by deed or otherwise in the same manner as a domestic corporation."

The question for the court is the construction of the clause, "as may be necessary for its corporate purposes in the transaction of its business in this state."

Is it not against the public policy of this state for a foreign corporation operating under the circumstances surrounding this defendant, frankly admitting that it has never heretofore had a single business transaction in its native

But, on the other hand, in American Bible Soc. v. Marshall, 15 Ohio St. 527, a prohibition by a statute of wills against a devise to a corporation was held ineffectual to prevent the corporation from taking such a devise in another state, if the terms of its charter were broad enough to authorize the ownership of lands.

To the same effect was the decision in Thompson v. Swoope, 24 Pa. 420, and White v. Howard, 38 Conn. 342.

Akin to these decisions is that of Vansant v. Roberts, 8 Md. 119, respecting personal property, in which it is held that accumulations of such property in the hands of a foreign corporation is a matter to be regulated by each state for itself, and that the Maryland Bill of Rights, section 34, prohibiting a devise for a religious sect without leave of the legislature had no extraterritorial effect, and would not prevent a foreign corporation from taking personal property by will in Maryland.

This case was followed in Brown v. Thompson, 49 Md. 423, upholding a bequest to a foreign missionary society.

And a "community" in a foreign country may be allowed to take a bequest if the laws of that country permit. Re Huss, 12 L. R. A. 620, 126 N. Y. 537.

So a statute prohibiting a gift by will of more than one half of a testator's estate to a religious corporation has no extraterritorial effect in reference to such a gift in another state although to a corporation of the former state. But it applies to a gift by a resident of the state to a foreign corporation. American Bible Soc. v. Healy, 10 L. R. A. 766, 153 Mass. 197; Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, 43 N. Y. 424; Holls v. Drew Theological Seminary, 95 N. Y. 166.

And in Kerr v. Dougherty, 79 N. Y. 327, it was held that the power of a Pennsylvania religious or charitable corporation to take under a New York state, to come to this state and speculate in really ad libitum? Illinois has answered this question in the negative.

Carroll v. East St. Louis, supra.

In Bard v. Poole, 12 N. Y. 507, Denio, J., states: "I concede that it would be a violation of our sovereignty for a foreign corporation to remove from the country or state where it was created to locate itself wholly in this state."

The power of foreign corporations to hold real estate depends, first, upon the same general considerations which affect all corporations; and second, upon the laws and policy of the state where the land is situated.

American & Foreign Christian Union v. Yount, 101 U. S. 852, 25 L. ed. 888; Binney's Case, 2 Bland, Ch. 146.

If defendant contravened the public policy of this state in attempting to deal in real estate ad libitum within the state of New York, its acts were null and void, and it never became vested with any title to the plot of land it agreed to convey to plaintiff.

All contracts which contravene the public policy of the state are void. Such, for instance, as a contract in restraint of trade or a contract with an enemy of the state.

Hunt v. Knickerbocker, 5 Johns. 327.

When a corporation is prohibited from holding land it cannot buy and sell, for every purchase and sale by it involves a holding by it, and its incapacity renders the conveyance defective for lack of a competent grantee.

Spelling, Priv. Corp. § 207; Bank of Michi- gan v. Niles, 1 Dougl. (Mich.) 401, 41 Am. Dec. 575.

If defendant's act in attempting to acquire title to the land it agreed to sell to plaintiff was void, it never became vested with a scintilla of title, and, therefore, never had any to convey to plaintiff.

The defendant acquired no title through the deed taken from its grantor, but the title vested in the individual members of the corporation.

Hill v. Beach, 12 N. J. Eq. 81; Spelling, Priv. Corp. § 90, p. 110; Eris R. Co. v. State, 81 N. J. L. 531, 86 Am. Dec. 226; Empire Mills v. Alston Grocery Co. (Tex.) Jan. 17, 1891; Murfree, Foreign Corp. § 4.

Mr. Louis Marshall, for defendant:

The Amsterdam Improvement Company is a legally incorporated entity under the laws of the state of New Jersey, having the power thereunder of dealing in real estate, not only within the sovereignty of its creation, but also in this state.

But even assuming that the corporation was not organized in strict compliance with the statutory formalities it became a corporation de facto and a conveyance by it would pass a good title.

Smith v. Shreeley, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 358, 20 L. ed. 430; Fritts v. Palmer, 132 U. S. 232, 33 L. ed. 317; Lackensack Water Co. v. DeKay, 86 N. J. Eq. 548.

There is nothing in the policy of this state which prohibits a corporation formed in another state, composed entirely of citizens of this state, for the purpose of transacting business was restricted by a Pennsylvania statute forbidding gifts by will to such corporations unless the will was made at least one month before the testator's death. This seems to proceed on the same theory as Starkweather v. American Bible Soc., supra, and to be out of harmony with the other preceding cases as to statutes of wills.

A simple bequest of money to be paid to a foreign corporation is valid, even if the law of the state where the will is made forbids the execution of such a trust as that for which the corporation is created. General Assembly of the Presby. Church in U. S. Trustees v. Guthrie, 6 L. R. A. 321, 88 Va. 125.

Railroads.

Legislative permission to a foreign railroad company to come into the state need not be equivalent to a new incorporation in order to permit the exercise of corporate powers in the state. Martin v. Mobile & O. R. Co. 7 Bush, 118.

And a railroad corporation can exercise all its charter powers in other states or countries, if not repugnant or prejudicial to their laws. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Fletcher, 35 Kan. 236.

But in Iowa it is held that a foreign railroad corporation cannot acquire or possess a right of way in that state, but is impliedly precluded therefrom by statute expressly conferring the power upon corporations of that state. Holbert v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 45 Iowa, 23.

And in West Virginia it was declared that a foreign railroad corporation cannot legally operate its road in that state except by charter or license from the state, and a lease of a railroad to a foreign corporation was regarded as insufficient to make the lessee a necessary party to a suit concerning the land. Chapman v. Pittsburgh & S. R. Co. 18 W. Va. 184.

A railroad company incorporated in another state was held entitled to own land in Vermont, 24 L. R. A.

where it bought fifteen acres near the abutment of a bridge which it had built across the river which formed the state boundary, although the road extended only to such boundary, and there was no evidence that it intended to run cars into the state, but the land would be convenient for its use if it did not. State v. Boston, C. & M. R. Co. 25 Vt. 433.

The power of railroad companies to make a lease to a corporation of another state is held to be given by statute in Black v. Delaware & R. Canal Co. 22 N. J. Eq. 130.

A foreign corporation owning all the stock of a domestic corporation, where the statutes allow its stock to be held by other corporations, does not thereby "acquire or hold" the real estate of the domestic corporation so as to violate the Pennsylvania Act of April 23, 1855, against acquiring or holding real estate "directly in the corporate name, or by or through any trustee or other device whatsoever, unless especially authorized," under penalty of escheat. Com. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 7 L. R. A. 634, 132 Pa. 591, substantially overruling Com. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 114 Pa. 340, in which the court submitted to the jury the question whether the ownership of stock was a "device" to own land in violation of the statute.

The title of a state railroad corporation to lands in a territory under a grant by act of congress could not be divested by a state into which the territory was subsequently formed, even if such state should interfere with such corporation. Van Wyck v. Knevals, 108 U. S. 360, 27 L. ed. 201.

Where congress has conferred upon a railroad corporation of a state a right of way over public lands of the United States in any one of their territories, it may be doubted whether the state subsequently created out of such territory could prevent the enjoyment by such corporation of the right conferred. It could do so only on the same ness here from exercising its corporate powers within our jurisdiction.

Merrick v. Van Santvoord, 84 N. Y. 208; Demarest v. Grant, 18 L. R. A. 854, 128 N. Y. 205.

At common law any corporation had the power to take, hold, and convey real estate, for any purposes not inconsistent with those for which it was created.

At common law any corporation could hold real property in this state. This right is inherent in a domestic corporation, and has been freely conferred upon foreign corporations thereunto authorized by their charters by the principle of comity.

Sherwood v. American Bible Soc. supra; Bard v. Poole, 12 N. Y. 506; Silver Lake Bank v. North, 4 Johns. Ch. 370, 1 L. ed. 871; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. 18 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 274; Mumford v. American L. Ins. & T. Co. 4 N. Y. 463; Alward v. Holmes, 10 Abb. N. C. 96; Merrick v. Van Santvoord, and Demarest v. Grant, supra; Stevens v. Pratt, 101 Ill. 206.

In this state the principle of comity has been extended so far as to afford a foreign corporation relief by injunction to restrain a citizen of this state from violating a covenant not to engage in a certain business in this and other states.

Diamond Match Co. v. Roeber, 106 N. Y. 478, terms that it could refuse a recognition of its own previously granted right, for in such matters the state would succeed only to the authority of congress over the territory. St. Joseph & D. C. R. Co. v. Baldwin, 108 U. S. 423, 23 L. ed. 573.

Telegraphs.

The general power of a corporation to hold property in states other than the one which incorporated it, in the absence of statutory prohibition in such states, is declared in United Lines Teleg. Co. v. Boston Safe Deposit & T. Co. 147 U. S. 431, 37 L. ed. 231, in respect to the ownership of a telegraph line.

A corporation organized to be a mere auxiliary and agency of a foreign corporation in operating a telegraph line is not against the policy of the laws, where they allow foreign corporations to do business and hold necessary property for that purpose. Day v. Postal Teleg. Co. 66 Md. 354.

In Canada by an exercise of comity a foreign corporation was held entitled to enforce a contract for the exclusive right to operate a telegraph line over a railroad. Canadian Pac. R. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 17 Can. S. C. 151.

As to power of state to exclude telegraph companies, see note to Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Baltimore, ante, 161.

Interest in mines.

A New York mining company organized for the business of mining in Montana was protected in its business in that state. Garfield, M. & Min. Co. v. Hammer, 6 Mont. 53.

A California mining corporation authorized to hold not more than 1440 acres, was held entitled in Nevada to hold to any extent permitted by the Nevada laws; and it is also held that no individual could be protected in trespassing on any part of the land of such company, even if it exceeded the 31 L. 60 Am. Rep. 464. See also Cowell v. Colorado Springs Co. 100 U. S. 55, 25 L. ed. 547; American & Foreign Christian Union v. Yount, 101 U. S. 352, 25 L. ed. 688; Carroll v. East St. Louis, 67 Ill. 568, 16 Am. Rep. 632; New Hampshire Land Co. v. Tilton, 19 Fed. Rep. 73.

Statutes containing grants of power must be construed so as to include the authority to do all things necessary to make the object of the grant effectual and to enable the donee of the power to accomplish the expressed purposes of the act.

New York v. Sands, 105 N. Y. 210; People v. Chapin, Id. 816.

By the law as it existed prior to the passage of the Act of 1877, corporations of other states were fully empowered to acquire real estate for any of the purposes mentioned in that act, and to hold the same indefinitely, if so empowered by their charters or the laws of the respective states under which they were organized. The only change, therefore, wrought by this act was to limit the time during which such foreign corporations could hold lands so acquired.

Alward v. Holmes, 10 Abb. N. C. 96, and cases there cited.

But the effect of noncompliance with such statutory provision would not, in the absence of regulations forbidding a sale after five years, or of affirmative words imposing a penalty or forfeiture for disobedience, divest the title of the corporation, or prevent it from selling the same, and conveying a good title to the purchaser.

amount which the corporation could lawfully hold. Whitman Gold & Silver Min. Co. v. Baker, 3 Nev. 386.

A coal mining company organized in another state, chiefly for carrying on business in Ohio, but having an office and annual meetings in the state of its incorporation, was held lawful in Ohio. Second Nat. Bank of Cincinnati v. Lovell, 2 Cin. Sup. Ct. Rep. 400.

And in Hanna v. International Petroleum Co. 23 Ohio St. 622, a mining corporation organized in another state to do business in Ohio was held not to be a fraud on the law, because it had done nothing but organize in its own state.

And substantially to the same effect was the decision in Newburg Petroleum Co. v. Wear, 27 Ohio St. 343, upholding oil land leases to a foreign corporation, which was held not to be a fraud because it had only an office in the state of its incorporation, and did its principal business in Ohio.

A corporation having its registered office in England, where it holds corporate meetings, can own mining lands in Missouri, since it is authorized to do so by the English law, and there is no Missouri statute which prohibits it. Missouri Lead Min. & S. Co. v. Reinhard, 114 Mo. 218.
